THE SENATE

Tuesday, September 17, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

GENTLEMAN USHER OF THE BLACK ROD

APPOINTMENT OF RENÉ M. JALBERT, ESQUIRE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that I have received a certified copy of Order in Council, P. C. 1985-2124, appointing Mr. René M. Jalbert, CV, CD, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, effective July 10, 1985.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to take a moment of the Senate's time to welcome the new Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to our chamber, to congratulate him on his distinguished career to date both in the military and in the field of protocol in his native province, and on his spectacular and worthwhile years of service in the Quebec National Assembly.

The honourable gentleman is welcome here indeed. I congratulate him on his past service and I look forward to seeing him with us for many years to come. I wish him all the very best—and that includes a good deal of patience as he suffers through our somewhat laborious debates from time to time.

Thank you for joining us.

[Translation]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we also wish to offer our congratulations. However, I wonder who is actually to be congratulated, and I think the Senate of Canada deserves to be congratulated on the truly felicitous appointment of the gentleman introduced here today as our Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod. We wish to offer him a most cordial welcome and our best wishes for a long and satisfying career in our midst.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

DELEGATION FROM PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to draw your attention to the presence in our gallery of a delegation from the National People's Congress of the People's Republic of China, led by His Excellency Mr. Wang Renzhong.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

CROWN CORPORATIONS DISSOLUTION AUTHORIZATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-60, to authorize procurement of the dissolution of certain Crown corporations and to amend or repeal other Acts in consequence thereof.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

CANADIAN INSTITUTE FOR INTERNATIONAL PEACE AND SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-69, to amend the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security Act and certain other Acts in relation thereto.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have before me a rather formidable list of documents to table. It includes reports required by the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act for the period ended March 31, 1985, pursuant to section 72(2) of the acts, chapter 111, Statutes of Canada, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983. There are 57 such reports. As well, I have six or seven pages of reports and notices which must be tabled. With the concurrence of the Senate, I would like to table them and ask that they be appended to the Minutes of the Proceedings for this day. Honourable senators could then look through the list and if there were any about which they would like information or on which they would wish to ask questions, I would be only too happy to try to reply at a later date.

Alternatively, of course, if the Senate wishes, I will read each and every one now. The choice lies with the Senate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Doody has shown me the list and it is indeed lengthy. This is understandable when so many organizations are required to report under the particular acts, and when there is an accumulation of other documents over the summer break. I think his suggestion that the list of documents simply appear in our records is a reasonable one.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, reluctantly I give up this opportunity to take up five pages of Hansard, and I pass the documents to the table.

Senator Frith: You're a brick!

(For list of documents, see Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

CANADA'S INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—INTERIM REPORT ON BILATERAL TRADE WITH UNITED STATES AND CANADA'S PARTICIPATION IN RESEARCH ON STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that, pursuant to the Order of the Senate of June 27, 1985, the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., from the Special Joint Committee on Canada's International Relations, has deposited with the Clerk of the Senate an interim report of the committee pertaining to bilateral trade with the United States and Canada's participation in research on the Strategic Defense Initiative.

Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Flynn, report placed on the Orders of Day for consideration on Tuesday next, September 24, 1985.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE PIERRE ELLIOTT TRUDEAU, P.C.

RECORD OF ADMINISTRATION—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I give notice that, on Thursday next, September 19, 1985, I will call the attention of the Senate to an examination of Mr. Trudeau's record.

STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, September 19, 1985, I will call the attention of the Senate to the Strategic Defense Initiative.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

FILM ENTITLED "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Wednesday, September 18, 1985, I will move that the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the activities of the National Film Board with respect to the production and distribution of the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss."

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FORESTRY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO RECEIVE PRESENTATION FROM INTERNATIONAL CHEESE COUNCIL OF CANADA

Hon. Jack Marshall, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry, in response to a request from the International Cheese Council of Canada, be authorized to receive a presentation on Thursday next, September 19, 1985, from representatives of that council with respect to certain issues relating to the establishment of a long-term dairy policy and, if the committee considers it necessary, to report thereon.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Roblin has asked me to convey his regrets and apologies to the chamber this afternoon. He is unavoidably absent today on matters of urgent necessity. He wishes me to tell you that he will be in the chamber tomorrow. However, in the meantime, if there is anything that I can do, I am at your disposal and will be only too happy to oblige.

BANKING

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK AND NORTHLAND BANK—STATUS OF PROPOSED JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I had intended to ask a number of questions about the Canadian Commercial Bank, which is a matter of great public concern and has dominated the media and discussion in the country for the past several weeks. In the understandable absence of the Leader of the Government, I will defer any questions of substance until tomorrow. I do that not because of a lack of confidence in the Deputy Leader of the Government but because it was the Leader of the Government himself who introduced a bill and urged it upon us on March 29 with a package that proved to be ineffective and which, despite its laudable objectives, resulted in the collapse of the Canadian Commercial Bank. I think, therefore, it would be the responsibility of the Leader of the Government to explain what, up to the present, has been impossible to explain. Perhaps he could do it tomorrow.

However, honourable senators, in deferring the questions of substance, I would like to ask the acting leader about a statement made by the Minister of State (Finance) on September 1, when she announced the liquidation of the Canadian Commercial Bank.

In that press release the following sentence appears:

Mrs. McDougall also announced that the government will be asking Parliament to establish a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to examine matters relevant to the Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank.

I should like to ask the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate whether that commitment of the minister will be implemented and when we can expect to have the reference that would permit us to establish the joint committee.

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): To the best of my knowledge, these discussions are still taking place between the Leader of the Government in the Senate and his colleagues in the other place. Also, to the best of my knowledge, there is no resolution at this point regarding the composition of that committee. Whether, indeed, it will be a joint committee, as the Leader of the Opposition has suggested, or whether it will be a committee of the House of Commons, I am not in a position to say at this time. I have not received any definite word on that.

Senator Argue: He was quoting the minister.

Senator MacEachen: It was not my suggestion that there should be established a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons; it was a declaration of the Minister of State (Finance) in an official press release with respect to the Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank. She stated that it was the intention of the government to ask Parliament to establish a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons.

I am somewhat puzzled because there appears on the Order Paper of the House of Commons a reference of that matter to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. That is a committee of the House of Commons. That reference is to examine the affairs of the Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank.

I am really asking the acting leader whether he knows about this and whether the commitment made by the minister has been overruled, and if it has, why it has been overruled, and whether the leadership of the Senate has been consulted about this joint committee.

Senator Doody: I can only repeat what I said a few moments ago. I have no more information than has the honourable gentleman opposite. He read very well, and I congratulate him on that. I have read the same press release, and I know as much as the honourable gentleman opposite knows. If I had had more information on the matter, I certainly would have provided it.

Senator MacEachen: Can the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us whether the commitment made by the Minister of State (Finance) still stands?

Senator Doody: There must be a communications problem. I will try again. I have no more information than has the honourable gentleman opposite. He has read the same material as I have read. I cannot confirm or deny any change in the minister's decision at this point.

Senator MacEachen: Can the acting leader confirm that the minister was telling the truth when she issued this press release?

Senator Walker: Don't be ridiculous!

Senator Doody: I must say, quite candidly, that I have a great deal of confidence in the minister. I am not in a position to say that I subjected her to a polygraph test to determine whether she was telling the truth in the press release. I can only assume that she was telling the truth, just as she has done in the past. I have no reason to suspect that she did not; I rather suspect that she did.

Senator MacEachen: I thank the acting leader for telling us that this does constitute a truthful statement of government policy and that there will be a joint committee established.

I now ask when we will receive the reference.

Senator Doody: I have just told the honourable gentleman opposite that I am sure the statement, when made, was truthful. What the situation is today, as I say again for the fifth or sixth time, I have no further knowledge of, other than what is in the document.

If the honourable gentleman opposite wants to obtain further information, he will have to put the question to those in the government.

Senator MacEachen: So, the acting leader cannot tell us whether there will be a joint committee of Parliament. He can tell us that the minister made a declaration of government policy on September 1. He does not know whether that is government policy today. He cannot say that it is or is not.

Senator Doody: That is right.

Senator MacEachen: We need someone in this chamber who can tell us what is happening and whether we can place any reliance upon statements made by ministers. Surely, that is part of the problem with the growing erosion of the credibility of this minister—that is, no one, not even the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate, can rely on what the minister says.

Senator Doody: For the sake of the record, I will repeat what I have said. I have every confidence in the minister. She is a lady of impeccable character and reputation. I have every respect for her.

As for this matter of grave concern to the honourable gentleman, I suggest that he wait for 24 hours and ask the question again. Perhaps he will get a response that is a bit more definitive. I have offered what help I can and, obviously, it is not enough. We can keep the exchange going back and forth like this for the rest of the afternoon, I suspect, but I certainly cannot add anything further to what I have said up to now. The joint committee was there and now it is not there, or is it there? I do not know.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Acting Leader of the Government if, while we wait for this 24 hours to pass, he would undertake to try to ascertain for us what relationship there is, if any, between the truthful, honourable statement made by the minister and the notice of motion put on the Order Paper in the other place by the President of the Privy Council referring the same questions to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs?

Senator Flynn: That is the same question.

Senator Frith: No, it is not. Let us get that straight. I am always pleased to amuse Senator Flynn and he is always easily amused at his own jokes.

Senator Flynn: I didn't make a joke. You did.

Senator Frith: The question that was asked was not as to whether the deputy leader would, in the meantime, get the information. So, that is the question I am asking.

Senator Doody: Is the Deputy Leader of the Opposition asking me to try to ascertain the relationship between the September 1 statement and the Order Paper reference in the House of Commons?

Senator Frith: Not the Order Paper. Let me repeat the question very slowly so that even Senator Flynn can understand it. The minister stated, as I think the deputy leader realizes because he so acknowledged, that there would be a joint committee. He says that as far as he knows that is government policy. There is a motion on the Order Paper under government notices of motions in the other place, dated September 11, 1985, by the President of the Privy Council "that the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs be empowered to consider and report" and so on, and then it deals with three items relating to the Northland Bank and the Canadian Commercial Bank. All I am asking is this: Since he does not know now, and I understand why that should be the case, will he inform himself in the meantime, so that tomorrow he can tell us what the relationship is between those two? Is there an intention to go ahead with both or does one supersede the other? To repeat, I am simply asking if he will undertake to try to get that information for us in the meantime.

Senator Doody: I shall certainly try to get that information for the honourable senator at the earliest possible opportunity.

Senator Flynn: You are trying to clarify the leader's question.

Senator Frith: At no time did we get an undertaking that he would try to get the information until just now. You are just not listening.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, if Senator Flynn is finished with his amusement, I should like to ask a serious question about a subject which is of great concern to many people in the region of Canada that I come from. My question refers to what is now turning into a major economic disaster for thousands of farmers who were already in difficulty with problems relating to agricultural production generally and are now more specifically affected because of the drought that has devastated that part of Canada.

I should like to ask the acting leader if he can advise when those people can expect from the federal government a response that is in keeping with the magnitude of the difficulties they are facing. It has been known now for many weeks that this situation was developing, and several weeks have passed since any change in the weather pattern could have altered the course of events leading up to the situation that they now find themselves in.

I could add that a contribution of $48 million in assistance has been announced by the federal government; this, of course, after they had already subtracted $92 million from the budget of the Department of Agriculture earlier this year. In any event, whatever has been happening, there always seem to be some further promises that we have to review, study and so on in this situation.

I should like the acting leader to convey to the Minister of Agriculture and, perhaps, several others that the time when we can be satisfied with this kind of postponement of decisions as to what they are going to do to be of assistance to these people is running out.

I would, therefore, ask him if he knows now when further announcements will be made about actions to be taken to relieve this very serious situation.

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I certainly appreciate the importance of the question Senator Olson has asked. I shall refer it to the minister responsible and try to get an answer for him at the earliest opportunity. I do not have the answer with me at the present time.

Senator Olson: I have one supplementary question, because I certainly want to review or examine this situation with the Leader of the Government in the Senate when he returns, which I expect will be tomorrow, because I am sure he also takes a keen interest in this matter.

Can he give some indication of what the policy will be, although the details may not be readily available to him for several days?

Senator Doody: I think it is best that I leave this matter until Senator Roblin returns tomorrow. I am sure he will go into the matter in more detail than I would be prepared to do.

Hon. Hazen Argue: I should like to add my voice to that of Senator Olson, pointing out there is now a serious emergency in large parts of western Canada and that action in the form of $50 per seeded acre and $100 per cow is required. Action is required immediately because many farmers are in a position of almost total economic collapse. Businesses in small communities are going broke; they are being boarded up. Therefore, it is urgent that this announcement be made quickly.

I would ask, in more particular detail, whether or not the task force, headed up by the diligent member for Assiniboia, has yet made its report to cabinet. If so, at what stage is that report in terms of consideration? I should also like to know when the announcement will be made.

I would also ask that the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry consider looking into this whole agricultural situation.

In addition, I would ask the acting leader if he is aware that, in the other place, although they have been in session now for some eight days and their deliberations have occupied 300 pages of Hansard, this major catastrophe has warranted the attention of the members collectively to the extent of inserts into only one page of Hansard. One-third of 1 per cent is just not good enough for the farmers in western Canada, who are in serious financial straits at this time.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I have no wish to downplay the importance of the situation Senator Argue describes to us. I know exactly what he means when he talks of economic disasters and hardships.

I am witnessing a disaster in my own province this year where there has been a total collapse of the fishery on the northeast coast of the island. From the southern tip of the Avalon Peninsula to the northern tip of the Great Northern Peninsula, fish catches, in many places, have been non-existent and, in others, have been down to a range of between 10 per cent and 30 per cent of their yearly catches. There is a tremendous economic disaster in that particular area. The very same conditions the honourable senator describes, in terms of small businesses which are the backbone of the economic community in these areas, apply. They are in virtual collapse. I know exactly what the honourable senator is saying.

I studied Hansard diligently and I have not seen any great reference to that particular plight. I am not trying to say that the plight in western Canada is not a serious one; I know it is and I feel the greatest sympathy for those people. They, like my own people, are primary producers who live close, on day-to-day terms, to the environment in which they live.

I cannot tell honourable senators whether or not the gentleman from Assiniboia has brought in his report. I will certainly make every effort to find out. I appreciate the concern of the honourable senator and I will do what I can to find out what I can for him.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, my question is for the Acting Leader of the Government. It is supplementary to those raised by Senator Argue and Senator Olson, but will focus upon the province of Saskatchewan. Although Senator Olson spoke about the area of his concern and Senator Argue, quite rightly, talked about the entire western region, I would like to emphasize the disastrous situation facing Saskatchewan farmers.

My question is: Has any agreement been made with the Province of Saskatchewan and its government as to the kind of aid program that will make possible a living for those who have been so badly affected?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I shall take the question as notice and find out at the earliest opportunity.

PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES

SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF SENATORS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is really supplementary to those put by Senator Olson, Senator MacEachen and Senator Argue. I wish to address what happens in this chamber when the Leader of the Government in the Senate is unavoidably absent. Question Period becomes meaningless, because the questions asked are not answered but are taken as notice.

Senator Flynn: What is the question?

Senator Bosa: I am coming to the question, Senator Flynn. I am saying that the inability to obtain answers to these very important questions emasculates the importance of the Senate.

I have advocated on a previous occasion the appointment of parliamentary secretaries to answer questions put during Question Period. Will the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate impress upon his leader and upon his government the necessity of appointing some parliamentary secretaries in the Senate? There is a great deal of talent among our colleagues on the other side, and I know there are some who could answer some of the questions raised during Question Period.

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think that "the emasculation of the Senate" is probably a little bit of an overstatement—even, one might say, of hyperbole. We have been away from this chamber since June. It is now the middle of September. There were no questions answered during that period of time and there was no great kerfuffle made about that. Senator Roblin is suddenly absent for one day and a great crisis has presented itself. I do not think that matters are that pressing. I think we can contain ourselves for 24 hours until he gets back to resolve all of the problems on the other side of the house.

STATUS OF WOMEN

BROADCASTING TASK FORCE—REMUNERATION OF WOMEN MEMBERS

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, on Saturday, September 14, the Globe and Mail published, in its column "The Ottawa Scene", a list showing the remuneration to be received by those serving on the broadcasting task force being chaired by Mr. Gerry Caplan. This list reveals that the contracts which have been signed are very generous. However, one cannot help but notice that there are only two women on that task force and that the remuneration they are to receive is considerably lower than that of any of their male colleagues.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Marsden: Will the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate please table the financial arrangements so that we can see whether the reported information is correct and, if it is, could he explain why Madame Francine Côté and

Ms. Mimi Fullerton should receive any less than their male colleagues for their terms of service?

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have the specific details relating to the situation described by Senator Marsden, but I shall make every effort to obtain them for her.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, September 18, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

THE SENATE

OMISSION FROM ATTENDANCE RECORD—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I rise on a very small matter of privilege. I noticed in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for yesterday that my name is not listed on the attendance page. The fact is that I was here for almost the entire session yesterday. Perhaps the officials concerned would take the necessary action to remedy that omission.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

BANKING

COLLAPSE OF CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday I indicated that I would have some questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to the collapse of the Canadian Commercial Bank. Probably the best way to begin the questioning is to remind honourable senators that on March 29, on the recommendation of the Leader of the Government, we took steps to pass very quickly a bill with respect to the Canadian Commercial Bank. In the course of that debate we received assurances that the action taken would ensure the viability of that bank. On September 1, the Minister of State (Finance) announced the collapse of the Canadian Commercial Bank. My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: What happened?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I took the precaution of reading what I said in the Senate on March 29, and I am glad to say that my undertakings to the house were not as sweeping as some might suggest they were. I was careful to enter a caveat with respect to the opinions offered to us by the Inspector General of Banks and also with respect to the possibility of losses or recovering 100 per cent of the money advanced to the bank. In my mind, at any rate, I felt that we were running some risk, and I believe I notified the Senate of my opinion at the time. However, I admit quite freely that I recommended that the Senate pass Bill C-37, which it ultimately did, to validate the measures proposed by the government with respect to the support of the bank.

At the present time, I do not think that I would like to embark on a lengthy discussion as to what happened to the bank in the intervening period. However, I think one can say by way of shorthand reference regarding assets that appeared to have a certain value at the time the bill was put through last March, when it came to the test in the market several months later that value proved to be greater than could be realized in the market and, while there are countless angles to this very important matter that would occur to people who are asking questions about it, I think probably that is the basic reason for the trouble; that the assets do not appear to be realizable at the value that was set on them at the time, which was approximately 50 per cent. It appears now that the value that will be realized will be somewhat less than that. Someone said 30 per cent, but I suspect no one will know until the entire matter has been cleared up.

There is, however, an investigation being made in the other place into all aspects of this matter, and I suspect that many of the points that concern honourable senators will be the subject of discussion in that chamber and in committee in the other place.

I am aware, of course, that we are the masters of our own agenda, so that what we do about it is something that is within the power and discretion of the Senate to decide.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, it is true that the statements made by the Leader of the Government in the Senate at the time were not quite as dogmatic as the statements made by the Minister of State (Finance), who appeared before the committee and who answered direct questions. But surely the Leader of the Government will admit that he himself was quite wrong in his statements to the Senate on that occasion, when he said:

... all things being considered it seems to me to be the thing that we ought to do, and there seems to be a reasonable chance of the public treasury getting back all or at least a substantial portion of its financial contribution in due course.

So the Leader of the Government in the Senate at that time told us that not only was there a chance that the bank would continue as a viable institution but also that the public treasury would get back all or at least a portion of the money. Of course, he was wrong, and he has told us today that the reason he was wrong was that the assets had been improperly evaluated at the time the support package was put together. I ask him: Why did the government, the Inspector General of Banks and the officials of the Department of Finance not make a careful assessment of the value of the loan portfolio at that time? Why did the government not do that?

Senator Roblin: I would like to say that my honourable friend probably inadvertently missed out one of the caveats that I offered at the time, last March, when I said—

Senator Frith: Where is that?

Senator Roblin: On page 745 of Debates of the Senate:

... unsatisfactory loans that this bank has made stand a reasonable chance—

And then the words:

—and I go no further than that—

—with respect to getting the money back.

I want to make it clear that I recognized at that time that there was a risk, and I suggest to my honourable friend that everybody concerned recognized that there was a risk. There is no question about it, that it was not a risk-free operation, and it is a question of judgment as to how great a risk you wish to take.

Respecting the information received from the Inspector General of Banks, I said that he had reviewed the position and that he was of the opinion—and I added the words “and we hope he is right.” So, it is clear that this, from the very beginning, was a question of judgment, and it was a judgment call.

One may say whatever one wishes to say about that, and if events turn out to be less than one would hope for, one simply has to recognize that fact, and I certainly do.

Respecting my observation as to the root of the problem being the question of loans, I must make it quite clear that I am not speaking ex cathedra; in other words, I do not believe that is an opinion other than mine, and I have arrived at that from reading such evidence as has been available so far. Others may hold different views as to what the trouble was.

I am unable to answer detailed questions on this matter, and I know that my honourable friend does not expect me to, but if a Senate committee is established to examine this subject, honourable senators will have an opportunity to question those who are more familiar with the facts than I am.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I acknowledge that the Leader of the Government cannot answer all of the detailed questions, but surely this is a particular case and puts a special responsibility on the Leader of the Government, because it was he who told us that passing the bill was something that we ought to do. Surely it is reasonable now to ask him to have at hand an explanation as to why the judgment of the government was so wrong at that time.

The leader appears today to be saying that he really did not support the bill when it was brought before the Senate; he is almost saying that, on second thought, he is not sure whether the bill should have been brought before the Senate.

I wish to draw to the attention of the Leader of the Government that he did, in his opening statement, say that he was not going to deal with the matter fully because the Minister of State (Finance) would be available and would respond as the authoritative voice of the government. At page 750 of Senate Debates the minister made the following statement:

This is now a solvent bank which has, among its supporters, the federal government, provincial governments and six other chartered banks. So I think it would be a place which the public would regard as being secure and solvent and a place in which to do business.

The minister made that comment in reply to a question I had asked her.

So the government told us that that was a solvent institution, yet the Leader of the Government today says, “Don’t ask me detailed questions about it.” Can the leader not go further and tell us why the minister and he, himself, were so wrong on that occasion? I ask that because at page 751 I expressed some doubt regarding the arrangement. I said:

However, we are taking a risk. The minister will understand that to some extent it is an act of faith—

The minister then went on to make an even more categorical statement. She stated:

This bank, because of this action, is now a solvent institution. I want to make that clear and get that into the record. By coming up with a solution to the problem, this bank is a solvent institution.

It was on the basis of the assurances we had received from the Leader of the Government and the Minister of State (Finance) that the Senate moved quickly to pass the bill. Surely, the Leader of the Government has to give us more information as to why the government reached the decision that it was a solvent institution. He has to tell us what information the minister had relied upon when she told us that she was confident that it was a place for the public to do business, while only a few months later the bank collapsed. He said, “I just read somewhere that the assets had been improperly evaluated, but I really cannot tell you very much about it.” Will he not reconsider and understand that he has a responsibility to give us some information because he will be introducing a bill here shortly, so we are told, to compensate the uninsured depositors. We will have to have the information, so why does he not start now?

Senator Roblin: I want to set my honourable friend’s mind at rest about my enthusiasm in proposing the bill to the Senate. It is true that I proposed it and that I recommended it, and I back away not a tittle from that, but it was only correct, I think, for me to share with honourable senators as much as I knew or the opinions that I had about the problem in hand, which I did. Despite my own reservations, which I expressed then, and despite the reservations expressed by my honourable friend in committee when he was discussing the matter, I guess we both decided that it was a good thing to do, and we did it. It was done on the basis of the best information then available. We were not alone in that opinion.

When the minister came before the committee and gave the assurances that she did, she was relying on the best information that was available to her. I believe that one has to remember that the Governor of the Bank of Canada himself made some extraordinary, to my mind, efforts to secure the support of the financial community and the general public for the action that was being taken because he was concerned about the repercussions on the Canadian banking system. You may argue with that, but it is a question of judgment. He made that judgment at the time and the minister made her judgment.

My honourable friend really raised the important matters to be considered at the end of his statement, when he said, "We want to know more about this, if you expect us to deal with this matter properly." I quite agree with him. I think he does need that information. But you have to go to the best source.

Apart from the interesting discussions we have in this chamber, I have to admit that I am not the best source of information with respect to the problems that have arisen in connection with this bank. There is a multitude of questions about it. One has only to read the newspapers to see that every day some new point is raised that is either false or true or partly false and partly true. One does not know. In my opinion, the correct course to follow is to get the people who were involved in the decision-making process, who can answer directly as to what the facts were to their knowledge and as to their judgment of the matter, to report to legislative bodies as to what happened, what they did and what they have to say in reply to those questions. I believe that those questions are legitimate. They should be asked, but I tell my honourable friend that I do not think that this is the place to ask them. This is not the place where—and I hate to say it—you are going to get the best information. The best information will come in committee, when people like the Governor of the Bank of Canada, the Inspector General and officials of the banking system and anyone else who is considered a party to this matter will be available for people to question. I think that that is the way to go.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, this has been the approach that the government has used to avoid answering questions about this problem. It was not the Governor of the Bank of Canada nor the Inspector General of Banks who came to the House of Commons and said that this is a solvent institution; it was a member of the Government of Canada. It was not the Governor of the Bank of Canada who said that, in his view, this was a secure place in which Canadians could do business; it was a member of the Government of Canada. We have to ask the members of the government how they could have made such a mistake.

The minister has said that they acted on the best information available. That is his statement, speaking on behalf of the government. Will he tell me what information the government had with respect to the evaluation of the portfolio of assets in the Canadian Commercial Bank, and was it the best information available?

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Roblin: I think it is perfectly correct that the Governor of the Bank of Canada did not appear in the Senate and take part in the discussions when the minister was here, but his views on the matter are well known and are on the public record elsewhere.

However, I want to come back to my honourable friend's point. I do not think that he really expects me to be in a position to deal in detail with the matter, which is the preserve of the minister. If I wanted to dodge the question, I suppose I could take it as notice, but I am looking for a constructive solution, and that, in my opinion, involves an opportunity for senators or members of the House of Commons, as the case may be, to ask the people who made the statements and the people whose opinions were offered and were relied on in connection with this. In my opinion, that includes the ministry, of course.

I think the best course to follow is to ask the people who were in charge of the operation, because I believe it is clear that other members of cabinet will not have the same information and will not be able to give answers with the accuracy and precision that is required in the situation.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I am not asking the leader to tell me anything about what anyone else said; I am asking him to explain what he himself has said this afternoon. On his own authority, as Leader of the Government, he said the government acted on the best information available. I am asking: What information did the government have, which he described as the "best available," with respect to an evaluation of the portfolio of assets of the Canadian Commercial Bank? I am asking him to amplify what he said this very afternoon.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend knows perfectly well that when introducing a bill, for example, I am able to give the general principles on which the bill is based, but, even at that stage, it is a common practice in Parliament to recognize the fact that a minister or a senator, when introducing a bill, is not likely to be the expert or to have the final word on the subject. That is why we have the committee system. In committee, we can ask the people we consider to be the experts on the subject to give their opinions on which the government's policy is based, and then members can judge what they think of that. I come back to the point that that is the place to go.

If I had at my fingertips the whole of this story which I could unravel on the floor of the chamber, I certainly would not object to doing so. But it is simply a fact that I do not have the entire story and I am frank to say so. I am also frank to say that the best place to get the information he wants is in committee where the people who were offering advice and the people who were taking it, including the minister in charge, will be able to deal with any questions which arise.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I have no quarrel with the general outline of the leader's statement, but I am intrigued by the comment he himself made. He admitted that we were entitled to all the information. Then he went on to say that the government made its decision on the basis of the best information available.

Is it unreasonable for me to ask him where that information, with respect to the portfolio of assets, came from? Where did the information come from, which classed it as the best in the view of the government? The minister himself? Where did it come from? That is what I want to know. Surely, I do not need the Governor of the Bank of Canada to tell me what the minister said in the Senate this afternoon.

Senator Roblin: I am going to stick to my guns, honourable senators, because the point of the matter is that while I am able to give a general statement on government policy, which it is my duty to do, and to say in that general statement the basis on which the action was taken, which I have done, if one wishes to examine the matter in detail and find out exactly what transpired—who looked into this, what answer they gave, and what tests were applied, which are all questions which would certainly interest honourable senators—it is not reasonable to expect me to be able to answer in detail, and I tell my friend that I am not.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Who told you? Somebody must have told you.

Senator Roblin: Come to the committee. If Senator Steuart has a question to ask, I will be glad to answer him.

Senator Steuart: Who told you? That is all we want to know. Who told you that this was the best information available? Someone must have told you. You did not invent it. Who told you?

● (1420)

Senator Roblin: Oh, well, that is an easy question to answer. The minister who appeared in this chamber told me—that's who told me. If honourable senators want to know the authority for that statement, as far as I am concerned it is the departmental brief that was authorized by the minister which formed the basis of my remarks, subject to those caveats which I took the occasion to put in on my own behalf. If honourable senators want to question that minister or her officials or anybody else, then I think we could certainly make arrangements to bring that about. Such an arrangement is within our power to make.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. If this is what the minister told the Leader of the Government, did he just take that information for granted? Did he not question her? Is it a simple matter of her telling the government leader what he should say in the Senate chamber? Does the Leader of the Government come in here to parrot whatever she said? I repeat: Did he not question her? Did he not ask the source of her information?

Senator Roblin: I am in the habit, honourable senators, of taking the information that is given to me by my colleagues as being accurate and correct.

Senator Steuart: What a mistake!

Senator Roblin: I have never considered it part of my duties to act as an inquisitor, to go behind them and ask for their departmental briefs or anything of that sort. I would be very surprised if, when my honourable friend was in the cabinet in Saskatchewan, he did not find it useful to accept as being correct the statements made by his colleagues. That is certainly what I did here, and I make no apology for it.

As I have said, the minister was here and senators were in a position to ask such questions as occurred to them at that time.

I am not trying to get away from the fact that we have a serious problem here, and I am not trying to get away from the fact that honourable senators want and are entitled to information about it. I am simply trying to suggest the best way to get it.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I simply want to ask one other question. The Leader of the Government has said that in March the government acted on the best information available to it, and he has refused to identify the information or its source. I should like to ask the minister this: Does he still, on September 18, 1985, believe that that was the best information available?

Senator Roblin: When my honourable friend is in committee and has a chance to ask his own questions and to make up his own mind, I will then be interested to see his reaction to that question, because it is not a question that I have any intention of answering at the present time. It is something that will emerge from a discussion in committee.

Senator MacEachen: I think we can only become increasingly bewildered at the inability of the Leader of the Government to explain his own statements this afternoon. It would be one thing to interrogate him on what had been said by another person, but he himself is now unable to clarify what he said this very afternoon. Presumably, he now expects me to summon him to the committee to ask him whether he thinks that the best information available to the government in March was, in retrospect, and in fact the best information available. He now says that he is not going to answer my question—that I should go to committee. What a farce.

Senator Roblin: It is too bad that my honourable friend does not listen more carefully to the answers that are given in this house or to the questions that are asked. Senator Steuart asked me who gave me the information. He asked: What information was available? I said that the best information available to me was that offered me by my colleague. I am not trying to dodge that question; I have answered it. I am saying that if any honourable senator wants to go beyond that and ask my colleague the basis of the advice which she gave me, that is what he can do.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I have been informed that officials of the Toronto-Dominion Bank thought that the best information available could be obtained through their sending in 40 of their people to inspect the portfolio of the bank. They had arranged to do so and, just prior to or during the weekend when the government intervened, they were prevented from doing so on government orders.

What I want to know is this: Is that true? That is a simple question of fact. Secondly, if it is true, why did the government stop the Toronto-Dominion Bank's sending in 40 inspectors to try to obtain better information?

Senator Roblin: That is a question I think I can quite properly take as notice, and I will do so.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, could the Leader of the Government table for us, perhaps tomorrow, the good information, the better information and the best information? In that way, we in the Senate could judge the three types of information so that we would know which was really the best.

Senator Roblin: The information on which the government relied, which I have described as the best information available, will be placed before the committee for the committee to decide as to its merits.

COLLAPSE OF CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—COMMITTEE STUDY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has now referred several times to "the committee." The minister stated that there was to be a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. The Prime Minister repeated that statement. I want to know if that is the committee to which the Leader of the Government is referring, namely, that there will be a joint committee to deal with this matter and to provide the information which we are unable to obtain today.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): No, honourable senators. It is perfectly correct that the original statement referred to a joint Senate and House of Commons committee. That decision was reviewed, and in view of the fact that there was a committee of the House of Commons which had already been dealing with the first part of the problem last March and was well acquainted with some aspects of this matter, the decision was that the House of Commons should be asked to approve the referral of the matter to the standing committee of the House dealing with finance and banking matters. So it is the committee of the House of Commons that is being considered behind, let me say, the throne in the other place, in discussions as to just how this matter should be handled.

As I have said before, we are the masters of our own agenda and if honourable senators want our Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee to be seized of the CCB—and I rather suspect they do—then there is nothing to prevent our having that done.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—JUDGMENT OF INSPECTOR GENERAL AS TO SOLVENCY

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. When he tabled the bill last March, there was an addendum consisting of an agreement of intent. As a result of that addendum, is it part of the policy of the Canadian government that the people of Canada can accept without question the judgment as to solvency of the Inspector General of Banks?

[Senator Godfrey.]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, by "solvency of the Inspector General," does my honourable friend mean the reliability of the information he provides?

Senator Sinclair: I did not say that.

Senator Roblin: Then what is the question?

Senator Sinclair: When the Inspector General of Banks issues a statement that a bank is solvent, can the Canadian public accept that statement?

Senator Roblin: That is a different question from my understanding of the first one. A number of people have issued statements about solvency. The Inspector General is one, the Minister of State is another, and the Governor of the Bank of Canada is another. I rather suspect that their opinions will be examined when the committee meets, so that the committee can decide what value to place upon them.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that part of the mandate and duty of the Inspector General of Banks is to issue instructions if his investigations indicate that there is any question about solvency. Is that not correct?

Senator Roblin: Yes.

Senator Sinclair: Then, when he is satisfied as to the solvency, can the Canadian public proceed without question to accept that? Would you want to question it? My question is: Who is to question the Inspector General of Banks' assessment? Who is to question him?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I come back to my point that the Inspector General of Banks has, as his responsibility, to rule on the solvency of banks; and if he comes to the conclusion that they are not solvent, then he has to advise the minister, who, in turn, is obliged to take certain steps. That was done around the end of August, when the Inspector General decided that this bank was no longer solvent.

As for the weight to be placed on the opinions of the Inspector General—or anyone else, for that matter—that certainly has to be a matter of judgment. No one can make a categorical statement about it.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, as I understand the Agreement of Intent that was an addendum to the bill, there was a condition precedent that, before any of the $60 million was advanced by the schedule A banks, they receive in writing an assurance that the Canadian Commercial Bank was solvent. Is that correct?

● (1430)

Senator Roblin: I do not have that document in front of me, so I cannot answer, but I would not be surprised if the honourable senator is correct.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

SALE OF CANNED TUNA FISH UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Hon. Pierre De Bané: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Among other duties the Department of Fisheries and Oceans must ensure that fish bought by Canadians is fit for human consumption.

Yesterday the CBC English network reported that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, disregarding the advice of his officials, allowed the sale of canned tuna fish unfit for human consumption.

This prompted his colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to issue a warning advising Canadian consumers not to buy that canned tuna fish which was eventually taken off the market.

Does the Leader of the Government in the Senate have any comments to make about this CBC report?

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I took notice of the report that my honourable friend refers to and I have an inquiry outstanding with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to find out what he has to say about it. When I receive that information, I shall be glad to tell my honourable friend about it.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is a follow-up question to the question I put to the deputy leader yesterday. As the government leader well knows, parts of western Canada are faced with a drought and a grasshopper infestation, the worst in the past 50 years. It is also a fact that many farmers and their families are exceedingly short of money to meet current obligations—in many instances to buy necessary food, winter clothing and school books. It is a desperate situation out there. Many meetings have been held to discuss what can be done. I have been to 15 of them. Just an hour ago I received a telephone call asking me to come, along with representatives of the three political parties, to speak to a mass rally tomorrow evening in Stoughton, Saskatchewan.

My question is this: Can the minister assure those people that there will soon be an announcement by the government dealing with the major request by the farm organizations that there be paid to grain producers in the drought area the sum of $50 per seeded acre? This request is supported by many organizations and the support is virtually unanimous.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I acknowledge the force of my honourable friend's observations about the drought and grasshopper devastation in parts of western Canada. I do not know whether it comforts anybody but, thank God, so far it is limited in its area as compared to what happened in the 1930s. My province of Manitoba, northern Saskatchewan and northern Alberta have emerged well and are in pretty fair shape. However, that does not in any way take away from the problems mentioned by my honourable friend. He knows, of course, that the crop insurance plan—and I am rather proud that my province was the first to implement it—is paying out some $500 million this year to assist in the problem. I am sure that he knows that $48 million has been provided for the livestock producers and that there has been a moratorium or freeze on foreclosures under the federal farm credit organization system. Initial steps have been taken, but that is not to say that more help is not required.

The government has an emergency task force in the field at the present time. No doubt it is acquainting itself with the sentiments of meetings such as that to which my honourable friend has referred. I expect that the emergency task force will have finished its assessment of the nature of the problem and will have formulated its advice as to the things which should be done to help out, hopefully—which is a word I shall use more often these days—by the end of this month or certainly as soon as possible. When that happens the government will be able to make its final decision. I know that two weeks is a long time in the psychological atmosphere that surrounds those people at risk in the areas involved. I think it is important to have a clear understanding of the best possible solution to the problem, rather than going off with less than a perfect plan.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I was hoping for a more definitive statement than the one just given by the Leader of the Government. It sounds to me like a postponement of a decision for an undue length of time, because if the task force report is not ready until the end of the month, goodness knows how long it will take the cabinet to deal with the matter and to make an announcement.

As far as the severity of the drought is concerned, it covers about half of Saskatchewan and about half of Alberta. It is a major catastrophe, as indicated by the request of a very responsible organization, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, that there be an infusion of money totalling as much as $500 million.

I ask the minister once again: When does he think an announcement will be made? I can tell him what turns on this money. It is not only the lot of the individual farmer, which is the main concern, but there are business people going bankrupt every day. They need to know if their customers or their accounts receivable may be met to a reasonable extent through such an announcement. I would ask the Leader of the Government to be a little more definitive. Following his reply, I will have a supplementary question on the state of the livestock industry in western Canada.

Senator Roblin: I wonder if my honourable friend heard my observation that some $500 million will be available through the crop insurance system.

Senator Argue: I heard.

Senator Roblin: That is not to be sneezed at; it is a substantial contribution. Of course, part of this is paid by the farmers, and the remaining parts by the provincial and federal governments. I do not overlook the fact that it is an insurance program to which the farmers have contributed, but it proves, in my opinion, the value of it.

I have to tell my honourable friend that I doubt that I can encourage him to think that a decision will be reached before the end of this month. I think we will have to push hard to achieve that date. As far as I am able to do so, I will urge my colleagues to take speedy action on this matter. Coming from the west, I have some idea of what it means.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, perhaps I should clarify the parameters of this crop insurance. It is much less in gross income than one would receive from an average crop.

Senator Roblin: Oh, yes.

Senator Argue: It is based on 70 per cent of the average yield at a given price per bushel. What is most discouraging is that some of those farmers have had three or four crop failures in a row. By the provisions of the Crop Insurance Agreement, they are no longer insured for 70 per cent of a normal yield, but for 49 per cent of a normal yield. I hope I do not get the inference that because $500 million is paid out in crop insurance somehow it will be deducted following consideration of the request that $50 per acre be paid out to top load, so to speak, the crop insurance program. There is a virtually unanimous feeling among farm organizations and farmers in the areas concerned that this kind of pay-out is necessary, and it is.

I would also like to ask the leader about the $48 million paid to livestock producers. Of that sum $16 million went to Saskatchewan, $30 million to Alberta and $2 million to Manitoba which, as the minister said, suffered drought only in some small but important areas. $30 per cow, was paid into the Saskatchewan treasury instead of to the cattle producers. The reason I am asking that question is that, when the announcement was made, Premier Devine, the Premier of Saskatchewan, said "Our government is putting in $60 per head and we are on our way to Ottawa to get them to match it." At that time, every publication in the west remarked on the fact that it was $60 and that there might be another $60. In fact, the Saskatchewan Report, which, if you can judge by the articles in it, surely is not a partisan publication, said at the time that the producers might get $120. I do not know if this Saskatchewan Report is in the same category as the Alberta Report, but Saskatchewan had to copy Alberta, so now we have a publication called the Saskatchewan Report.

However, I am asking why John Wise, who purports to speak for the farmers, agreed to send the $30 to the Saskatchewan treasury instead of to the beef producers to whom it belongs.

Senator Roblin: If I were flip, I would probably say, for the same reason that the previous government decided to send the railway money to the railways rather than to the farmers to whom it belonged.

Senator Argue: And I hope they keep on paying it to the railways, because if they do not, the price of wheat will drop 50 cents per bushel, and the farmers cannot afford any further drop in the price of wheat. That is why it was paid to the railways.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Roblin: I am sure my friend will allow me the opportunity to attempt to answer his questions.

Senator Argue: Just don't twist it up with something else.

Senator Roblin: Why shouldn't I? You are complaining because the government is funnelling money in a certain direction. It is relevant, surely, to consider other examples of the same thing.

Senator Frith: You said you would do that if you were being flip, but you aren't.

Senator Argue: That is how the rules work.

Senator Roblin: You are a good one to know how loose the rules are—

Senator Argue: I said "the rules."

Senator Roblin: As a matter of fact, I am rather pleased that my honourable friend thinks there are some rules in this place, because sometimes some of us rather wonder whether that is the case. However, I simply want to emphasize to him that, regardless of the basis on which it is calculated, half a billion dollars from the crop insurance is a substantial contribution. My honourable friend raises an interesting point and that is that the present rules governing crop insurance deal with consecutive cumulative losses. That is a policy in the crop insurance plan that needs to be revisited. I think we should look at that again, and I think I am correct in saying that it is the intention of the minister to look into that aspect because, if we do have a sustained series of crop losses, then the cumulative aspect becomes rather important and, if it is not working equitably, then it should be changed. That is something that will be looked into.

With respect to the other question as to why the Minister of Agriculture decided to have the money distributed through the Government of Saskatchewan, I think I will ask the minister to provide me with the answer to that, because obviously it is not within my knowledge. At the same time, I will also ask him whether he made the same offer to Manitoba and Alberta.

Senator Argue: I think Alberta has done it in a cleaner fashion than has Saskatchewan. I understand they announced $45, so $45 plus $30 is $75, and they did not pretend that they were paying $60, or some other figure, and then refuse to go forward and pay that amount plus $30 to the cattle producers.

I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he is prepared to take the concerns of the Senate in this matter to the cabinet and suggest to the cabinet that, even at this late date, the Minister of Agriculture or, better still, the Prime Minister should get in touch with the Premier of Saskatchewan and say that there was a genuine misunderstanding of what the government's intention was. From the farmers' standpoint, they felt it was completely clear, but somebody must have misunderstood. The price of hay is now $120 to $150 per tonne and the farmers need the money. So, would the Prime Minister ask the Saskatchewan government to loosen up and take the money provided by the taxpayers of Canada and send it to the beef producers? Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate use his undoubtedly major influence in the cabinet to help bring this about?

Senator Roblin: I will use my influence in the cabinet to reinforce the desire of that body, and of the Members of Parliament for western Canada, to make sure that the treatment accorded to the Saskatchewan situation is the best possible. I have no hesitation in saying, however, that it will not be possible to save everybody harmless. There are just not enough resources to enable us to do that, but we can and, I think, we will do our best to mitigate the hardships, as far as we can.

As to the Government of Saskatchewan, I have to confess that I have no influence there whatsoever.

Senator Argue: I am disappointed in that answer. I would have thought that the cabinet would have some influence. The Leader of the Government in the Senate might try it in the cabinet, because I think the Saskatchewan government has virtually stolen $30 per beef cow from the beef producers of Saskatchewan, and that is shameful.

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend ought to address his charge of theft in another quarter, where no doubt he will get an interesting answer.

REFORM OF THE SENATE

GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is a question that he will have some interest in, since he had a great deal of interest in it when he sat on this side, and I am sure he has maintained that interest. Since the joint committee on Senate reform jointly chaired by Senator Molgat, and now the Macdonald Commission, after hearing from Canadians across the country, have been told so strongly, particularly in western Canada, that Canadians want meaningful Senate reform and an elected Senate, is there any chance that this government, in the foreseeable future, will bring forth some proposals for such Senate reform?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend tempts me to re-read my old speeches on this subject. In fact, I think it would be a good idea if I did so. I have to say that, in those days when I was proposing a Senate elected by proportional representation, I cannot remember my honourable friend rising in his place to tell me how right I was. In fact, I cannot remember many gentlemen or ladies in this chamber rising to tell me how right I was.

Senator Buckwold: I did.

Senator Doody: And I.

Senator Roblin: I have to say that there are audible exceptions. My colleague here is one, and Senator Frith is another; Senator Buckwold is another and there are undoubtedly more. However, I have to say that the majority of opinion was solidly aligned against any proposition of that kind. Now time flows along and changes many minds—on Senate reform and some other things—so I am going to take my honourable friend's advice to heart and if I am able to give him some comfort with respect to this matter, I shall report in due course.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I would just like to say—

Senator Roblin: You are a convert.

Senator Lucier: That is right, and while I was not originally in favour of an elected Senate, at the insistence of Senator Roblin, among others, I sat on the committee with Senator Doody and others and, after listening to the people of Canada, I have come here prepared to deal with an elected Senate. I think that, since I and other senators have reached that stage where we are now prepared to look at an elected Senate, which we were not prepared to do before, it is imperative that the government now bring it forward in order that we can deal with it.

Senator Doody: Perhaps Senator Molgat would chair another committee to deal with it.

Senator Roblin: I have a suggestion to make to my honourable friend. As I recall, the committee co-chaired by Senator Molgat reported to the Senate, but I do not think the matter was debated. If my honourable friend wishes to bring in a resolution to debate that report, it might be interesting.

SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF SENATORS AS PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Major reform consists of an accumulation of minor reforms and we have discussed on previous occasions various measures, for instance the appointment of parliamentary secretaries to assist the Leader of the Government in the Senate in coping with all of the barrage of questions that are put to him, as was the case today, and which he answered with a great deal of composure and provided some information, although not always to the satisfaction of the senators asking those questions.

I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he would consider appointing some of his colleagues as parliamentary secretaries so that when he is unavoidably absent, as he was yesterday, the Senate might get some information which the Senate is entitled to have.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): If that is my friend's idea of major reform of the Senate, it is certainly not mine. I leave this matter to the discretion of the Senate.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ACQUIRED IMMUNE DEFICIENCY SYNDROME—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he can now, or at an appropriate time, inform this chamber as to what action the federal government has taken to stem the spread of acquired immune deficiency syndrome, and in particular, to inform this chamber as to what steps have been taken to protect Canadians from contracting AIDS through contaminated blood transfusions?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I can tell my honourable colleague that the Canadian Red Cross is now putting into place a procedure which will provide for the testing of all blood samples. So that will eliminate or at least minimize the risk of anyone contracting that terrible affliction through blood transfusions. That is well in hand.

Also, the Solicitor General is looking at the problem that is expected by some to arise in connection with that disease and the Canadian prison system. That may be a matter on which he may take some steps.

I think that the best thing to do regarding this matter is to educate the public and provide accurate information as to the nature of the risk and what should be done about it.

While I cannot assure my friend at the moment that this is in hand in the Department of Health and Welfare, I think it is; however, I will inquire of that department to be certain.

BANKING

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK AND NORTHLAND BANK— SENATE STUDY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a real sense of frustration about the situation we face today in that the Senate has passed a major bill, the result of which has been a major financial disaster. Today we have been unable to receive any information from the government with respect to any of the surrounding circumstances. That is clearly the situation.

Yesterday, honourable senators, I read into the record a statement made on September 1 by the Minister of State (Finance). That read as follows:

Mrs. McDougall also announced that the government will be asking Parliament to establish a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to examine matters relevant to the Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank.

That was a commitment of a minister of the government.

Senator Flynn: That was no commitment; someone said they would do something.

Senator Frith: Not from her.

Senator MacEachen: Obviously, from this government, the best information available turns out to be false. The minister said in March that the bank was solvent, and on September 1 she said it had collapsed. On September 1 she also said that there would be a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons established. Today the Leader of the Government has told us that there will be no joint committee established. That is supposed to be trust in government and civility.

The Leader of the Government has told us today that he cannot answer any of the questions put to him, and that there will be no joint committee. Will he now tell us what he intends to do to give the Senate an opportunity to obtain this information and discharge its responsibility?

Senator Flynn: That is all repetition.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, from a parliamentarian of such long experience—

Senator Frith: Here goes the speech.

Senator Roblin: —we really do not expect these little demonstrations. I know that he is a reasoned and reasonable man; I know that he is a man of a great deal of experience. To berate me because the government has decided to move from establishing a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to establishing a committee of the House of Commons is a little unfair. I have offered the Senate an opportunity, if it needs any offer from me—which it certainly does not—to have the matter reviewed by its own committee. I think he ought to consider that suggestion.

I have told him three or four times that the Senate is the master of its agenda, and that if he wants the affairs of the Canadian Commercial Bank examined by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, there is nothing stopping him from doing that. When that examination takes place, he will be in a position to get answers to his questions.

To charge me with obstruction or with failure to disclose the facts is a little unfair. I have told him that those whom the committee summons will appear before it and he can ask them whatever questions he wishes. I think he ought to consider that as being a reasonable proposition to present to the Senate.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I can assure the Honourable Leader of the Government that I am not demonstrating, that I am quite frustrated. I really do not think that the Leader of the Government is doing justice to himself in assuming that he is incapable of answering any of these questions. I think he is capable of answering them. I have greater confidence in the leader than he has in himself, but he has declined to answer those questions.

I thought the establishment of the joint committee was a way out, but that prospect has now been removed. Now the Leader of the Government has told us that it is the responsibility of members of the opposition to move that a reference be made to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. If I move that this matter be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, will the leader support that motion to facilitate its immediate passage?

Senator Flynn: Don't be silly! You have the majority.

Senator Frith: Will he or won't he!

Senator Roblin: I have tried to listen carefully to the points my honourable friend has made. There are one or two that I am tempted to rebut, but I will deal with the last point he has made. He said that I said the opposition should refer this matter to a Senate committee. I never said that. I said the Senate was the master of its own agenda. If the Leader of the Opposition wants to know whether I am prepared to move a motion to that effect in the Senate, I can tell him that I am, and will be doing so in due course.

Senator Frith: It took just over an hour to get that.

STATUS OF NORTHLAND BANK

Hon. Hazen Argue: Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform this chamber as to the status of the Northland Bank, bearing in mind the difficulties it is in?

As the leader will understand clearly, there are many investors in that bank in western Canada, and that bank may be in a state of demise already. Is there still some hope that there can be a salvage package or a new arrangement—and I hate to use those words—or a merger with some other larger and better equipped financial institution so that that bank may remain a functioning organization?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): We are faced with exactly the same problem with that bank that we were facing with the CCB last March; exactly the same problem.

What has happened in the interval, of course, is that last August the Inspector General of Banks said that the Northland Bank was no longer a viable operation. That triggered the action the government is obliged to take under the statute.

As my honourable friend is aware, the government is trying to find somebody in the private sector willing to take on that bank under certain terms and conditions in order to allow it to continue as a viable enterprise in one form or another—that is, either independently, in amalgamation, or in some sort of association with other financial institutions.

According to my information, there has been some interest shown by more than one party, but it is quite impossible for me to say at the moment whether any of these expressions of interest will mean the salvation of the bank, which my honourable friend hopes for and which I hope for. I think the bank is in deep trouble and it will take a great deal of negotiation to get it out of trouble. I make no prophecy whatsoever as to the outcome of those negotiations.

Senator Argue: The important part of the leader's reply is that negotiations are still ongoing.

Senator Roblin: Yes.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK AND NORTHLAND BANK— SENATE STUDY—WORDING OF RESOLUTION

Hon. John M. Godfrey: With respect to the reference to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, is the Leader of the Government in the Senate prepared to consult with the Leader of the Opposition on the wording of the proposed resolution? I ask that because it is very important.

Senator Flynn: How do you know?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am going to start my consultations with the chairman of the committee because they have a number of items before them for reference. It may be that that covers this particular issue although I am not certain of it.

With respect to consulting with the Leader of the Opposition, I will always talk to him on any topic whatsoever.

Senator Walker: You are long suffering.

Senator Roblin: I am not entirely sure that he wants me to talk to him, but if he is willing to talk, then I am certainly willing.

Senator MacEachen: I would be delighted to talk.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

APPOINTMENT OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, when I sat on the other side, time and time again I raised the question of when members of the board of directors of the Cape Breton Development Corporation would be appointed. However, I was not too successful in receiving an answer. Now that I have been sitting on this side for the past year, may I ask the Leader of the Government if there was an announcement made yesterday or today as to when we are going to have a board of directors appointed? Are those in charge still having their meetings in their bathrooms looking at themselves and talking to each other rather than to board members?

Senator Hicks: You are no more successful on that side than you were on this side.

Senator Muir: I shall ignore that comment from the distinguished senator on that side.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Mary Tudor had the word "Calais" engraved on her heart and I think the name of Senator Muir is going to be engraved on mine. I do not have an answer to that question yet. I shall make another valiant effort to try to get the answer he seeks.

SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, while the Leader of the Government is in Cape Breton finding the answer to Senator Muir's question, will he try to get an answer to the question I asked months ago about the Sydney Steel Corporation?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Yes, I shall. I should tell my honourable friend something that he will be interested in, namely, that further measures in connection with the Cape Breton situation may well be possible. The subject is under discussion and we are not completely satisfied that we have the best formula to help that community recover itself.

Senator MacEachen: That is what I said earlier.

Senator Roblin: No, it is not.

Senator MacEachen: I am glad you caught on.

Senator Roblin: I accepted my honourable friend's statement from the beginning, but I told him that we had to try. We had some successes. Some new factories have gone up in that neck of the woods.

Senator MacEachen: No one has seen them. They are invisible.

Senator Doody: They're safer that way.

Senator Roblin: I have to admit that there is many a slip between an announcement and a factory but, in any case, we think that there is going to be one. I will try to ascertain an answer to my honourable friend's question about the iron works.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

SALE OF CANNED TUNA UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government and it is a follow-up on the question by Senator De Bané with reference to Starkist tuna. Obviously, the minister was facing three problems: the first, he said, was to save that factory; the second, to prevent children and older people in Canada from being poisoned by bad food; and, the third, to preserve the reputation of Canadian food exports. He could have achieved all three objectives, but he chose the worst possible course for all three. He did not save that factory; in fact, he has destroyed it because its reputation is now in shreds. He has put on the shelves of supermarkets food that is dangerous to the health of Canadians not to mention cats. As far as the outside clientele of Canada for our fish, which is a major export earning us $2 billion a year is concerned, they will never trust a Canadian product again unless the person resigns who took the incredible course of rejecting two recommendations by qualified experts saying that this food was dangerous and seeking a third who would be compliant by saying that it was safe.

Senator Flynn: Very good speech!

Senator Gigantès: Will the Leader of the Government convey to the minister that there are a lot of people out there who dislike having their health endangered because of such monumental errors in common sense?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think I may regard that as an expansion of the question originally asked by Senator De Bané and I will give my honourable friend an expanded answer.

[Translation]

Senator Gigantès: When putting forth his question could the Leader of the Government also ask the Minister of Fisheries whether he has the fishes or Pisces as his astrological sign.

[English]

DECISION OF MINISTER RE LICENCE—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate has said that he is going to get an accurate answer with regard to this matter. I wonder if while he is doing that he could get an answer to another question relative to another decision of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Honourable senators will recall that on June 27, 1985 Senator Thériault asked a question about the transfer by the minister of a licence from one fishing vessel to another over the objections of officials of the department. I asked if the Leader of the Government would ascertain what considerations the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans detected which brought him to the conclusion which was contrary to that of the officials in his department. The Leader of the Government took my question as notice because he wanted to give an absolutely correct reply—those were his words. He is now taking another question as notice. Will we have to wait as long for an answer to the question raised today as we have had to wait for an answer to the question raised on June 27, 1985? I realize that we were in recess, but I had hoped for an answer to that important question yesterday.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not know whether my honourable friend would be interested in giving me any credit for being psychic but I have his answer here on my desk and as soon as Question Period is over and I am allowed to table delayed answers I will let him have it because we always try to deliver the goods. I would remind my honourable friend that he asked his question at the tail end of the last session, and he gets his answer on the first day that I am present. I hope that that will be counted for merit somewhere along the line.

Senator Stewart: I think that this is an admirable precedent which I hope the Leader of the Government will follow consistently in the future.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday there appeared a story in the Gazette dealing with the subject of bilateral trade with the United States. The story quotes the press secretary, Mr. Fox, as suggesting that the Prime Minister, Mr. Mulroney, is actively seeking, and these are his words, "a great negotiator to head the Canadian team that will discuss free trade with the United States."

This summer I was one of your representatives on a special committee of the Senate and House of Commons to look into bilateral questions of trade. There was a unanimous recommendation by members of our side and the government side, excepting members of the NDP, that there would not be negotiations but that there would be discussions and the results of those discussions would be brought back to Parliament for further deliberations.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate now advise us as to whether or not the unanimous recommendations of the Conservative and the Liberal Parties on this question are now being sidestepped and that the government now intends to proceed to direct negotiations for a comprehensive agreement? Are they seeking to avoid Parliament on this question?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am glad to tell my friend that the question of trade with the United States has been receiving a good deal of attention by the cabinet in the last little while. I expect that a statement will be made on this matter fairly soon although I do not have a date in mind. If this statement is structured in the way I anticipate it will be, I think most of my friend's fears will be set to rest.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers to questions.

STATUS OF WOMEN

SENIOR GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS—REPLACEMENT OF FEMALE APPOINTEES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on May 30 last by the Honourable Senator Marsden regarding senior government appointments—replacement of female appointees:

In conversations with Task Force staff, it was learned that efforts were made to include women on both the Private Sector Advisory Committee and on the various special Study Teams. Most of the women who were invited to participate were unable to accept. This was, in part, because invitations were made within a relatively short time before Study Teams were expected to begin work. Also, given the need for regional representation, most potential team members were required to relocate to Ottawa within a fairly short period of time. The fact that team members or their companies or organizations are expected to donate their time may also be a contributing factor.

With respect to the final seven Study Teams still to be created, the Minister has received assurances from the Hon. Deputy Prime Minister that intensive efforts are being made to ensure adequate female representation. However, to date, very few women who were invited will be able to accept. Again, apparently part of the problem is the short notice. Study Teams being set up now will be expected to work full-time through the summer and be prepared to report in the early fall. The announcement concerning the membership of the new Study Teams is to be made in the near future.

Although this matter is of great concern, it is hoped that despite the low female representation, issues of particular relevance to women will be incorporated in all aspects of the work of the Task Force. Given this Government's commitment to improving the situation of women, the Task Force will carefully consider the impact on Canadian women of all Task Force recommendations.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 20 last by the Honourable Senator Olson, respecting agriculture and the sugar-beet industry—government policy.

(The answer follows:)

The Government has been reviewing a sugar/sweetener policy. It intends to announce a new policy in the near future that will be acceptable to farmers, processors, consumers and industrial users of sugar.

The processing of the 1984 crop will continue until the end of September. All equipment will be maintained and kept in place for potential use in 1986. Packaging and distribution of bulk sugar will continue. Bulk sugar will be shipped in from Vancouver and stored on site in the silos.

In the fall, a work sharing program will begin in order to maintain as many of their personnel as possible on payroll so they will have a full workforce available for the 1986 crop. Although they are trying to minimize the employment loss, there will be some lay-offs.

The plant in Winnipeg will be functioning normally; an estimated 24,000 acres of beets have been planted in Manitoba.

AVIATION DISASTERS

LOSS OF AIR-INDIA AIRCRAFT—TOKYO AIRPORT EXPLOSION—POSSIBLE ACTS OF TERRORISM

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 25 last by the Honourable Senator MacEachen regarding aviation disasters—loss of Air-India aircraft—Tokyo airport explosion—possible acts of terrorism.

The Air India investigation is progressing systematically but there has as yet been no determination as to the cause of the crash. An Indian investigation team spent ten days in Canada in early August and all Canadian agencies cooperated fully in the visit. An Indian Commission of Inquiry is expected to begin public hearings in New Delhi in early October. Canada, along with Boeing Aircraft Co., the U.S. National Transportation Safety Board and Air India will be represented as interested parties.

There were reports in the Indian media several months ago that some Sikhs in Canada were undergoing military training and arms were being shipped to the Punjab. These allegations were investigated by the Canadian authorities, but no evidence of such activities was ever uncovered.

During the past few months, the Indian High Commission in Ottawa has, on several occasions, communicated its concern to the Department of External Affairs over possible threats from Sikh extremists. In each case, the Department of External Affairs conveyed the information to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service for appropriate action. The Government of Canada is taking the Indian government's concerns about possible terrorist activities seriously and Canadian security agencies are investigating all such reports thoroughly.

LABOUR

FAIR WAGES AND HOURS OF LABOUR ACT—GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE TOWARDS PROVISIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 26 last by the Honourable Senator Hastings, regarding labour—Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act—Government attitude towards provisions.

The United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America has commenced proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta, and the Federal Court of Canada, Trial Division, as a result of a dispute involving the application of the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act to the Olympic Speedskating Oval Construction Project in Calgary. Therefore, it would be improper for me to make any comment on this matter in view of the fact that it is now before the courts for judicial determination.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

ALLEGED ABSENCE OF MINISTER FROM ADVISORY COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 27 last by the Honourable Senator Argue, respecting alleged absence of Minister from Advisory Committee meetings—Canadian Wheat Board.

The Advisory Committee to the Canadian Wheat Board was one of the first groups which the Minister met with following his appointment as Minister. He also met with the Committee on July 8, 1985 to discuss Feed Grain Policy, as part of his consultations on this subject.

The Canadian Wheat Board Act states that the Committee's function is to advise "the Board", not the Minister. Mr. Mayer has very close contact with the Canadian Wheat Board and the latter is very diligent in bringing forth the opinions of the Committee.

Mr. Mayer feels that the Committee should be allowed to deal independently with issues during their meetings and then bring their concerns to the Board's attention and, in turn, to the attention of the Minister. The Minister receives the minutes of each meeting, which he carefully considers.

The Minister feels that meetings with the Committee are valuable, and he has undertaken to meet with them when appropriate. Between meetings, the Committee can contact the Minister directly through correspondence or can provide advice through the Canadian Wheat Board.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

DECISION OF MINISTER RE LICENCE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 27 last by the Honourable Senator Stewart respecting the decision of Minister—Licence—Fisheries.

(The answer follows:)

The Minister's officials reviewed the proposal by Captain Snarby for a licence transfer from the M/V Martin & Philip and a short-term charter of a foreign vessel to replace the Martin & Philip from a policy perspective. The proposal did not meet some of the requirements of the established policy and therefore Departmental officials recommended against it. Following representations from Captain Snarby, the Minister indicated that if the proposal was resubmitted and aligned as closely as possible with the short-term charter policy that it would be reviewed again. The Minister subsequently approved the licence transfer and short-term charter making the following exceptions to the policy:

Provision 1

"The policy applies to vessels permanently removed or rendered unserviceable for a period of four months or more (eg. sinking, fire)." The M/V Martin & Philip had not been fished since 1980; it was tied up in Shelburne, N.S., while under seizure by the Nova Scotia Loan Board. Reports indicated the vessel had been vandalized and its engine block possibly cracked.

Whether or not a refit for the vessel would have taken more than four months was a moot point and would have required appraisals from shipyards. Captain Snarby was given the benefit of the doubt that the refit would have taken more than four months.

"The chartered vessel is to be of similar catching capacity and must operate on the same fishing plan as the vessel being replaced. The catch must also be delivered to the same plant or plants as the vessel being replaced." When the M/V "Martin & Philip" actually fished it was plagued with technical difficulties. Its annual catches were low, and certainly less than what could be expected from the M/V Osprey. Some industry people have argued that the M/V Osprey has more catching capacity than the M/V Martin & Philip. While this assessment has some validity it was made abundantly clear to Captain Snarby that there would be no support for any requests from him for more allocations of fish if more were needed to feed the greater catch capacity of the M/V Osprey. Furthermore, if Captain Snarby was able to negotiate a transfer of enterprise allocations from other offshore interests, other Canadian offshore companies must be given the first right of refusal. The latter measures were included as conditions of licence and were considered sufficient to satisfy provision 4 of the policy.

The requirement to land at the same plant was waived because a licence transfer was also involved. Moreover, most of the enterprise allocations available for the M/V Osprey were in NAFO areas 2 and 3 well north of the replaced vessel's landing port of Lockeport, Nova Scotia.

While, approval of the charter did involve certain exemptions from the existing short-term Charter Policy the following conditions were placed on the licence: all production would be marked "Product of Canada", the vessel would be Canadian crewed; and it would have last call on temporary transfers of enterprised allocations.

CROWN CORPORATIONS DISSOLUTION AUTHORIZATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William M. Kelly moved the second reading of Bill C-60, to authorize procurement of the dissolution of certain Crown corporations and to amend or repeal other Acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to move second reading of Bill C-60.

Having looked at the list of items discussed this afternoon from banks through tuna fish, grasshoppers, AIDS, steel companies, and back to tuna, it seems difficult to expect close attention to what I have to say about Bill C-60, but I will try to hold your attention for no more than eight or nine minutes.

Senator Flynn: It can only improve.

Senator Frith: Over what—your interventions?

Senator Flynn: Over the questions.

Senator Frith: Or the answers.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, the Financial Administration Act requires that parliamentary authorization must be obtained before a crown corporation may be dissolved. The purpose of the proposed Crown Corporations Dissolution Authorization Act is to seek Parliament's authorization for the shareholders of four inactive crown corporations to procure the dissolution of their respective corporations, as well as to carry out all acts or things which are incidental to the closing-out of the affairs of these four companies.

The crown corporations and the holders of the shares concerned are the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Ltd., which is the responsibility of the Minister of Finance; St. Anthony Fisheries Limited, which is the responsibility of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and other persons holding shares in trust for Her Majesty; Societa a responsibilita limitata Immobiliare San Sebastiano, which shares are held in trust for Her Majesty; and Uranium Canada, Ltd. which is the responsibility of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Honourable senators, in the case of Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Ltd., the company's mandate is "to collect monies due to it from the sale of eight steamships to Cuban interests."

Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Ltd. was incorporated under the Dominion Companies Act in 1927 to provide a steamship to the West Indies. The corporation has been active since 1958 when its fleet of ships was sold to the Banco Cubana of Havana. In 1959, the corporate management was transferred to federal government officials for the purpose of collecting the proceeds from the sale. An irrevocable letter of credit, issued through the Bank of America, to cover the final principal payment was not honoured due to the passing of the Cuban Assets Control Regulations by the U.S. government in July of 1963. That is coincident, I believe, with the missile crisis.

The sole purpose of maintaining the company is to collect the outstanding principal plus interest totalling approximately $900,000 as of December 31, 1984.

Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Ltd. is a scheduled Part I corporation with no full-time employees. It is an agent of Her Majesty. The Minister of Finance is the registered holder of all share certificates. The appropriate minister is the Minister of Transport.

The corporation will only be wound up once Transport Canada's legal counsel has completed steps to ensure that the present obligation owing to Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Ltd. from the sale of its steamships would become an obligation enforceable by Her Majesty. This will necessitate a written agreement from the Bank of America that it would reassign the payment of the obligation to Her Majesty if Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Ltd. were dissolved. I understand that is close to being completed.

In the case of St. Anthony Fisheries Limited, SAFL was established in 1982 to re-open and operate, but not own, a dormant fish-processing plant at St. Anthony, Newfoundland. It was agreed that the plant's owner, Fishery Products—now merged into Fishery Products International Limited—would market SAFL production during the 1982 season.

The plant is now owned and operated by Fishery Products International Limited, FPIL, the Newfoundland restructured company. Because FPIL has now taken over operation of the St. Anthony plant, St. Anthony Fisheries Limited is an inactive corporation. It continues to exist, however, in order to collect arrears in the amount of approximately $1.4 million from FPIL with respect to sales made on behalf of St. Anthony Fisheries Limited by Fishery Products. The corporation will not be wound up until these arrears are collected. I understand that will be in about six months.

I now turn to the Societa a responsibilita limitata—SRL—Immobiliare San Sebastiano—

Senator Bosa: Sebastiano.

Senator Kelly: I was hoping for a nod from Senator Bosa indicating that I was not doing too badly on pronunciation.

In 1982, the Department of External Affairs acquired SRL Immobiliare San Sebastiano as a means of purchasing the official residence of the Canadian ambassador to the Holy See in Rome, Italy.

Senator MacEachen: The minister holds the shares; it is not the department.

Senator Kelly: The residence is the sole asset of the company. It is my understanding that that corporation had the asset of the residence, and the more appropriate way to purchase was through the purchase of the company rather than the residence directly, and I believe it was a good transaction.

Senator MacEachen: We hope so.

Senator Kelly: Although I did not have much confidence in the perpetrators, it worked out all right.

Senator MacEachen: It is a company residence, and the shares were held by the minister, not by the Department of External Affairs.

Senator Doody: The minister in right of the Crown?

Senator Kelly: The share in the company.

It is now proposed to change the company into a limited partnership and, subsequently, to see the property donated to the Crown. Acceptance of the gift by Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada must be authorized by the Government of Italy pursuant to Article 10 of the Italian Civil Code. I understand this matter is in hand.

Finally, I will deal with Uranium Canada, Ltd. which is a parent crown corporation listed in Part I of Schedule C to the Financial Administration Act. It was created in 1971 pursuant to Appropriation Act No. 1, 1971 and the Atomic Energy Control Act with a mandate to purchase $29.5 million worth of uranium concentrates on behalf of the Crown from Denison Mines Ltd. over the period 1971 to 1975.

During the period 1971 to 1980, Uranium Canada, Ltd. sold or made loans of portions of the stockpile and returned some $114 million to the Crown. During this time, however, uranium prices changed dramatically, and Canada's known reserves increased dramatically as well primarily due to the discovery of large, rich deposits in Saskatchewan. Therefore, the need for a Canadian government stockpile or government support of Canadian mines disappeared. In May 1981, the government transferred ownership of the remaining stockpile, having a book value of $96 million, to Eldorado Nuclear Ltd. and directed the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to wind up Uranium Canada, Ltd.

[Senator Kelly.]

However, at that time, the company was charged, along with five other uranium companies, with offences under the Combines Investigation Act. The matter was not settled until December 15, 1983, when the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that Uranium Canada, Ltd., as an agent of the Crown, was immune from the terms of the Combines Investigation Act. Uranium Canada is now dormant, having no operations, no staff and assets totalling $9. The company's affairs are conducted on an as-required basis by public service employees, and its resource requirements are minimal. There being no further use for the corporation, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is requesting the authority of Parliament to dissolve it.

• (1520)

I would say, honourable senators, that, having participated in a review of crown corporations over the past year and having discovered over 400 of them, including subsidiaries, this move in the direction of tidying up is, I think, important. I urge the careful and rapid approval of this bill.

On motion of Senator Sinclair, debate adjourned.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Third Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented in the Senate on 27th June, 1985.—
(Honourable Senator Godfrey.)

Hon. John M. Godfrey: As honourable senators are aware, a couple of years ago the House of Commons established a committee under the chairmanship of our esteemed colleague, Senator Lefebvre, which committee brought in an interesting report that was adopted by the House of Commons on a trial basis. It has been two years since those recommendations were acted upon and, from what I have heard, they have worked well. What disturbed me was that there was no suggestion from anyone in the Senate—including myself—that we should study those recommendations to consider whether we could improve upon our own procedures. With that in mind, I asked three questions of Senator Molgat on three of the recommendations contained in those reports.

The first was the recommendation that, after every speech, there be a ten-minute interchange in the form of questions, short speeches and so on. I will quote what Senator Molgat said about that recommendation when he presented the report of the committee. He said that the committee, —recognizing that we do not work with any kind of time allocation in any case or at any time, that our rules are extremely flexible at all times, that in reality senators control themselves, that there is no attempt to order too closely the procedures, and that in fact the system was working well, the committee's recommendation is that a change was not necessary, so the proposal was not proceeded with.

Honourable senators, I have no fundamental objection to the conclusion that our system is working reasonably well. Yet during the course of our deliberations—and I am not quite sure how much I can disclose because of their being held in camera—it was said several times that “if it is not broken, don’t mend it.” I do not agree with that. I do not think that we should wait until something is broken before we mend it. I think that we should look at everything and see whether we cannot improve matters in some way.

The committee had come to the conclusion that there was no necessity to amend our rules, since we do have an opportunity to comment upon a speech in the guise of questions. Having to remember to ask a question simply to justify the intervention appears to me, at least, to be a farce. Why should we go through this sort of artificial procedure?

Hon. Charles McElman: Would the honourable senator permit a question at this stage?

Senator Godfrey: Absolutely.

Senator McElman: Senator Godfrey has quoted briefly from the in camera deliberations of the committee. He quoted the phrase “if it is not broken, don’t fix it,” which has a different connotation from the actual comment that was made. The comment made was to the effect that, if it works, don’t fix it.

Senator Godfrey: I am not quite sure, but my recollection was something to that effect, having read the transcript in the last couple of days. All right; if it works, don’t fix it—but if it will work better, and that is all I am saying, why not improve the procedure?

As far as I am concerned, and I have been here 12 years, it seems superfluous that a senator should rise to ask: Would the senator accept a question? The senator always replies in the affirmative, and then we carry on. I think that that is useless verbiage. I am going to establish a new principle—I am simply going to get up and ask my question. In doing that, I do not mean to be rude, but I know that he will concede to my asking a question, and I will save a little bit of Hansard each time I do so. I hope other honourable senators will follow the same procedure.

The second question I put to Senator Molgat had to do with the one and a half minute speech that is provided for in the rules of the House of Commons. I asked that question at the suggestion of Senator Flynn. I happened to have mentioned to him that I was going to raise these questions and I thought that, with the sponsorship of Senator Flynn, this one might have some chance of being seriously considered. However, this question had two arguments against it. One of those arguments—and I have to say that I think it is probably the only valid argument—has to do with timing. This provision would involve our Speaker in timing these speeches and, traditionally in this chamber, we have never been timed. Any honourable senator can speak as long as he wishes to. However, had we adopted this recommendation, I do not think it would be necessary to adopt the 90 second limitation as well.

The other argument against this recommendation was that the Senate has a system which differs from that of the House of Commons; namely, that if we wish to give a speech, we give notice of an inquiry and proceed. That, however, is a cumbersome procedure. I might say that I think it would be preferable, at least on a trial basis, to do what is done in the House of Commons.

The third question that was considered was that of giving to committees the power to consider anything that comes under their purview. All of the recommendations that I have seen having to do with reform concentrate on this matter of giving to the committees more independence.

Honourable senators, as far as I am concerned, the main justification for the Senate is the committee work that it does. I really feel that we should establish a practice whereby the committees have more independence. Take, for example, the National Finance Committee, which, under the guise of considering the estimates, would investigate one department a year. That committee did not come to the Senate chamber to ask whether it could look at the Department of Manpower and Immigration or DREE—it simply went ahead and did it, and it worked. Senator Everett ingeniously thought that one out. The members of the committee discussed and decided upon which things they would take on in an investigative way. Senator Doody thought that there was something wrong with that. He took over as chairman of the subcommittee and thought that it should not proceed without a specific reference from the Senate. I must say that I prefer the way in which Senator Everett operated.

I am somewhat concerned about the public perception of the Senate. We talk a great deal about trying to improve or to reform things, but we never do anything about it. We say “So long as it is working reasonably well, okay, let’s not do anything.” That is what concerns me. We should be more willing to try to improve things and to try things out.

My final point is that the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders operates in camera. I am not a member of the committee, but I was present at the two meetings that considered this. I thought it had been agreed at those meetings that the report of the committee would contain the reasons as to why they were recommending turning down these three items. There was some discussion of the reasons that had been advanced and the fact that they should be included in the report. However, in the end—and I do not recall that the committee actually approved this—it was decided to substitute what Senator Molgat did, which was to report verbally rather than have it in the form of a comprehensive written report.

I believe it should be a matter of general practice that when a committee, meeting in camera, makes recommendations, those recommendations should be justified by reasons, which they usually are. I noticed that on the same day that Senator Molgat spoke, there was a report presented giving the reasons for the report. In my view, those reasons should be contained in the report and should be approved by the committee, and so on—because when Senator Molgat made his speech, he became a little confused, as he later admitted.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to Senator Godfrey on the third point which he has raised.

I believe this third point referred to what I would call the "freedom" of the Senate committees to deal, on their own initiative, with the issues which come under their respective areas of responsibility as defined in our rules.

So he is attacking the section of our rules which defines the areas of responsibility of the various committees under the heading "Committees".

As Chairman of the Senate committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, I will refer to the section dealing with this committee, on page 24 of our rules. If I understood well Senator Godfrey's intention, he is calling into question paragraph 1) of this section, which reads as follows:

Le comité sénatorial des affaires sociales, des sciences et de la technologie, . . . auquel sont déférés . . .

In English, the wording is even stronger.

To which shall be referred, if there is an order of the Senate to that effect, bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to Social Affairs, Science, and Technology generally, including:

Well, the list of matters is fairly long, it includes Veterans Affairs, Indian and Inuit Affairs, etc.

At the present time, in view of this text, the committee studies a subject only if it is referred to it, if there is an order of the Senate to that effect.

In Senator Godfrey's proposal, the committee would be under no obligation to deal with all of that. It would only have the "freedom" to do so.

[English]

There was only freedom to study any one of those subjects, but there was no obligation on the part of the committee; whereas there is an obligation on the part of the committee to study any question relating to those subject matters which are referred by the Senate. That is the real meaning of the proposal. The proposal is not that the committee would have any obligation to cover all those fields. It has the freedom to study any one of those subjects if it feels that there is some justification for such a study. That is the meaning of the proposal.

Senator Godfrey: The meaning of the proposal was that it was for the committee to decide, and I emphasize "the committee." The way it works now, it is usually the chairman, in cahoots with the powers-that-be, who decides what the committee should do, arranges to get a reference, and so on.

I believe the committee itself should have the power, on its own initiative, to start an investigative inquiry. The Senate should, of course, reserve the power to order the committee to commence an investigative study. We have heard about that in connection with the Canadian Commercial Bank. There are two ways of handling that: by a pre-study of any bill that is introduced, or by specific reference.

[Senator Godfrey.]

I would say that giving the committee more power would include having the members of the committee elect their own chairman, and not have the chairman selected by the powers-that-be. Members of the committee know who is the most attentive, the most knowledgeable and who would make the best chairman, and, as far as I am concerned, they are the ones who should be choosing the chairman. I know that we go through the motions of voting for a chairman, but everyone knows that the fix is in.

Senator Tremblay: The committee, such as the one I have just mentioned, would have the freedom and the power to study anything relating to those subject matters. When I look at that list, I have the feeling that that freedom, or that power, does not mean anything if, at the same time, a committee has not the means of making a sound study of those subjects—which brings us to the question of the budget and other related matters. To have the committee merely talk about those subjects, as it would be free to do, according to the honourable senator's proposal, would not mean very much if the means were not, at the same time, given to the committee. If that is the case, I suppose the committee should have to come to the Senate and ask for the means—

Senator Frith: Hear, hear.

Senator Tremblay: —to go far enough in its study; otherwise it would simply be a question of talking for talking's sake.

Senator Godfrey: We have just had a perfect example of how well our rules work, because the senator did not really ask a question then. Of course, there are certain times when a committee could look at something without its costing a cent. At one time we considered a change in the rules, which I blocked, because I did not consider that it went nearly far enough. I believe we discussed the point that if a farm organization arrived in Ottawa and the Agriculture Committee wanted to hear them, then it had the right to go ahead and hear them. It was not going to cost the committee anything. However, I blocked it because I did not think it went far enough. I thought that the matter should have been referred to the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. I thought the chairman of the committee should consider it.

If it is going to cost anything, of course, the matter should then go before the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration—no one is arguing that point—so that there is some curb at that point.

But if a committee comes up with a good proposal, I am sure there would be no difficulty with the Internal Economy Committee. But certainly they would have to have any budget approved by that committee. I believe that the way it is proposed is the way it works in the House of Commons.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I rise to support the proposition put forward by Senator Godfrey. Indeed, he is right that in the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance we did establish the concept of having a fairly wide ambit of freedom to examine anything we wanted to in relation to government spending or to government economic policy. That arose by virtue of the fact that the spending estimates are referred to the finance committee for examination. Of course, the estimates range over just about every aspect of government spending and government economic policy. On that basis, once the estimates were referred to us we took it as authority to look at any part of government expenditures. Indeed, we made several major examinations that went on for more than a year and into the period of the following estimates. We would make interim reports on the estimates in order that Appropriation bills could be passed and then we would carry on with our examination of the particular department we were reviewing at the time. I believe that this system worked well.

It is true, as Senator Godfrey has said, that on occasion we could review aspects of spending with our own staff and within the competence of the senators sitting on committee. However, when we were looking at entire departments such as public works, we required expertise and we had to spend some money. We did not have the specific permission of this body to examine public works. We took that permission out of the reference of the estimates to the committee. When we required money, we had to go before the Internal Economy Committee and justify our proposed expenditures.

I believe that Senator Godfrey is on the right track. Committees of this body should be able to examine anything that comes within the ambit of their authority under the rules. We should encourage that sort of examination at the behest of the committee and not make it necessary for committee chairmen to come before this house and explain what they want to do. We are totally protected because where it involves expenditure of money, the committee must obtain approval for that expenditure from the Internal Economy Committee. I think the Rules Committee should re-examine this matter.

I also agree with Senator Godfrey's point that when a committee reports on meetings held in camera it ought to include in the report reasons as to why the committee has come to its decision. I have not read the report and I do not know whether that is the case with respect to this particular issue and the other issues raised by Senator Godfrey. I disagree with one of Senator Godfrey's recommendations, that a senator may rise and ask a question of another senator without asking permission.

Senator Godfrey: At the end of the speech. Never in the middle.

Senator Everett: I thought the honourable senator had meant at any point in the speech.

Senator Godfrey: Oh, no.

Senator Everett: Then we agree on everything.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think it would be useful to put on the record a point arising from one of the positions taken by Senator Everett. That is the point that committees should be free to study subjects that are within their mandates in that they are controlled by the fact that they must go before the Internal Economy Committee if they require any money to carry out their studies. During the six or seven years that I have been on the Internal Economy Committee, I have found the problem to be that, if the Senate has given an order for a study or if, as in this case, the Senate permits through its rules those kinds of studies to be initiated, the Internal Economy Committee is in a very awkward position if it wants to refuse any funds requested. Committees have received references with the power to engage professional assistance, the chairman appears before the Internal Economy Committee, the matter is then referred to the subcommittee on budgets—and I am sure that Senator Barrow will support me in what I say—and the committee chairman in the final analysis has said to the subcommittee, "Look, you cannot tell me that I cannot have the money. You can talk a little about how much I am asking for, but the Senate has said that I can do this. And it is your job to provide the money." In my experience, the solution is not quite as simple as Senator Everett has described it.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I strongly support Senator Frith in his position. It is a most delicate point which may lead to situations where the Internal Economy Committee, through its control of the purse strings, if you wish, is in a position to exercise a sort of control over the amount of work or the extent of the work that a committee may carry out under the mandate. There has been no situation, to my knowledge, where positions were taken too strongly, although we have probably come close to it in several instances. Indeed, it is a very delicate point which should be reviewed most thoroughly and spelled out as thoroughly as possible.

Senator Godfrey: Of course, the same problem exists in the House of Commons.

Senator Lafond: That is no excuse.

Senator Godfrey: I know, but we can learn from their situation, and just because it is implemented in the House of Commons, it does not mean that it is wrong or bad.

Senator Frith: Or good.

Senator Godfrey: Or good, but we can learn from their experience. Even under the latest proposals, which I have not seen in writing, these committees have to defer to the Internal Economy Committee on matters of money. Probably one of the weaknesses of what I am suggesting is that the Internal Economy Committee would have a little more power than it has now. Under the present situation when a committee receives a mandate, the chairman can say, "You have to give us the money, because the Senate has told us we can go ahead."

Of course, a committee could always appeal a decision of the Internal Economy Committee to the Senate. However, I am not sure of the procedure.

In fact, a perfect example of how that rule in the House of Commons works in the Senate is that we have had a debate similar to what they formally provide for in their rules, but since we have had no questions, we have decided that we do not need it.

Senator Frith: In the House of Commons, you would not be able to speak three times in the same debate.

Senator Doody: He probably would not be able to speak once.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Molgat speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, in some ways the debate we have just had is a replica of the debate we had in committee. I think it was an excellent and extremely useful debate, and I want to thank those who have participated here. With regard to Senator Godfrey's comments, there was very extensive discussion on these matters in committee. I believe he attended every one of the committee meetings although he was not a member of the committee, and he participated fully in the discussions. The vote in the committee was unanimous—

Senator Godfrey: No, on division. I was there.

Senator Molgat: But you are not a member of the committee.

Senator Godfrey: Of course, you are correct.

Senator Molgat: That does not mean that we cannot re-open that matter at some other time. I think this is an example of the flexibility and the advantage that we in the Senate have in our methods of operation. Senator Godfrey made four suggestions in his speech which he thought the committee might look at. The committee looked at all of them in depth. It accepted one of them which is now part of the recommendations made to this house. That is the recommendation that on any matter affecting provincial governments the chairman of the committee ought to contact the provincial governments and allow them the opportunity to appear, if they so wish, and make presentations before the committee. This exercise shows how easily we can amend our rules and how we can adapt to the conditions when we think it is necessary to do so.

The reason why there were no explanations given in the report is that, as you will recall, this report was presented at the very end of the session. In fact, the last meeting of the committee was held the day before the session was to end. It was felt that we should make a quick report to the Senate, and there was no opportunity to call a further meeting of the committee. Honourable senators will know that there are some timing problems in calling meetings of committees, and the suggestion was made that the steering committee ought to proceed with preparing a report and tabling it in the Senate. Therefore the steering committee agreed that the report ought to be a simple statement of the fact; that we could then have a debate in the Senate and I would explain the discussion we had had. There was no attempt to hide anything. For that matter, the transcripts of all of the meetings of the committee are available to all senators. We send the transcripts to every member of the committee and to any other member of the Senate who expresses a desire to receive them.

If there are any other suggestions by senators for changes in rules, the committee would be prepared to consider those suggestions. I move the adoption of the report.

Senator Godfrey: I suppose I must put my remarks in the form of a question. Is it not true that the committee did not consider my suggestion about asking the provincial authorities to appear before the committee? I understand that that was passed in the other place without being referred to our committee. What was considered was this question of an alternative to Royal Assent, but our committee did not consider my suggestion. I think the matter was put before a meeting of committee chairmen and perhaps my honourable friend is confused.

Senator Molgat: I may be wrong; I may have forgotten what transpired but I am prepared to check my record. I believe I am correct that the committee did consider the matter of provincial representation and came back with a recommendation that we not change the rules but that we accept, as a matter of principle in this house, that that be done in future and, in fact, I believe I specifically asked the Director of the Committees Branch to make sure that all committee clerks be alerted to warn their chairmen whenever they saw the possibility of such a circumstance arising. That was a decision of this Senate, as a result of a recommendation of the committee.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THE BUDGET

ELIMINATION OF FULL INDEXATION OF PENSION BENEFITS— IMPACT ON SENIOR CITIZENS—MOTION WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten:

That, in view of the adverse effects on the standard of living of senior citizens resulting from the elimination of full indexation of pension benefits, it is the view of the Senate of Canada that the government should rescind this particular provision of the Budget immediately.—(Honourable Senator Petten.)

Hon William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Frith.

[Translation]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as we can see this motion has to do with the indexation of pensions. If I understand correctly the consequences of the action taken by the Government, it has already been changed. The content of this motion has not necessarily been accepted but we agree with the action of the Government. For this reason, I ask leave to withdraw the motion.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it the pleasure of honourable senators that the motion be deemed to have been withdrawn?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

THE SENATE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS— DEBATE ADJOURNED ON MOTION IN AMENDMENT

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Davey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the Senate authorize arrangements for radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and those of its committees.—(Honourable Senator Phillips.)

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, before the summer recess, the honourable Senator Davey presented his motion that the Senate authorize arrangements for radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and those of its committees. He began in a rather interesting way to explain that the motion was not a whim, not an idle suggestion nor was it simply a caprice. Honourable senators, I am sure many of you would question Senator Davey's motives in moving the motion, but I do not think that anyone would go as far as to suggest that he was being capricious. In my remarks, I will disagree with him on a number of points but, at the same time, I will attempt to recognize that the honourable senator was sincere, if misguided, in moving his motion.

For the information of all honourable senators, the Senate has, for several years, provided a tape or a "feed" of the proceedings in the Senate to the press gallery. Members of the gallery are permitted to use the tape, or any portion thereof, in a news broadcast for radio or any other type of broadcast that they wish. Apparently, some honourable senators, including the sponsor of the motion, were not aware of this fact. My curiosity was aroused as a result of Senator Davey's motion and I was prompted to make inquiries concerning the use of tapes of the speeches of Senator Davey. It was rather discouraging to learn that not once in the last five years has any radio station, either public or private, utilized the tapes of Senator Davey's speeches in this chamber. Pity!

Unfortunately, my ego caused me to make inquiries concerning my own remarks and I must say, honourable senators, the results were not much more encouraging. I think that when I totalled up the amount of time I spent making inquiries, it far exceeded the amount of time that my tapes were used in news items. In short, honourable senators, neither Senator Davey nor myself received a platinum record, a gold record nor did we make the top 10 on the hit parade.

Senator Doody: Not as much as a caprice.

Senator Phillips: I thought to myself that, surely, somewhere in the Senate, there must be someone who attracted media attention. I am continually hearing how brilliant are the Leader and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition; how comprehensive their speeches. I thought that surely somewhere, someone must have utilized the tapes containing the speeches of those two honourable gentlemen.

Senator Frith: I am not rising to that fly.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I found the same result; they were not popular either. Then I thought of Senator Gigantès, my honourable friend, who is well known to the media. Perhaps there would be some partisanship there and they might have utilized his speeches. Unfortunately, honourable senators, Senator Gigantès is among those who have been ignored by the media.

It is incomprehensible that speeches of that calibre are not reported and re-broadcast. It is unfortunate that the public has no great desire, apparently, to find the radio waves or the TV broadcasting of this country filled with the stirring speeches and the inspiring proceedings of this august body. They have had the opportunity for the last five years and, for some strange and unfathomable reason, the Senate has failed to replace the soap operas as the favoured afternoon program.

Senator Davey has always taken a particular interest in the media and has always attempted to influence them to present what I have so often termed the Liberal propaganda, and he has been very successful in that in the past. It is rather strange that, with all of the success he has had with the media, he has never been able to persuade a radio station to utilize the speeches of a single, solitary Liberal senator. After five years, that tells us something. Perhaps Senator Davey reverted to his expertise in the advertising field in that when a product is not selling there is immediately put on an expensive campaign. I suspect, honourable senators, that that is the real purpose of the motion; that is, Liberal senators are not selling, therefore, an expensive TV campaign is required.

At the end of the sponsor's remarks I questioned him concerning his lack of reference to radio broadcasts in his explanation. The reply was even more confusing than the speech. He said that including radio in the motion was an error. I suggest that the whole motion was an error, but more likely the oversight for including radio in the motion was because the honourable senator was not sufficiently interested in his motion to read it before he put it on the order paper.

Honourable senators, we have been allowing radio to carry our proceedings for five years; we would look rather ridiculous if we now re-authorized radio to do that.

Senator Davey: That is why I excluded radio from the motion.

Senator Phillips: Perhaps the honourable senator would like to amend the motion so that only television broadcasting of proceedings is left.

I have had an opportunity to read Senator Davey's remarks since I returned from the summer break. I find little in them which I can agree with, and certainly nothing to change my mind. Certainly the Senate requires a greater public impact, but, honourable senators, that greater public impact will not come about simply because there are TV cameras recording and broadcasting the proceedings; that greater impact will come about by an improved performance by honourable senators. If honourable senators want greater impact, the Senate should sit five days a week rather than three days a week. That will draw attention to the Senate from the media.

Senator Frith: Why not sit for five days a week and have television coverage as well?

Senator Phillips: I suggest that if the Senate sits five days a week and there is a greater impact we then consider Senator Davey's motion.

Senator Frith: If the media is present that will encourage senators to attend five days a week.

Senator Doody: One never knows when the elections are going to come.

Senator Phillips: I will deal with having the cameras here and the attendance shortly, Senator Frith.

One of the reasons advanced by Senator Davey was that this was a contemporary means of communication, and that democracy demanded that we use the modern means of communication. If any honourable senator wants to broadcast a speech on television, facilities are available in the building. I am not aware that many honourable senators have used them. The Honourable Senator Bonnell years ago offered me the facilities of his television network in Prince Edward Island. I never found any great urge to rush down to the station to record speeches, even when I was incensed at the government.

Senator Frith: You are still working on your radio show.

Senator Phillips: That is right. I am still working on radio. This reminds me more of an Amos 'n Andy show than a TV production.

Another reason advanced for television coverage was the fact that television coverage has worked in the House of Commons. I disagree with that. The House of Commons has gone downhill drastically since television coverage was instituted in that chamber. Now the members forget the reason for the existence of the House of Commons and play to the television cameras.

When Parliament convened last year, the officials of the House of Commons sponsored a training program for all new MPs of all political persuasions. One would have thought they would have spent a great deal of time on parliamentary procedure, on committee procedures, but no, the most important training those MPs received was how to appear before the television cameras. That shows that television coverage has done nothing to improve the House of Commons.

Shortly, members of the House of Commons will be receiving reminders to wear poppies so that when they appear on television they will not be seen without a poppy. Because of that, they have forgotten the reason for wearing the poppy; they just remember the television camera.

If we are to have television coverage of the proceedings of the Senate, I suggest we have different rules from those in the House of Commons. In the House of Commons the camera can focus only on the individual who is speaking. It must not focus on the desk, where the notes are, and the camera must not record the empty seats around the speaker. It must concentrate solely on the upper torso of the individual speaking. When Senator Davey advocated the use of TV in the Senate, I looked over and was amazed at the number of empty seats around him.

Senator Doody: They all came back when he finished.

Senator Phillips: Naturally, and I expect attendance to improve when I have finished my remarks.

If we are going to have television coverage of the proceedings of the Senate, I suggest that we have one camera positioned where the clock is located so that it can show the complete chamber, so that it will show the Senate with all its warts, blemishes and vacant seats. Then we can attract more attention than we now do.

Senator Davey indicated that the installation of television cameras in the House of Commons cost $5 million and it costs $1 million a year to maintain. He went on to suggest that it would be within reason to expect the cost for the Senate to be half that amount. I think the honourable senator was being very conservative.

Senator Davey: I may be a lot of things, but never Conservative!

Senator Doody: That is unparliamentary.

Senator Frith: In his case it is.

Senator Phillips: He forgot that the proceedings of the committees are included in the motion and that committee proceedings in the House of Commons are not covered by television.

In fairness, honourable senators, I think we should have another camera at the Ottawa International Airport at 3 p.m. on Thursday afternoon so that we can see senators taking their flights to Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver. That will increase the cost of installation and maintenance. I hope that honourable senators will bear that in mind when considering the cost. The Whip may have to go to the airport as well to check on the attendance out there.

I recall that in the sponsor's remarks he attempted to explain the attitude of the Liberal opposition to Bill C-11. They were very anxious to look at the estimates when they were delaying the passage of Bill C-11. Obviously, the honourable senator has not looked at the estimates since he received them because the estimates include a figure usually in the vicinity of $25 million a year for the cost of operating the Senate. If we are going to add another $6 million to that we will increase the operating costs of the Senate by approximately 25 per cent. That is hardly practising the type of restraint that the Minister of Finance requested in his economic statement last fall.

I will shortly be moving a motion in amendment to refer this matter to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. I know that the money is not there at the present time. However, I have some suggestions that may provide the money. Those honourable senators who are anxious to appear on television could donate a portion of their salary to the cost of televising the proceedings; they could donate their expense account; they could also donate their pension and then the taxpayers of Canada would not object to the $6 million expenditure.

In closing, I move, in amendment:

That the motion be not now adopted but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate on the motion in amendment.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned on motion in amendment.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

MOTION TO EXAMINE AND REPORT ON FILM ENTITLED "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, September 17, 1985, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the activities of the National Film Board with respect to the production and distribution of the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss."

He said: Honourable senators, on February 7, 1984, as recorded in Hansard at page 188, I brought to your attention a National Film Board documentary on Billy Bishop entitled, "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss."

At that time I expressed outrage that this film was being circulated as a Canadian documentary about our most decorated legendary hero, Major William Avery Bishop, VC, CB, DSO, MC, DFC. A year and a half has passed and I am still outraged. Today I believe I have far more substantive evidence to convince this chamber that the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss" warrants the attention of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. I understand that they may refer it to the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs.

The main issue to be considered is whether or not this film should be edited to reflect a more accurate historical look at the life of Billy Bishop. The film depicts Bishop as a liar, a cheat and a fraud who received the Victoria Cross under false pretences. I say that Billy Bishop should be considered innocent until proven otherwise. The National Film Board must substantiate its facts and prove its allegations since it has labelled this film a documentary. Incidentally, the definition of "documentary" found in the Oxford dictionary is "(of film) dealing with real happenings or circumstances, not fiction."

The National Film Board claims it has proof to back up its accusations. I, and all the supporters who want this film withdrawn, believe we have enough evidence to discount all the accusations that were made against Bishop. We will show that most of the information used for the film came from people, mostly historians, who did not know Bishop. The theme repeated is that there is no proof that Bishop did what he said. I point out that there is no proof that he did not. The records have stood unchallenged for nearly 70 years. When did we start demanding proof of innocence? Surely we can ask for proof of guilt and none has been offered. So, who is telling the truth?

In a court of law a crucial component in a court case is establishing credibility. For example, if the witness on the stand is colour blind they could hardly try to convince a jury that the defendant definitely drove a blue car. In order to render a decision, an impartial jury relies on the credibility of those who take the stand in deciding what is the truth.

More to the point, I will not attempt—and I repeat the word "not"—to question the credibility of the producer-director as a person or as a professional. I will attempt to question the credibility of the facts set out in the film and compare them to the facts that I, and countless others, have discovered in our efforts to have this film withdrawn.

Some of these supporters include many distinguished parliamentarians of different political persuasions, several military historians and experts, Legion members and veterans and even "Intrepid" himself, Sir William Stephenson who, I might add, had 27 victories in France around the same time. As well, we have the support of four of Bishop's contemporaries overseas who are now in their nineties.

I should like to read an extract from a letter in that connection because I think honourable senators will enjoy it. I quote:

I was in the infantry during the first three years of the First War but during my 28 years in the R.F.C., the R.A.F. and the R.C.A.F, I got to know a great many pilots who served in France with Air Marshal Bishop and between the wars and during the last war met and knew personally most of the commanders who served in France during the First War. These included Marshal of the Royal Air Force, Lord Trenchard, Air Chief Marshal Lord Portal, Air Chief Marshal Sir Sholto Douglas and never did I hear anything but the most complimentary remarks about Air Marshal Bishop.

I would like honourable senators to note this last paragraph which reads:

● (1620)

If there is anything we, surviving pilots of World War I, can do, please call upon us. I am afraid you will have to move quickly as we are all in our nineties and time is running out.

I have several indisputably credible witnesses willing to appear before our committee, and I have a mass of evidence which I am not going to tire you with here. Amongst this evidence are letters from historians and others who have carried out enormous research and have spoken to people who really know their subject. One of these is a man who has spent some 20 years researching World War I air aces. He has interviewed over 400 pilots and observers, talked by telephone to another 170, has copies of 58 diaries and 74 privately printed biographies, 6,000 photographs, hundreds of letters, 300 flying log books and copies of squadron records and combat reports.

Another is a veteran who has examined records in England, France and Germany and spoken with a large number of people properly involved. Others are authors or well known members of the media.

Honourable senators, it is not just a matter of "hero-bashing," though we Canadians are notorious for it; it is disgraceful in itself to destroy a hero's legend. However, I must admit that that would not be enough reason to demand that the film be withdrawn. However, if, as in a court of law, credibility is the key to arriving at a verdict, then I ask you to consider the difference between the facts stated in the film and the actual facts found in military records.

Just for starters, at the very beginning of the film, it was stated, and I quote:

On Christmas Day, 1914, the opposing forces crossed the trenches and joined each other for a smoke, exchanged gifts, then they came back to killing each other. It is during this period that Bishop finds himself and his horse mixed in the awful French muck—

In actual fact, Bishop did not go to France at all during his time in the army.

This point, in itself, is insignificant, but, combined with the whole story which contains so much misinformation and so many inaccuracies, the credibility of the film has to be seriously questioned. The Manitoba Branch of the Royal Military College Club of Canada prepared a critique of the film and listed 34 such discrepancies of fact—that is, what the film stated and what happened historically, according to military records.

Although I would be very eager to read to you all those 34 discrepancies, with the evidence that has been accumulated, I will not take up honourable senators' time in that way. I have copies of the critique for those who are interested.

On the issue of credibility, the film, selectively, chooses its facts and mixes them with fiction to advance its theme. I quote François Macerola, the Government Film Commissioner of the National Film Board, who said:

The filmmaker... did indeed take liberties with the chronology of events in telling Bishop's story, but it must be understood that the film has a substantial fictional element and that dramatic devices are used—including many scenes from the Billy Bishop play.

In a moment, I will deal with this quote with reference to a documentary.

The most glaring example of the film's credibility is the way in which Bishop's mechanic, Walter Bourne, is presented. In the film, Mr. Bourne is the key figure in discrediting Billy Bishop's claims, "proving," as they said, that Bishop lied and was mistakenly presented with the Victoria Cross. In actual fact, the dialogue scripted for the actor who portrayed Mr. Bourne consisted of hearsay and selective facts accumulated from various sources. There is no evidence that the real Mr. Bourne ever made the statements attributed to him. In fact, Billy Bishop's son, Arthur, who wrote about his father's life in a book called The Courage of the Early Morning, wrote the following:

Bourne as usual turned his attention to the plane as soon as he saw Bishop was unhurt. He took in the innumerable holes and slashes in the wings, fuselage, and tail and uttered an incredulous whistle. "Beats me how the thing stayed in one piece, Sir."

Walter Bourne was so fond of Billy Bishop that, in 1942, when Bishop was critically ill, he wrote:

Get well soon, Sir. Train us men and we will beat them as we did in the old days. Here is good luck—I am enclosing something which has travelled with me all these years. Remember the time your gun jammed (April 30, 1917 in the attack against the Gothas) and you had to get away. Well, Sir, here is the bullet that might have ended your career. You can see the mark on it where I gripped it in the vice to get it free.

I will comment that it is hard to believe that that is the man who says that Bishop was a liar.

The film, "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss," is being circulated by the Canadian government as a documentary. Strangely enough, at the same time, the National Film Board and the Ministry of Communications, which is ultimately responsible for the National Film Board, are trying to claim that it is not a documentary. However, consider these points:

1. The film was shown at a Canadian embassy party in Washington to celebrate Canadian documentary films.
2. In a letter signed by the former Minister of Communications, he states that the "film is not a documentary as such, rather more of a film essay—". In the same letter, he goes on to boast that the film "—was recognized further as the best documentary of its kind at the Nineteenth Chicago Film Festival and won the prestigious Silver Hugo Award;" and
3. The film was selected by the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences as part of their outstanding documentary series in October 1984 in Hollywood.

I do not know how one can marry those statements.

Since so many critical facts in the film have been discounted by meticulous researchers and historians, by what stretch of the imagination can the National Film Board distribute the film as a documentary? It is obvious that a film distributed by the National Film Board of Canada would carry with it the authority of the government. Within the country, it is one thing; in foreign lands, it is extremely important. Frankly, I think it is dishonest.

As I stated earlier, it is shameful that the Canadian government endorses and circulates a documentary that harms our national image. Equally distressing is the fact that $400,000 of taxpayers' money was spent on the destruction of a hero's credibility without proof or even accurate information.

If the facts as presented in the film were substantiated, then no matter how much it distressed my colleagues and me to have our hero cut down, or if, to quote the editor of the U. S. News and World Report, "The NFB tore Bishop to shreds more effectively than any German Fokker," we would have to accept the facts and live with the shattered image of Billy Bishop.

However, in this case, it is unacceptable that Bishop's reputation be destroyed by a film director's poetic licence to shape the truth to fit the story he is relating. The National Film Board, as I quoted earlier, said that the film has a "substantial fictional element," and, certainly, the scenes taken from the play, Billy Bishop Goes to War, were fictional. Speaking of fiction, some of the supposed war shots in the film were identified by several U.S. television editors as Hollywood. A Soviet film-maker recognized a famous scene from a World War II Russian movie of Stalingrad under siege. That scene is from another war—there is absolutely no justification for calling this film a documentary.

One of many questions which comes to mind is: Who would be the first people to question the validity of an event which discredited them and represented a defeat? Obviously, those most concerned would be the German veteran flyers. Why did they accept and honour Bishop after the First World War if they thought he was a fake?

Honourable senators, this is not a political matter. In fact, there is no such element in it. I am not merely running to the defence of a friend, though Billy Bishop was a friend of mine years ago. I want to have this film thoroughly examined because I believe it is doing a disservice to our country, and if there is one place where the reputation and well-being of the country should be protected, it is in Parliament.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Molson: I have tried to explain the serious objections to this vehicle of character assassination and have tried to understand the ambition of its producer, who said he was "merely trying to suggest that generals who run wars have to create heroes in order to sell those wars to the public."

One may ask why someone would produce a film like this. The answer is simple and normal: A young man trying to make a reputation can do so easily if he attacks a sacred cow or, at least, something that is well known or admired. This desire for recognition certainly explains the attack on Bishop.

War should be condemned always, but many of us who have seen war are better informed than a producer who has not seen any of its horrors or implications. It might be reasonable to suggest that he has done Canada a disservice. There are many who could paint the whole hideous face of war without resorting to fabrication, deceit, or the destruction of anyone, hero or other, who offered his life for his fellow Canadians.

Honourable senators, I move the adoption of this motion.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I think the comments just made by Senator Molson to explain the purpose of his motion were such that I hardly need elaborate further on its substance. We are all aware that the motion and the subject it concerns raises some extremely delicate questions, some of which Senator Molson already mentioned, and there are others as well.

I wonder whether at this stage, it would not be appropriate to adopt the Senator's motion for referral to the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, for appropriate consideration in committee or more appropriately, as the Senator said himself, for consideration by the sub-committee of the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, responsible for examining matters relating to veterans' affairs.

Once the issues have been examined in greater detail, at that stage honourable senators would be able to explore the avenues suggested by the senator and to consider the substance of the matter.

Before getting involved in a debate on the substance of the motion, I would be quite willing to suggest that the Senate decide forthwith on the referral to committee, unless other senators are reluctant to intervene immediately in the debate on what we could call, more or less accurately, the National Film Board affair, as described by our colleague.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, regarding the point raised by Senator Tremblay, I understand what he means and I could follow his line of reasoning. I support the suggestion that we should not get into a debate on the substance of the matter, or as to whether or not the facts prove that the film was wrong.

However, I wonder whether it would be a good idea to keep this matter on the agenda for two or three days, and to consider only whether it is appropriate to refer the matter to committee. Personally, considering the points made by Senator Molson, I think it is a good idea. At the same time, we would be creating a precedent in taking a matter of this kind under advisement and referring the matter to committee.

Perhaps other senators might wish to contribute to the debate, just on this question. I agree it is a waste of time to get involved in a full debate on the subject of the film itself, and then to start considering the same subject again in committee.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I think that at this stage, we should give senators who want to take part in the general debate on the main motion a chance to do so. At the end of the debate, Senator Tremblay could present a motion in writing to refer the subject to the appropriate Senate committee.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I support this commendable and constructive initiative of Senator Molson. While the National Film Board has achieved many notable successes in its history, the Billy Bishop "production" does not constitute, in my view, one of its shining and glorious moments.

I agree with the honourable senator that the Billy Bishop feature is replete with numerous errors. The incredible thing is that apparently this film is being distributed around the world. Some of our friends and allies must assume that we are a nation of masochists. Nations ordinarily speak about their heroes and heroines and their achievements in glowing terms. The fact that we can convene meetings under consular and ambassadorial auspices for foreign audiences to view a film which has as its aim the discrediting of a great Canadian hero is almost unbelievable. I can think of no other instance in the history of film-making where any entity, much less a government sponsored film-making body, appears to have made a conscious and deliberate attempt to defame and discredit one of this nation's authentic heroes. Quite the opposite practice is followed in the United States. Efforts are not made to discredit Billy Mitchell or Eddy Rickenbacker, the two great American flying heroes. Indeed, as the years go by, their reputations and memories have been enhanced further and further, to the point where they have achieved the status of superheroes.

In this case, the savaging of Billy Bishop's career and of the man himself has taken place well after his interment. The vultures have flapped down upon him well after his death and years after many of the people with whom he served and fought have been buried. I suspect that, had he been alive when these charges were made, his critics would have been shot down in flames—figuratively, at least—in just a few moments and after a very brief battle. Billy Bishop's reputation would have been enhanced.

I support and second this initiative because I believe it is only in committee that the facts can be brought out as they should be and that full opportunity can be given to those people who have expertise on the subject to be heard. I hope that other honourable senators on both sides of the chamber will support this motion.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we on this side of the house certainly support the motion. I would like to see it dealt with as quickly as possible. This has almost been a crusade that Senator Molson has taken upon himself—and laudably so. I am sure that all of us are proud of the work he has done in this area, and I believe that the more quickly we get it dealt with, the better for the country as a whole, and for the Senate and its reputation outside. There may be some merit in having it debated in this chamber, but at this point I fail to see it. If anyone wishes to participate in the discussions, in the cross-examination of witnesses or in the examination of material, he can do so more effectively in committee. I would be inclined to agree with Senator Tremblay and Senator Molson that we should perhaps refer it to the committee as quickly as possible and have it dealt with there.

● (1640)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, in a sense there is a point of order as to what we should do with it.

Senator Doody: I thought that is what you had suggested we should do.

Senator Frith: Yes. I believe we should not try to debate here the issue itself. However, I believe we should allow another day or so to give senators an opportunity to consider the principle of whether it is a good idea for the Senate to deal with matters of this kind. I am of the view at this moment that it is, in this case; but I would like to have the opportunity to outline why I think it is a good idea and why I do not believe that it amounts to censorship or anything of that kind. Therefore I would like to adjourn the debate and speak to it tomorrow.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, perhaps I might add a few words that I meant to say earlier. I have a copy of the video-tape of the film, if at some time senators would like to know what the fuss is all about. I am not certain how long I can keep it, but possibly I could keep it for a week or two. It is available, if there is any decision on the part of this chamber that the film should be viewed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on that point, I wish to make it clear that I believe that is something for the committee to decide. I do not need to raise questions on whether or not Senator Molson is correct. I merely wish to take the time to think through why I believe we would not be open to accusations of trying to get involved in censorship or making ourselves into a board of censors. I want to have the opportunity to get that on the record. That is why I seek the support of honourable senators to adjourn the debate, and I will speak to it tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by Senator Frith, seconded by Senator Perrault, that further debate on the motion be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: No. I wish to make it clear that I have said "no" because I am of the view that the debate should not be continued. The question should be put now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: The Senate has already accepted the motion to adjourn the debate, on division.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned, on division.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

END OF DECADE WOMEN'S CONFERENCE

MEETING HELD AT NAIROBI, KENYA—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Paul D. David: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, September 24, 1985, I will call the attention of the Senate to the world conference called to examine and assess the results of the United Nations decade for women, that was held in Nairobi, Kenya, from July 15 to 27 last.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO MEET
DURING SITTINGS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I give notice that, on Tuesday next, September 24, 1985, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which was authorized by the Senate on June 25, 1985 to study and report upon the documents entitled "The Regulation of Canadian Financial Institutions: Proposals for Discussion" and "Final Report of the Working Committee on the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation (CDIC)," have power to sit at 3.30 o'clock in the afternoon on Wednesdays and at 3 o'clock in the afternoon on Thursdays for the duration of the above-mentioned study, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such legislation and other matters referred to it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we have no objection to Senator

Neiman's motion. Indeed, we are all aware of the necessity for that committee to be in a position to hire expert help when it is necessary. We all know that the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee has a rather hectic work load, particularly on the legislative side and that, of course, the hiring of expert staff from time to time is necessary.

I would point out to honourable senators that there is a caveat, and it relates to the monetary or financial constraints of the Senate at this particular time. The Internal Economy Committee has been wrestling with the funding requests of various committees. We are doing our best to keep up, considering the limited funds available. Certainly, we will give Senator Neiman's committee the same sincere consideration as we are trying to give to the other requests.

I have taken it upon myself to speak on this matter, even though I am not the chairman or deputy chairman of the Internal Economy Committee. However, I have been a member for some time.

Motion agreed to.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE TO STUDY GOVERNMENT ACTIVITIES ON POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION AND TRAINING

Hon. Fernand-E Leblanc: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, September 24, 1985, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the activities of the Government of Canada in its financial commitment to the support of post-secondary education and training;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such professional, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, September 24, 1985 at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

BANKING

COLLAPSE OF CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—OFFER OF CHARTERED BANKS TO ASSIST IN EXAMINATION OF LOAN PORTFOLIO

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, following upon the question I asked yesterday. You will recall that at that time I told the Senate that I had been informed that the Toronto-Dominion Bank had offered the services of 40 inspectors in connection with the affairs of the Canadian Commercial Bank, and I asked at that time, if that was true, why that offer had not been accepted.

Since then, my attention has been drawn to a transcript of the proceedings of the House of Commons committee dealing with this matter and, to clarify, I will read part of this transcript. Mr. Mulholland, who is the chairman of the Bank of Montreal, was giving evidence and he said:

Most of the banks urged a complete examination rather than a partial one, and a complete examination of the entire loan portfolio of the bank.

Later on, he said:

And offered personnel to assist in doing that, as we did, and we actually provided some personnel on the weekend, as I think all of the chartered banks did who would be under the direction of the Inspector General, not ourselves, and would of course take the necessary secrecy oaths and everything else, to provide the manpower to provide extra examination of the quality of the loan portfolio.

Later on, in answer to a question as to how long this would have taken, he said:

You probably would have a pretty good idea in about three days.

In view of that information, my question now to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: Why did the government not accept the offer of these personnel, even though it might have resulted in a delay of three days?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I thank my honourable friend for enlarging on his original question. I must admit I have not yet had time to read the transcript. I think, however, that that would be a very suitable question to raise with the people concerned when the committee meets, as it will shortly, to go into this whole matter.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—MEMORANDUM OF INTENT—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I understand from yesterday's proceedings the position that the Leader of the Government has taken with respect to questions relating to the Canadian Commercial Bank. I understand that there is a committee on the other side studying the question, but, of course, as he has acknowledged, there is nothing we can do to have any standing over there. All we can do is go and sit and listen, like everyone else.

However, the Leader of the Government has indicated that he was taking under advisement the question of having a study of this matter made by a Senate committee. Therefore, as we stand today, I cannot participate in the House of Commons committee and we do not yet have a committee here, so I have a series of questions that I want to put on the record relating to the Canadian Commercial Bank, and arising out of the original bill and the memorandum of intent.

I do not believe that the Leader of the Government will have answers to any of these questions now, so I will put the questions on the record so that he may have an opportunity to consider them. If it turns out that a Senate committee is going to examine this subject, these questions may very well be referred to that committee.

Honourable senators will recall that Bill C-37 was very prospective. It was a very short bill and was fleshed out by the Memorandum of Intent that had been tabled in the House of Commons.

I am not referring to the bail-out bill itself, or any bill in the offing, but to the Memorandum of Intent. The introduction of that memorandum dealt with the support group.

Paragraph I of the Memorandum of Intent states:

As soon as reasonably practicable, the Support Group shall purchase and CCB shall sell certificates evidencing the participation of the Support Group in a portfolio of assets comprising loans and related security having a nominal value of approximately $544,000,000 on the books of CCB. These assets will be identified in schedules to be prepared in connection with the Participation Agreement hereinafter referred to.

I now ask for those schedules.

Although I can determine this partly if I receive the schedules, I should like to have a relationship to the portfolio of assets that are in the schedules that, we hope, were prepared as a result of the agreement, and any of the assets that were allegedly transferred to the United States subsidiary of the bank in California.

The second paragraph of the Memorandum of Intent refers to the price that is to be paid by the support group. As honourable senators may recall, the support group consisted of Canada, Alberta, the CDIC, the Royal Bank of Canada, the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, the Bank of Montreal, the Toronto-Dominion Bank, the Bank of Nova Scotia and the National Bank of Canada. They all shared in varying degrees, with the CDIC heading the list with $75 million, Canada and Alberta coming second with $60 million.

The share of the support group—of the $544 million—was to be $255 million. I should like to know what relationship, if any, there is between the retaining share of the bank—that is, $289 million—and any assets transferred to the subsidiary in California.

The third paragraph deals with participation certificates. As I said, those were prospective, as was the bill and agreement. I should like to know whether the participation certificates were issued, and if so, whether we can have a sample of them. I should like to know the ranking of the persons who had participated, which is very important to the inquiry. I should like to know what the status of the undivided interest is in the assets—that is, the undivided assets that were to result from the issuance of those participation certificates.

The schedule to the participation agreement is found at the top of page 3. That also refers to the CCB portion.

The fourth paragraph states:

The Inspector General of Banks will designate two persons, with the concurrence of the members of the Support Group who shall act as representatives of the Inspector General. CCB will co-operate fully with these representatives—and so forth.

My questions are: Were those representatives appointed? Who were they? Did they make reports pursuant to paragraph 4 of the Memorandum of Intent? And, if so, may we see copies of those reports?

Paragraph 5 deals with what effect receipts with respect to payment on any of the assets in the portfolio will have. My question, very simply, is: Were any payments made on the loans which made up the Support Group portion of the portfolio?

The sixth paragraph deals with payments on account of loan losses. This is treated quite differently. It provides that the CCB shall pay annually, but in quarterly instalments, to each member of the support group other than the CDIC, in proportion to the participation of such member, an amount such that the total of the amounts paid to such members is equal to 50 per cent of the income of CCB before provision for income taxes. I suspect that no such payments for loan losses were made, but there is provision for quarterly payments, and I think we should know about that.

Paragraph 7 deals with dividends and discusses the question of priority. It stipulates that there shall be no payment of dividends and no redemption or purchase of any common or preferred shares until such time as CCB has paid to the Support Group the full amounts paid to them for their participation certificates. Were any steps taken under that paragraph? I suspect the answer will be no, because it would have been improper if there had been.

Paragraph 8 deals with share warrants. Were the share warrants issued? There is a provision that the authorized capital of CCB was to be altered in order to give effect to the first part of paragraph 8, which dealt with the proportion of share warrants which were to be issued at 25 cents, and to the fact that the rights under the warrants were to last ten years past the date of full repayment. Were those warrants issued and was the authorized capital altered in accordance with the provisions of that paragraph?

Paragraph 9 deals with income tax treatment. I asked the minister about the special treatment the bank was going to get with regard to writing off losses. They were to be the judges of whether they were within the reasonable requirements of the bank, and the minister gave an answer to that. If necessary, that can be pursued. I am not asking for anything under paragraph 9.

Under paragraph 10, it is a condition of this memorandum that the Inspector General of Banks shall have delivered a letter to the Support Group confirming his opinion that, upon receipt by CCB of the purchase price for the participation certificates, CCB will be solvent. That is a condition precedent. I should like to know if that letter of opinion, which is a condition precedent to the memorandum, was, in fact, delivered and if we can have a copy.

Paragraph 11 is, again, a condition precedent and a question of priorities and deals with the Support Group—that is, the taxpayers we represent. That paragraph states:

The undertakings of the Support Group herein to purchase Participation Certificates shall be subject to the condition that all holders of bank debentures of CCB shall first have agreed in writing to waive or forgo all payments of principal and interest on their debentures until such time as the members of the Support Group have received from CCB an amount of money equal to the full amount paid by them for Participation Certificates. For this purpose the debenture holders shall enter into an instrument of subordination with the members of the Support Group in form and content acceptable to the members of the Support Group.

There have been some conflicting—to me, in any event—items on the news about the position of debenture holders regarding what position they took and how they end up in terms of priority. Therefore, I am asking: Were those agreements signed; was the undertaking given; and was the instrument of subordination by the debenture holders and others in fact signed? There was also the necessity of passing a resolution approving those agreements, and we should have that resolution if it did take place. That also comes under paragraph 11.

I am sure honourable senators understand that all of these matters I am asking about the government did not know about at the time we passed the bill. The government predicted that certain things would happen, and I am now asking whether they did.

● (1420)

As is outlined on page 8, the participation agreement was to include provisions relating to the administration of the portfolio by the CCB, the reporting by the CCB to the Support Group with respect to the portfolio, the giving of directions by the Support Group to the CCB with respect to the administration of the portfolio, full disclosure by the CCB, further assurances by the CCB and like matters.

My question is: Did the participation agreement include provisions relating to the administration of the portfolio by the CCB? Were there reports made by the CCB to the Support Group? If so, can we see them? Were there any directions given by the Support Group to the CCB with respect to the administration of the portfolio? If so, can we see them?

Also outlined on page 8 is a paragraph relating to indemnification, which does deal with the question of insolvency. It is the only paragraph in the Memorandum of Intent that actually refers to the possibility of the insolvency that eventually did develop. In that clause is mentioned section 277 of the Bank Act, which is the first section in Part XI of the act dealing with insolvency. It is stated in the Memorandum of Intent that, in the event of insolvency or the winding up of the CCB, any amount remaining unpaid shall constitute indebtedness of the CCB to the members of the Support Group. There is no question but that it does constitute indebtedness. I would like to know what position the government is taking on the ranking of that indebtedness with reference to other indebtedness on the insolvency.

The final paragraph in the Memorandum of Intent deals with the choice of law, which does not give rise to any questions.

Dealing with the bill itself, I draw to the attention of the Leader of the Government subclause 2(2):

(2) The Minister of State (Finance) may, for the purpose of carrying out the terms of an agreement entered into under subsection (1),

(a) acquire, hold or dispose of participation certificates in a portfolio of assets of the Canadian Commercial Bank comprising loans and securities relating thereto; —

Was there any such acquisition?

(b) acquire, hold or dispose of transferable rights or warrants to purchase common shares of the Canadian Commercial Bank;—

Did the minister, on behalf of Canada, make any such acquisitions?

(c) acquire, hold or dispose of bank debentures issued by the Canadian Commercial Bank;—

Again, was there any such acquisition?

(d) enter into any agreement or arrangement necessary or incidental to any activity referred to in paragraph (a), (b) or (c) or enter into any agreement or arrangement in order to comply with conditions set out in the Memorandum of Intent referred to in subsection (1).

My final request for information is this: What agreements were entered into in accordance with the provisions of the Memorandum of Intent? Were there any other agreements entered into under subclause 2.(2)(b)? If so, may we see them?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank my friend for informing me in advance that he had a series of questions. Indeed, he has a series of questions. He obviously has been doing his homework. I have to tell him, though, as I think he himself intimated, that these are really not the type of questions that can be answered in an oral question period. He is correct in that assumption. I think it would be best for me to accept those questions as an order for return. That would be the appropriate way to deal with them. My only caveat is that, in some of the agreements in the bill, there may have been undertakings given to third parties that involve confidentiality. I have no means of knowing that at the present time. I hope there are none because I would like to give as complete an answer as I can to my honourable friend.

COLLAPSE OF CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—ROLE OF INDEPENDENT AUDITORS

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the great deal of interest that has been expressed about the problems of the CCB, could he inform this chamber whether the provisions of the Bank Act with regard to the interrelations between the Inspector General and the independent auditors of the bank were discussed? What took place? Did the independent auditors undertake any work for the Inspector General in accordance with the provisions of the Bank Act? I am not asking for their reports. I am asking whether there was any work undertaken by the independent auditors on behalf of the Inspector General.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will have to ask my honourable friend to keep those questions in his brief, because I fully expect that he will be able to ask them during the committee hearing. I have to tell him that, frankly, I do not know the answers. I believe the committee is the place to find them.

Senator Sinclair: Am I correct that it is the duty of the government to maintain an efficient and effective civil service? Is that a correct assumption?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, from my honourable friend's long experience in both public and private affairs, I am sure he understands well the duties of management.

Senator Sinclair: In view of the fact that the Leader of the Government does agree that it is their duty, I wonder if he can assist honourable senators by telling us and the public whether one group of civil servants are more to be followed than another. If one is an inspector of banks, does one receive more credence than if one were an inspector of fish?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, all I can say is that I am very glad that I am neither an inspector of fish nor an inspector of banks.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

CANNED TUNA UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION—SUGGESTED METHOD OF DISPOSAL

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I have two unrelated questions to address to the Leader of the Government. One deals with that particular person who suggested that the rotten fish, unfit for human consumption, should be sent to Ethiopia. Could the Leader of the Government, without identifying that person to us, assign him to Mr. David MacDonald, a civilized and decent man, who refused the rotten tuna, but who might nevertheless accept the rotten public official and instil some Christian charity in him? That is my question, sir.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not believe I am called upon to answer a question of that nature. Let me have the honourable senator's second question.

LAW REFORM COMMISSION

TREATMENT OF BIGAMY AND POLYGAMY

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: My question is less solemn than the previous one but perhaps quite worrying.
[Translation]

The Committee on Law Reform has just recommended that bigamy remain an offence under the Criminal Code, but not polygamy.

It seems illogical to me that it should be illegal to have two wives, but legal to have three or more.

I would like to speak on behalf of my female colleagues here in the Senate—

Senator LeBlanc: It costs too much!

Senator Gigantès: But three will cost still more. So they say it is legal to have three wives.

They allow polygamy, which means a man can have many wives. I have the dictionary, in case you have any doubt. On the other hand, they do not mention polyandry, which allows a woman to have many husbands at the same time.

I consider that a sexist position. Would the Leader of the Government kindly ask the Minister of Justice that he request a private conversation with Members of the Committee on Law Reform to explain all those things to them.

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am interested to know that my honourable friend appears to be on the verge of recommending polyandry. I am not sure whether or not that was his intention, but I gather that to be the drift of his question.

If the honourable senator has any comments he would like to make to the Law Reform Commission, there is nothing to prevent him, as a member of the Senate, from addressing those profound matters to that body directly.

Senator Gigantès: The Leader of the Government knows well that there are many of us here who unfortunately might not be able to perform all the duties necessary in a monogamous or, indeed, monandrous marriage and might therefore suggest polyandry out of the kindness of our hearts.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

COMBINES AND TRUST COMPANIES LEGISLATION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. In view of the increasing trend in Canada toward mergers and acquisitions of major corporations, including publicly funded corporations, companies and even financial institutions such as Canada Trustco, which is worrying a lot of economists because of possible harm to the Canadian economy, will the federal government bring in, without delay, a new combines act, or amendments to the present one, and a new trust companies act?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I have to report to my honourable friend that ever since I first entered this chamber, a combines act has been on the verge of being enacted by Parliament. Yet, after seven or eight years—I believe it is seven years—sometimes it seems a little shorter than that—no such legislation has been passed by Parliament. However, that does not mean that it will not happen. I can tell my honourable friend that my colleague, the minister who has responsibility for such matters, has been working on a new version of combines legislation and that it will be forthcoming. It is awaiting its place in the legislative queue at the present time. I hope we will receive it within a reasonable timeframe.

The matter of trust companies is now under consideration by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. It is considering the whole question of trust companies and I rather fancy that my honourable friend's point is included in what the committee is looking into. If he would be so kind as to check with that committee, perhaps he will receive further information on the matter.

BANKING

COLLAPSE OF CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—ALLEGED EXISTENCE OF DOCUMENT INDICATING DIFFICULTY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have one or two questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate which, I trust, are of a sufficiently general nature that he will not assign their answering to a committee that is to meet at some indeterminate time in the future. We have been told by members of the government that a request had been made to the Federal Reserve Board in the United States seeking a copy of a document which, allegedly, gave the first signal of difficulty in the Canadian Commercial Bank and that the document had not been forthcoming. Today we read that the Federal Reserve Board is reported to have said that no request had been made but that if such a request were made the document would be available. I wonder if the Leader of the Government can throw some light on what appears to be conflicting information on that matter.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I shall astonish my honourable friend by giving him a concise and precise answer.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Brace yourselves!

Senator Roblin: The fact is that the original inquiry did not reach the appropriate levels of the Federal Reserve Board. It was made by telephone, and at that time the official contacted declined to release the document. When the Minister of State (Finance) received that information she told her colleague, the Secretary of State, that the document was important and that she wished he would take it up with the officials who had the power to review this decision. That was done. So I believe that the answer is: I am glad to say that the document will be forthcoming.

COLLAPSE OF CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—PRIORITY OF CREDITORS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): I thank the Leader of the Government for that clarification. Would he now attempt to help me on another point with respect to another conflicting situation that has arisen, in the first case, from information provided in Canada and, in the second case, from information provided in California.

We have been told by the government that the Bank of Canada would have first access or first call on liquidated assets of the Canadian Commercial Bank. Now it is reported that the California authorities take the view that the California creditors have first call. Can the Leader of the Government throw any light on that particular problem?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Of course, the world is full of rumours and stories these days that are either true, partially true, quite untrue, substantiated or unsubstantiated. There is even a report that the allegations made by the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition in the other place are without foundation. Who would ever have thought to see that?

Senator Flynn: That's not news.

Senator Perrault: Yellow journalism.

Senator Roblin: Apparently, there are some newspaper people who think that that is the case. It has to do precisely with this question of what happened to the assets of the CCB in the United States. The information given in the press report, for which I take no responsibility whatsoever, is that the allegations made, that large sums of money were transferred there in an allegedly improper way, are quite incorrect. I do not know if that is the case. I can just tell my honourable friend that these rumours are circulating, and that's why it is so unsatisfactory for me to try to get specific answers in cases where the full information is simply not available to me. Again, I am sure that this matter will be clarified in the next day or two, but there is no way I can answer or respond this afternoon.

STATUS OF NORTHLAND BANK

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government whether he can tell us about the present status of the Northland Bank. On September 1, the minister told the country that there would be some limited time given to the Northland Bank either to re-organize or to amalgamate. I would like to know what has happened, whether the time has been extended or what is the present status of that bank.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): As I advised the house yesterday, there are two or three people or organizations who have been discussing with representatives of the Northland Bank and, no doubt, with the minister, the possibilities that may exist for the continued operation of that bank as a going concern. Those discussions are not completed. I think it would be wrong of us to close them off until we have a firm understanding as to whether or not any of them are acceptable.

COLLAPSE OF CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—COMMITTEE STUDY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has acknowledged the present unsatisfactory state of our information—indeed, his information—on this matter. He has referred to the speculation and counter-speculation, rumour and falsehood that is rife. I think we have an obligation to seek the information from the only source that can provide it, namely the Government of Canada. Now the minister has taken the view that it is not possible for him to answer questions in the detail we would like in this chamber, and he has suggested the possibility of a committee. In answer to the first question today, I think he said that we would have an opportunity shortly to deal with this matter in committee. I wonder if he would clarify that indirect hope which he held out to the searchers on this side of the house.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I hope my honourable friend has received the same indications from the committee as I have. The committee met last night to discuss what it should do. As a result of that meeting, the chairman of the committee wrote a letter—and I believe a copy was sent to my honourable friend—in which he proposed the action they should take. For my part, the decision was sensible, and it would mean an early consideration of the matters under question.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I understand that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee met and indicated that an understanding had been reached that it could study matters surrounding the Canadian Commercial Bank if the subject matter of proposed legislation were referred to it. The committee suggested this approach as a matter of efficiency and convenience. I accept that idea in principle, but there are two very important conditions. One is that the committee, if it ever does receive the subject matter for consideration, have very broad and full powers to investigate every aspect of the matter. The second condition relates to the timing of the proposed legislation: When is it coming in? If the Leader of the Government assures us that the proposed legislation will be in the House of Commons next week, then it might be a workable proposition. However, if we have to wait for several weeks for the proposed legislation, that is quite unacceptable. I think it hinges upon the promptness with which the legislation is disclosed and the subject matter referred to a Senate committee.

● (1440)

Senator Roblin: I should first like to say that the government has no intention whatsoever of attempting to impose any limitations upon the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. This government has never imposed any limitations on the work of that committee. We have respected the autonomy of the committee and the right of the committee to set its own agenda and to do its own thing, and I do not think there is a member on the opposition bench who would disagree with that statement.

Senator Frith: No, we would not, because you are only following a good Liberal principle when you do that.

Senator Roblin: When you find a good Liberal principle, it is well worth following, because there are not many of those around.

Senator Frith: You say that because you are not Liberals.

Senator Roblin: I would say, "Don't worry about that." The Senate is in charge of its agenda and its committees are in charge of their agenda, and that committee will pursue its mission as it sees fit. Personally, I am perfectly content that that should be the case and I would not like it to be understood, even by innuendo, that there is any other way in which we intend to operate with respect to this matter. That is point number one.

My friend's second question was: When do we get the bill? I can say to him that if I get out of here by 3:15 p.m. today, I will be in a better position to advise my honourable friend because this matter is receiving urgent consideration. I hesitate to make a firm promise because I am not in charge of the timetable, but I have every expectation that his limit with respect to the introduction of the bill in the other place will be met. That is my best information at the present time. If I find that that is not the case, I will advise my honourable friend accordingly.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH IRAN

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Does the Government of Canada intend to re-establish diplomatic relations with Iran?

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I must tell my honourable friend, although I am speaking entirely from my own understanding of this situation and without having had a chance to consult with my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, my impression is that there is no movement afoot at the present time to do such a thing. If I find that I am mistaken, I will advise my friend.

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: In this same context, can the Leader of the Government inquire why we have no Canadian representatives to look after our interests in Iran?

It seems that we still rely on the assistance of people at the Danish Embassy.

However, my information is that Canadian diplomats regularly travel between Canada and Iran. Are there things happening in secret?

Also in the same context, does Canada intend to apologize to Iran for its participation in the liberation of the American hostages? That is the essential condition posed by Iran to re-establish its diplomatic relations with Canada.

While the Leader of the Government inquires about my first question, could he also raise these two other issues which the Iranians seem to find very important?

[English]

Senator Roblin: I think I can deal with my honourable friend's points right now without any further reference. I was reminded by my colleague who sits behind me that we have not broken relations with Iran but that it has simply not been possible for our ambassador and his staff to operate there. I am looking at a gentleman who knows a great deal about international affairs, and he might corroborate what I say, or correct me if I am mistaken. The reason we are not there is because the Iranian government has demanded that we apologize for our actions in the case of the American hostages at the time that they were trying to make their escape from Iran. If I am correct in that statement, I really do not think it is very likely that the Canadian government intends to apologize for that attitude. I do not think that they should. It certainly would not carry my voice, if I were consulted about it, so I think the situation will be a stalemate until something happens to break that stalemate.

In the meantime, I think we should be grateful to other nations who protect our interests as best they can in Iran. It seems to me that we will just have to live with this situation a little bit longer in the hopes that ultimately we can find some modus vivendi which escapes us at the moment.

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a comment on the answer given by the government leader in the Senate.

In the report of the Committee on the Relations between Canada and the Near-Eastern and North African countries which was tabled in this house in June, 1985, I read on page 81 that trade between Canada and Iran has gradually increased in the last few years in spite of the fact that the two countries have not re-established diplomatic relations.

The Government leader informs me that these diplomatic relations have never been severed. The committee report mentions the break-up of these diplomatic relations in 1978-1980. Since then, they have not been re-established. There are two possibilities: either I am misinformed or else the government leader in the Senate is misinformed. He could look into this matter before he gives me his answer in a few days.

[English]

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, we are both right. It depends on what you mean by the words "diplomatic relations."

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, please forgive me for taxing your patience. At the Interparliamentary Union Conference held in Ottawa under the auspices of the Canadian section, protesting Iranians were expelled on the instructions of the chairman of the Canadian section.

Does the government consider the totalitarian regime of Mr. Khomeini more important than these people who want to restore democracy in Iran?

[English]

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend will find that whatever action was taken by officials of the IPU was taken by them on their own authority, and on no other.

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, the protesting Iranians expelled from the conference were thrown out by the RCMP on the instructions of the conference chairman. As it happens, he is also the chairman of the Canadian section of the Interparliamentary Union.

This is no longer a simple matter involving only the Interparliamentary Union. This incident involves the credibility of the Canadian government. This is why I asked my first question earlier. Either we have severed our diplomatic relations with Iran and no longer recognize the Khomeini regime, or else we no longer speak to any Iranian. What is the exact position of the Canadian government in this regard?

• (1450)

[English]

Senator Roblin: I have listened to my honourable friend's opinions and I do not share them.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

SALE OF CANNED TUNA UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, yesterday, in response to two questions from my colleagues, the Leader of the Government indicated he would direct certain inquiries to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans on the tuna issue. Can the leader inform the Senate of the result of that inquiry?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am still awaiting information from my colleague.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have two delayed answers to oral questions.

[Senator Corbin.]

ONTARIO

TORNADO DAMAGE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 12 last by the Honourable Senator Molson regarding tornado damage in Ontario.

(The answer follows:)

In a statement to the House of Commons on June 13, 1985, the Minister assigned to this disaster stated:

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Nielsen), in his capacity as the Minister responsible for emergency planning, will provide federal financial assistance to help Ontario meet the costs of recuperating from the effects of the May 31 tornado. This federal aid will be provided under the terms of the Disaster Financial Assistance arrangements, administered by Emergency Planning Canada.

The DFA arrangements provide a mechanism for responding to provincial requests for disaster aid. A formula relating the disaster expenditures to the population of the affected province is used to calculate the appropriate federal contribution. Federal cost sharing begins when provincial expenditures on disaster relief exceed one dollar per capita, and becomes progressively more substantial as expenditures increase. The DFA arrangements include guidelines which describe disaster relief needs eligible for federal financial assistance.

My colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise), who is here today will be setting up a special fund for farm assistance to finance a portion of farm capital reconstructions and re-establishment which are not covered by commercial insurance or by the DFA. Up to $5 million has been set aside for this purpose.

My colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald), will take action to alleviate the hardship of residents in the stricken communities by making job creation funding available under Section 38 of the Unemployment Insurance Act to assist in community repair and restoration. This will help fund special restoration projects in such areas as Barrie and Grand Valley.

Fifteen additional employment and immigration staff members have been assigned to an emergency centre in Barrie to supplement the local staff in dealing with the loss of employment.

To help those who have lost their jobs as a result of the tornado, the Barrie office has set up a central unit to speed the processing of unemployment insurance claims, as well as an emergency cheque distribution centre.

The Ontario regional office of the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion has established a task force to address the damage to manufacturers and service industries in the area.

After a preliminary assessment, DRIE plans to assist in several ways: First, free business counselling will be provided through the sector and financial expertise of the Ontario regional office or the CASE service of the Federal Business Development Bank.

Second, DRIE has posted officers to work out of the Barrie branch of FBDB with responsibility for the immediate assessment of damage to business. They will assist business with reconstruction efforts, through the whole range of the Department's activities and, if shortages of essential building materials develop, DRIE's network will be used to locate supplies throughout Canada.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. Stevens) will establish a $3 million central Ontario tornado damage business development program to encourage modernization and expansion in the affected area. The fund is designed to go beyond insurance and other aid as an inducement for businesses to seize the opportunity to expand and to upgrade their operations beyond simple replacement of storm damage. The fund will help generate additional long-term jobs and will contribute positively to the strengthening and future prosperity of the affected communities. Assistance will be available up to a maximum 35 per cent of eligible capital costs for firms which can demonstrate viability and significant economic benefits. The Department will discuss future prospects with affected firms, which should make their business plans known by September 30, 1985. In addition, the Minister has asked the FBDB to consider temporary payment deferral or reamortization for affected customers' loans in the same manner as does the Farm Credit Corporation.

Several dozen units of temporary housing have been made available through Canadian Forces Base, Borden. Additionally, 700 soldiers from the base have done a superb job in assisting, and over $25,000 in goods and services have been provided.

My Ministry, the Department of National Revenue, will treat donations to recognized disaster relief agencies or to municipalities as tax deductible. We believe that this measure will give added incentive for Canadians to contribute to rebuilding the damaged area. As well, recognizing that many financial records have been lost, I have instructed my officials to assist any person or business unable to provide supporting documents for tax purposes.

Both Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Department of Public Works have arranged to have inspectors in the area. CMHC will assist with identifying restorable buildings and help local officials with the issuing of building permits. The Department of Public Works will assess damage to public infrastructure.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES

NON-COMPLIANCE BY MINISTER WITH ACT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on May 9 last by the Honourable Senator Godfrey regarding Regional Development Incentives—non-compliance by Minister with Act.

(The answer follows:)

The Regional Development Incentives Act (RDIA), which was passed in 1969, specified that no development incentive may be provided under the Act unless the project could be in commercial production by December 31, 1984.

Section 16 of the Act requires that the Minister submit a monthly report to Parliament respecting the administration of that Act.

The RDIA Act has not yet been repealed. The Act is silent on when you may stop reporting on the administration of the Act. However, since no new offers can be made under the Act, there is little useful purpose to table a report every month indicating that no applications were received, no offers were made or accepted, but a few payments on older projects were made.

Tabled September 17th, the December 1984 RDIA monthly report to Parliament informs the members that no further reports will be forthcoming. However, Members of Parliament could request statistical information on any and all RDIA projects at any time.

CROWN CORPORATIONS DISSOLUTION AUTHORIZATION BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), for the second reading of the Bill C-60, intituled: "An Act to authorize procurement of the dissolution of certain Crown corporations and to amend or repeal other Acts in consequence thereof".—(Honourable Senator Sinclair.)

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, it is unfortunate that Senator Kelly is not in the chamber, but those present can understand my interest in this bill. When I was told there was to be a bill introduced dealing with the dissolution of crown corporations, knowing that there were approximately 400 of them having a book value of approximately $190 billion, an amount great enough to wipe out the deficit, I looked forward to the legislation.

Knowing that Senator Kelly, bearing in mind his background, would not deal with trivialities, I was absolutely astounded to learn that what Senator Kelly was dealing with was housekeeping, and that he had a very small broom. The legislation deals with minor corporations, one holding assets of $9.00. As honourable senators know, $9.00, as a percentage of $190 billion, is something like the splash a raindrop makes on the top of a pin; the splash is hardly discernible.

In any event, Senator Kelly did present this bill. Although it does deal with trivial matters, I suppose they are necessary matters in law. I have read carefully what Senator Kelly said. He did give the reasons for the legislation. I see no reason for not speeding this legislation on its way. I hope that when Senator Kelly introduces a similar bill it has more substance to it than this one.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I take advantage of the debate to make a correction to a comment which I made yesterday, and which I think was inaccurately reported. That comment had to do with the corporation—which is also being dissolved or liquidated under this legislation—which holds the official residence of the Canadian Ambassador to the Vatican.

I am reported to have said:

It is a company residence—

I did not say that, and it is not a company residence. It is a very comfortable and very satisfactory residence for the Canadian Ambassador to the Vatican, but I will not go into all of the details which made it necessary to constitute a corporation in order to acquire that residence for the Ambassador. I simply want to correct that reference to “a company residence.”

Senator Hicks: Is it located inside the Vatican or outside the Vatican?

Senator MacEachen: Outside of the Vatican, near the Roman Wall. The gardens abut the Roman Wall.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

CANADIAN INSTITUTE FOR INTERNATIONAL PEACE AND SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Heath Macquarrie moved the second reading of Bill C-69, to amend the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security Act and certain other Acts in relation thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, it is a pleasure and an honour to have been asked to introduce second reading of this important piece of legislation. I recall clearly how, in the last Parliament, the Senate dealt with the bill which this bill proposes to amend. We had then a short but impressive debate. Two excellent speeches were given then, one by the Honourable Senator John Stewart, the other by the Honourable Senator Duff Roblin. I thought that if we had in the interval adopted that modern panacea for political and economic problems in Canada, to wit, have an elected Senate,

[Senator Sinclair.]

Senator Stewart might not have been here and I would not have been able to pay him the compliment that I do. He may not be in the chamber at the moment, but he is a member of the Senate, and I am pleased about that. I recall his excellent speech.

At that time the Senate, as did the House of Commons, gave strong, multi-party support for the establishment of what I think is a splendid institution. I believe, too, that there is support for that institution among the Canadian public. Since its establishment, I believe that the support has strengthened and increased. The appointment of Geoffrey Pearson, a distinguished son of an illustrious Canadian, the most famed diplomat we have ever produced, Lester Pearson, has strengthened the support and goodwill for the institution. I think, too, that most Canadians believe that among the directors are eminent supporters of peace and disarmament in the country, many of whom have already earned distinction in the broader international world.

Although I have referred briefly to the importance of the bill we are amending, and the institution to which reference is made, Bill C-69 is, essentially, a housekeeping bill. I believe the most important aspect of the bill is that it underscores the desire of the present government to ensure the independence of the institute from the government and, indeed, from Parliament as well.

● (1500)

This bill provides for an amendment to the Financial Administration Act to add the institute to the list of crown corporations exempt from certain directions of the Governor in Council. The existing seven are: Bank of Canada; Canada Council; Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; Canadian Film Development Corporation; Canadian Wheat Board; International Development Research Council and National Arts Centre Corporation. This bill proposes to add, of course, the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security.

We have heard from time to time in recent months the expression, “arm’s length,” in reference to governmental control and administration of important functioning bodies. We might say, if we were being informal, that Bill C-39 allows for the—

Senator Hicks: Bill C-69.

Senator Macquarrie: If I said “39,” I erred. I cannot understand how that happened. I appreciate the correction.

Senator Muir: Perhaps that is your age!

Senator Macquarrie: Senator Muir says that perhaps I am thinking of my age. Had I been doing that, I would have made the mistake of calling it Bill C-66. Before we got into this penchant for correctitude, I was going to say that perhaps this bill might be construed as making the arm a little longer. That is what I was about to say in my merry Thursday afternoon way.

To show that I may be metaphorically sound once in a while, but anatomically outrageous, I was going to say that, “in another vein,” if we look at another important part of this measure, we find still further the underscoring of the independence of the institute by the provision in this bill that such reasonable travel and living expenses incurred by the chairman, the executive director and the directors of the board, while absent from their places of ordinary residence, shall be fixed by the board rather than by the Governor in Council.

I now turn to an important area although some may say it is just a textual or a linguistic matter. We come to the change in the designation of the institute in French. I do not think, honourable senators, I was chosen to pilot this bill because of my expertise in the French language. I am very modest about my skill in French, and anyone who knows me realizes I have a lot to be modest about. The essence of the change is that the word "mondiales," which Senator Hicks would translate into "global," does not, according to the experts at the board, portray the range and the mission of the institute. It is not "global," but international. They believe that the word "internationales" in the French version is a clearer, better and more appropriate designation. Perhaps it is not le mot juste, I do not know, but it seems to me it works very well. In all our efforts in bilingual legislation, it would seem to me to be important that every time we use a French or an English equivalent of the other, we be as close as possible to the most precise similarity in meaning. If, at the same time, we come very close in spelling, surely that is a literary dividend. Since writers of law write in legal English—but that is not the same thing as good English—I do not think they would mind that either.

Therefore, honourable senators, I commend all these suggestions to you. They seem to me to be sensitive and thoughtful improvements to the existing legislation to make the terminology clearer and to underscore the idea, which came through very strongly in both chambers in the last Parliament, that this new and important institution was not to be, by any means, an emanation of a government or even of a parliament. I believe, to that extent, it should commend itself to us.

Yesterday we heard our colleague, Senator Godfrey, make reference to what they do in the other place as being a good thing for us to do on occasion. Last week, in the other place, they presented this measure, debated it and put it through all three stages in one afternoon. We are not suggesting that we do that. I am relating this to you as an indication of the all-party support in that chamber for this most useful and, I think, valuable alteration to an existing statute.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator MacEachen, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

MOTION TO EXAMINE AND REPORT ON FILM ENTITLED "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the activities of the National Film Board with respect to the production and distribution of the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss".—(Honourable Senator Frith.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday, when I asked for the adjournment of this debate, I gave some indication as to why I did so. I would now remind honourable senators why I proceeded in that fashion. The motion states:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the activities of the National Film Board with respect to the production and distribution of the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss."

It seems to me that this is an unusual motion and an unusual activity for the Senate to engage in. Of course, there is no reason not to act upon this motion simply because I cannot think of a parallel motion since my appointment to this chamber, which is only seven or eight years.

Is there any reason not to do this? I felt worried about interpretations that might leave some whiff of censorship; some impression that the Senate was setting itself up as a censor board. However, when being concerned with that view, we must remember what Senator Molson told us yesterday. We must remember that the issue is not a private feud; it is not even an individual feud with public importance. It is even more than that; it is a matter of public importance on two counts: As Senator Molson pointed out, the subject matter is one of Canada's long-sung and praised heroes; and the other party, if we can so call the NFB in this context, is, of course, a government agency and there is nothing unusual about government agencies feeling themselves responsible to and, in fact, reporting to Parliament and its committees.

I feel that we can justify the action requested by Senator Molson, in spite of the preliminary reaction we might have that we are taking unto ourselves a role that we might not want to extend to other issues. Senator Molson's careful research certainly made a case yesterday for the defamatory nature of the film entitled "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss."

As he pointed out, it is not a documentary—although, as he also pointed out, it is unclear whether it should even be described as a documentary. Certainly, his definition of "documentary," taken from the Oxford Dictionary, to mean something that is not fiction, when coupled with his description of this document, leads one to believe that this film is not a true documentary.

If the film is defamatory, then the defamer, if I can use that expression, has had a forum for its point of view and for the production, distribution and showing of its film. The defamed has no forum—he is dead. Senator Molson wants to provide a forum for Marshall Bishop.

Honourable senators, the motion that is before us is not to censure or to condemn the film board. It is a motion asking that a committee look into this public question. I see no reason not to support and adopt this motion. Indeed, Senator Molson provided many reasons why we should. Perhaps I will add one additional reason which is corollary to what I have said.

The National Film Board is an agency that has deservedly won many awards. I, personally, am a great admirer of that entity. I have known and worked, in various capacities, with at least three government film commissioners. Canadians should be proud of the National Film Board—proud of its award winning work and proud of the work that has attracted no awards. I believe that a further justification for Senator Molson's motion is to provide to the National Film Board the opportunity that I assume it would welcome to explain why this film seems to be so justifiably subject to the serious criticism directed against it by Senator Molson.

I can only add that I have not consulted my colleagues on this matter; I am speaking for myself. It may be that some other honourable senator wishes to speak to it. At any rate, for the reasons I have given, I intend to support the motion.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I understand that Senator Marshall is ready to speak to this motion this afternoon. Perhaps I will be, too. I wonder if we might allow Senator Marshall to have the floor?

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I would not want to preclude Senator Gigantès. He has moved the adjournment of the debate. I can quite happily speak after he does, although I thank Senator Robichaud for his consideration.

On motion of Senator Gigantès, debate adjourned.

STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE

GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès rose, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, September 17, 1985, that he will call the attention of the Senate to the Strategic Defense Initiative.

He said: Before I speak to Inquiry No. 3, honourable senators, I notice that some of my colleagues—one, in particular; I recognize his laugh—find it amusing that one should stand the previous inquiry. I wish to spare some of those colleagues who did laugh some of the memories that I cherish—perhaps they do not—about our great former Prime Minister.

That, however, is not the subject of Inquiry No. 3. I should like to speak about Star Wars and the attitude of the government.

We have been told by the Prime Minister that Canada will not be officially—

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Excuse me, senator, are we dealing with Inquiry No. 2 or Inquiry No. 3? Has Inquiry No. 2 been stood?

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Gigantès: It has been stood, yes.

Senator Doody: Thank you.

Senator Gigantès: We have been told by the Prime Minister that the government of Canada would not be involved in Star Wars research, but that he thought it prudent for the Americans to be involved in it and that he would place no obstacles in the way of Canadian companies that might wish to engage in that research. In this regard, there are various points to consider—I am sure that the Prime Minister considered them and did his best to address himself to them. One such point is the security of mankind and, therefore, of Canada. Another is the financial advantage to be gained by participating in that research.

On the security issue, I claim that the dangers of the Strategic Defense Initiative are so great that they nullify any possible financial advantages. I would ask for the patience of honourable senators while I tell them why.

If the United States were first to establish an umbrella that would stop missiles, we would have to ask whether this umbrella would be fully effective. Most of the specialists say that it would not be 100 per cent effective but would be, perhaps, 95 per cent effective. I am prepared to grant 99 per cent effectiveness. That leaves 1 per cent of total Soviet warheads to come through. If we count only the Soviet warheads on land-based Soviet missiles, we are faced with 6,000 warheads as of last November. One per cent of 6,000 is 60. The probability of distribution is such that we cannot assume that each of those 60 would fall upon a separate U.S. city, but it is probable that they would fall on the major American cities. If they fell upon the 20 largest of them, we are talking about losing something in the order of 100 million lives. Therefore, the effectiveness of the Star Wars umbrella is non-existent in the event of the United States sustaining a first strike from the Soviet Union.

But there is also the possibility of the United States attempting a first strike. If the U.S. attempted a first strike and it had an umbrella, the first strike would disrupt Soviet command structures, would probably destroy a great many of the Soviet weapons, and then it would be less likely that 60 warheads would get through. It might be less. But even if fewer land-based warheads got through, the probabilities are—and I have asked some computer friends to do these calculations—that the first five major cities in the United States would be hit, and I am not counting at all the Soviet missiles that would be launched from submarines.

If one looks at this brief summary of the possible consequences of a first strike by the U.S., or a first strike by the Soviet Union, what one sees is that this umbrella against missiles will not be effective, will not limit damage to what is acceptable—because losing the first five major U.S. cities, and losing 30 million people, is not an acceptable loss for any sane U.S. government—and I assume that U.S. governments will continue to be sane. I also assume that Soviet governments will continue to be sane, because if we assume anything else, then we might as well stop thinking about defence if we are dealing with insane people.

However, the danger is that if the U.S. starts building the Star Wars umbrella, or vice versa, the superpower that has not started first in building that umbrella is forced to assume that the enemy's umbrella will work to a fairly large extent, and is forced to fear that the enemy is planning a first strike—because a second strike does not work as well.

That means that should the Americans start building this umbrella first, as they are doing, the Soviets will have to say to themselves "We have to multiply our offensive weapons. This umbrella can stop 99 per cent of our 6,000 land-based warheads. Well, let us double the number. Then the penetration will be double and the Americans will not dare try a first strike." They will say "Let us increase the number of missiles we have on submarines and the Americans will not then try a first strike."

We can reverse the argument. If the Soviets build this umbrella first, the Americans will inevitably multiply the number of offensive missiles they have, so that they can saturate the Soviet Union. That means a new arms race.

It is not a military secret—it has appeared in the New York Times and the Wall Street Journal and we have had it confirmed to us by Americans we have met—that on several occasions there were accidents. In one of them the commander of NORAD was sitting at his console and he saw the Soviet missiles coming over the Pole; and he did his duty. He scrambled the bombers; he told the land-based missiles to start counting down; and he warned the submarines to fire. Six and a half minutes later it was discovered that it was a faulty silicon chip that had not functioned and had allowed an exercise to come through as if it were a real event. Let us not forget that the Soviet equivalent of that American general sits six and a half minutes flight time from our Pershing missiles in western Germany.

Each weapon is a potential accident. If we multiply the number of weapons that we are aiming at one another, we are multiplying the number of potential accidents. It is not that I trust the Russians. It is not that I think that if we disarmed they would not try to conquer first western Europe and then other parts of the world. The question simply is: Which is the best way to defend ourselves? We live in a world which has been compared to two scorpions in a bottle. We do not want to make either of those scorpions nervous. When one of the two scorpions says "I can nullify your sting by and by," the other scorpion may well sting first. That is the danger, and the danger of accidental release of a constantly increasing number of weapons.

It can be argued—and the French argued very successfully—that all you need is to be able to inflict upon your enemy damage that is unacceptable. I would argue that losing your first 50 cities is unacceptable damage, if you are the leader of the Kremlin or if you are the President of the United States. You go back into the Stone Age—and let us not even think of nuclear winter, which is quite possible. The radiation effects alone would be enough to destroy future generations.

So it was from the beginning quite open to both sides to restrict themselves to having retaliatory forces that are simply enough to destroy the other's 50 cities. It happens now to be just one submarine. Okay, that might malfunction. So two submarines. Two might malfunction. Let us say four. Four means about 292 warheads on either side. That is below the nuclear winter threshold, and it is a small fraction of the 1.2 million Hiroshimas that are potentially there in the thermonuclear arsenals of the two superpowers.

Starting a new arms race, as the Star Wars Initiative does, is not to increase our safety or the safety of Americans—and thus the Canadians, who will fry along with them. It is to lessen it. It is therefore our duty, as a country, as a member of the human race, to say to the Americans: No, it is not prudent. It is dangerous. It is dangerous for you, our friends, our neighbours. We are your Siamese twins. We love you. We don't want to be anybody else's ally." If there were a winnable war, I would like to see the Americans win it. But there is not a winnable war. I do not want them to create more risks of accidentally bringing about the end of mankind.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Before the honourable senator adjourns the debate, perhaps he will permit me to say a few words?

Senator Hicks: Certainly.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Hicks for allowing me to speak. If he then wishes to adjourn the debate, he may do so.

May I say at the outset that I am not an expert on Star Wars. In that context I join Senator Gigantès. He is not an expert on Star Wars. In that context I join Lloyd Axworthy of our Liberal Party, who also is not an expert on Star Wars, but who has had a great deal to say on Star Wars.

In that context I join Pauline Jewett of the NDP, who is also not an expert on Star Wars, but who has had a great deal to say about Star Wars. Then I also join the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, who also is not an expert on Star Wars but who has a great deal to say about Star Wars.

This whole debate reminds me of 1939, when I was a young man, and there were a great many experts all over Canada speaking about Hitler, Germany, Japan, the new weapons they had, the number of ships, the number of guns, about everything; and the tone of the comments right across Canada, the United States, Great Britain and France was "Maybe if we just don't upset the Germans and the Japanese, they will go away." The two scorpions mentioned by Senator Gigantès were the Americans and the Germans. In fact, there were three at that time, because there were also the Japanese. We said "If we upset them, they will sting each other and we will all die." But it did not work.

Whether we like it or not, there are two sides in this world. There is our side and the American side, and then, of course, there is the Russian side. Sometimes I wonder whose side we are on, just as sometimes I wonder about what kind of sense they are trying to make.

• (1530)

I get excited and upset by some things the Americans do, just as, I am sure, every person does. However, whether we like it or not, there are essentially two sides. There is the Russian side and there is our side. The Russian side includes Poland, which they took over, and it includes Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia and lately Afghanistan. I would like to see those people vote on whether or not they would trust the Russians.

The Russians have said that they are not engaging in research on weapons in outer space, and a lot of our people say that they believe them. I would not believe the Russians if they were saying the Lord's Prayer. I think they are already engaged in Star Wars. In this case, I think the Americans are right. I do not agree with many things the Americans do, but I think this time they happen to be right. However, whether they are right or whether they are wrong, I do not think that our side can take a chance. Here is little Canada with 26 million people, and what have we been doing for the last 50 or 60 years? Living under the shield of the Americans, acting like we are independent, and kicking them in the shins or anywhere else we can reach them, and we cannot reach very high because we are such a tiny little power compared to them. We are trying to point out that we are some kind of a great neutral force, that we are some kind of an honest broker. I am sure that the Americans are beginning to wonder whose side we are on, and the rest of the world does not pay any attention to us.

I am not necessarily saying that we should jump into bed with the Americans on the Star Wars Initiative. I do not think it would make any difference one way or another. However, I do not agree with the present government when it says that we will not join with them, that we will not get into bed with them but that if we want to make a little profit from them that is okay. So we want the best of both worlds. We are not going to lose our virginity, but we are going to take the money for hooking up and down the streets. I do not agree with that position.

Nor do I agree with the official stand of the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party when they say "We will not agree with them and we won't have anything to do with it." Whether we like it or not, we are on their side. I do not know whether the Russians are engaged in Star Wars research. I do not know whether it is a defensive weapon or an offensive weapon. All I say is that we had better be very careful about whose side we take. It is very easy to stand up here—and, oh my God, it is popular—and say that we do not believe in nuclear weapons. I do not believe in them either. I do not want to get killed and I do not want my grandchildren to get killed. I am just starting to teach them how to play golf and I do not want them to get killed. I have never met anybody who is in favour of war or getting wiped out. However, the question we must ask ourselves is: Whose side are we on? To me it is very simple—we are on the side of the western world, the side of the Americans.

I agree that we can have some influence in this matter. Of course, I do not always agree with the Americans either. Sometimes I look at the President and at their Secretary of Defense, Caspar Weinberger and I wonder what they are up to and where they are coming from. However, I believe that we can be far more effective if we say to them, "Okay, we are on your side, and we would like to sit down with you privately and talk about some of these things that you are doing." In this way we would have some influence. But we try to take some kind of independent stand when we are not independent, and we really do not count for anything. We try to show off to somebody—and I do not know to whom—how we are on the side of motherhood and of the world carrying on and then we try to have some effect on the decisions that are taken. I do not think such a stand means a thing in the world today. I think that we would be far better off to say, "Okay, we are on your side." That way we could sit in the inner circle—if we can get into the inner circle—and try to apply common sense there, rather than taking the attitude that the government, the official opposition and the NDP are taking. I totally disagree with Senator Gigantès and with this animosity against the Americans because of their policy on Star Wars. I do not think we have to agree with everything they do, but I think we are jumping into this matter far too quickly, and I do not think that we are doing them or ourselves any good.

Senator Gigantès: Would Senator Steuart accept a question?

Senator Steuart: Yes.

Senator Gigantès: I agree that we are not experts. Presumably the generals and those who constitute the military industrial complex are the experts.

Senator Steuart: Is the honourable senator's question about whether I think the generals are experts?

Senator Gigantès: Yes.

Senator Steuart: I think every general in the world fights the last war. The generals of the war I went through were ridiculous. I think that most of them should have been hanged. They may be experts on the last war, but I do not think that anybody is an expert on the next war. However, I do not think it matters. I do not think that you and I as Canadians can decide to split our side of the equation which is made up of the allies. We are allies now and we were allies in the last war. God help us, I hope there never is another war, but if there is, we will be on the side of the allies. I do not think that the allies can afford to be split. If we want to have some input in this whole matter, then we should do it quietly. Let the Shamrock, Irish eyes that are smiling go down to the United States and try quietly to have some input, and never mind taking a public stand like we are attempting to do.

Senator Gigantès: I have always thought that if one of my friends were stepping in front of a bus I should scream.

Senator Steuart: That is right.

On motion of Senator Hicks, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, September 24, 1985, at 2 p.m.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

BANKING

COLLAPSE OF CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—ALLEGED EXISTENCE OF DOCUMENT INDICATING DIFFICULTY—
CORRECTION OF STATEMENT BY LEADER OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we embark on Question Period, I would like to amend a reply that I gave last Thursday in response to a question by the honourable Leader of the Opposition in which he asked me about certain documents that have been requested from the Federal Reserve Board in the United States.

Senator Frith: To what page are you referring?

Senator Roblin: Page 1256 of Debates of the Senate. In answering that question, after advising that the matter had been referred to higher levels of government in the United States, I said:

I am glad to say that the document will be forthcoming.

I now have to tell honourable senators that that should read:

I am glad to say that the document may be forthcoming.

Although I had understood an agreement had been reached about the providing of the document, after I had made my statement I was told that that was not the case and that the matter is still under negotiation. However, should it be made available to us, we will be glad to make it available to Parliament.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

SALE OF CANNED TUNA UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION—
PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE—EXTENT OF KNOWLEDGE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a few questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Since they all request information, I do not expect him to have answers to these questions on the spot. They all deal with the unfortunate events surrounding the canned tuna.

There seems to be some residual doubt as to when the Prime Minister's Office, in particular, first knew about the problems surrounding this canned tuna. Yesterday there were dates mentioned in July and August. I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to attempt to give us more precise information on the dates.

The first date I wish to know is that on which the Prime Minister, or the Prime Minister's Office, first knew anything about the problems surrounding the acceptability of this tuna for human consumption.

As a subsidiary question, if the first time the Prime Minister's Office knew about the problem was in connection with a proposed television show, what information was given regarding what was going to be the subject matter of that television show? I ask that because the Prime Minister said yesterday that when the television show did not appear, he did not look into the matter any further at that time. The question is: Did he know that the show was going to deal with the subject of the tuna being condemned by the inspectors?

May I also ask for the date upon which Star-Kist first made representations to the government through the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, or through the Prime Minister's Office, and who, other than Premier Hatfield, made representations for them or sought an appointment to do so, and the date or dates of any such activity.

The last question is: Did Mr. Fraser, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, as he then was, first refuse to overrule his officials, and was he persuaded to overrule them by the Prime Minister's Office?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not entirely sure that I can accept all the questions as posed by my honourable friend, because some of those questions have to do with conversations that might be described as between ministerial colleagues on cabinet matters. So, I would have to enter at least that reservation with respect to the information he seeks.

On first reading, that is the only reservation that occurs to me. I would be pleased to take the other questions as an order for return and I will provide that information as soon as I can.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on the points raised by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, I understand that his reservation is a reasonable one. I do hope and I am sure he intends me to infer that he will state in any particular case in which he feels the information is not available what the nature of that information is and why it is not available.

RESIGNATION OF MINISTER—TRIBUTES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not entirely sure whether it is proper to do so, but I cannot let the occasion pass without saying a word in tribute to my former colleague, the Honourable John Fraser. His problems are well known and his difficulties are a matter of public information and discussion, so I will not deal with those.

During my service with him, and since I have known him, I have found him to be a dedicated, honest, entirely well-motivated and principled public servant. While he has fallen on a difficult day, I would not like the occasion to pass without making this reference to a friend.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, if I might intervene for a moment, I should like to underline the words that the Leader of the Government in the Senate has said about the Honourable John Fraser. I have had occasion to work with him, particularly on the Canada-U.S. Interparliamentary Group. I would put him in the very top category of public servants in Canada.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it may not be proper for me to comment on the Honourable John Fraser's resignation, and in fact it may not be a very good idea, but I will do so anyway. I know the Honourable John Fraser reasonably well. He is married to a woman from a well-known Carleton Place family. I know his in-laws, and certainly my experience is that the comments made by the Honourable Senators Roblin and Hicks were totally justified.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

BANKING

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK AND NORTHLAND BANK— DEPOSIT INSURANCE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate respecting the policy of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. There are two parts to the question. Could the Leader of the Government tell us what the policy of the government is respecting insurance of the depositors in the institutions to which this act applies? With respect to several institutions that have failed and where the depositors are insured there have been policy announcements made by the government to the effect that they are going to guarantee 100 per cent of all deposits even though they were in excess of the insurance level provided. I should like to ask if that is the policy of the government or is it changed from time to time depending on the type of institution involved.

My other question is as to whether or not an announcement has been made by the government about deposits in excess of $60,000 in the Northland Bank. I read an item in the paper to the effect that such deposits would be automatically covered. It may be that the government has made an announcement that they are going to cover 100 per cent of all the deposits in that bank as well. I have not seen that announcement and I wonder if he could confirm if such an announcement has been made or not.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend raises a very important matter which is now being considered by the government. The decision with respect to the policy on the CCB was dictated by the circumstances of that particular situation because certain statements had been made and undertakings had been given by various authorities which bore on the decision to act as the government proposes to act in respect to all depositors in that institution.

Nothing that I know of at the moment has been said about the circumstances surrounding the Northland Bank because the same situation has not arisen. Should it arise, the government will have to consider what its position is going to be.

On the more general question that my honourable friend raises, it is the government's opinion that the whole question of the CDIC requires a thorough review to establish the policies that ought to be followed by that body not only in connection with the amounts that are insured but with all the circumstances that surround that form of government guarantee insurance policy. It is time it was reviewed and I expect, with the parliamentary schedule permitting, that there will be legislation on that in due course.

Senator Olson: I have a supplementary question. I am not questioning what the government leader has said, but do I understand him correctly that the government has not stated a policy with respect to the deposits in the Northland Bank to date because they have not reached that stage but the fact, of course, is that many of the activities of that bank have been frozen and that they are under a custodianship? Could he check to ensure that no undertakings have been given to date? Because, obviously, there is a great deal of concern about some of those deposits and in particular some of those by municipalities and so on are rather substantial.

Senator Roblin: I gave my honourable friend my understanding of the situation but in view of his special request I think it is important that I be absolutely sure that I am correct, so I shall make inquiries.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—MEMORANDUM OF INTENT— REQUEST FOR FURTHER INFORMATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question on that point and it is also supplementary to some questions I raised last week. At that time I raised questions arising out of the Memorandum of Intent, tabled with Bill C-37 as the Leader of the Government in the Senate will recall. There was one clause in that memorandum that dealt with insolvency but in a rather minor way. I understand that some testimony was given today or yesterday by the president of one of the banks saying that the Memorandum of Intent had subsequently been amended to add a specific clause dealing with insolvency and the status of the $60 million put out by the banks. He said that the agreement had, in fact, been amended to provide that the banks' contributions were, in the event of insolvency, to be treated as deposits, which is most important, of course, in terms of their ranking.

● (1410)

Would the Leader of the Government please add that to the list of questions I asked, because it arises out of an event which had not, at that point, taken place?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Yes, honourable senators, I will add that item to the information requested.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question to that raised by Senator Frith.

If the Memorandum of Intent was not specifically amended, would the Leader of the Government find out whether any verbal assurance was given to the banks that, on liquidation, their advances on behalf of that group of loans would be looked upon and considered as being in the nature of deposits?

Would the Leader of the Government also ascertain whether there is anything in any of the applicable statutes that would lead the bankers, on liquidation, to consider advances under assurances, such as were given, to be changed from portfolio advances to deposits?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I cannot undertake to answer my honourable friend's questions because the question of verbal assurance is something which I very much doubt will be a matter on which I may report. Unless there is some concrete evidence as to what assurances were given—and they are usually given in written form—I cannot undertake to inquire about the conversation.

My honourable friend has also asked me about what is, in effect, a legal opinion, which cannot be dealt with under the parliamentary rules.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, the reason I phrased the question as I did was because of the honourable senator's statement, in answer to Senator Olson, that government officials had given assurances in regard to CCB deposits.

He seemed to indicate that he knew of some assurances given in that regard, and I was asking whether any assurance of a similar nature from similar people or their assistants was given to the banks.

Senator Roblin: I can tell my honourable friend that what I had in mind were the assurances given by the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

RESIGNATION OF MINISTER—TRIBUTE

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, unfortunately, I am somewhat out of phase since I was intending to rise following Senators Roblin and Hicks on the subject of Mr. Fraser's resignation. Not only am I from his province—and quite possibly the only one here today who is—but I first knew him over 35 years ago as a young law student. I cannot let this opportunity go without saying that, in spite of the high price, I think he has honourably chosen to pay for what appears to have been a most unfortunate mistake, his life has been dedicated to public service in the highest form of the use of that term. He has been a most sincere, honourable and hard-working man in his chosen political career, and I do not want this opportunity to go by without simply wishing him a useful contribution to Canadian public life again in the future.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE

STATUS OF STUDY

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Some time ago, the Prime Minister announced that he was appointing Mr. Kroeger, a long-time public servant in the federal government, to conduct a study and report on the so-called Star Wars Initiative which the United States was undertaking.

My question is: Has Mr. Kroeger completed his study and has he reported? If he has, is it or will it be made public?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall have to take the question as notice.

FARM DEBT REVIEW

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Some days ago, the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Wise, announced that there would be a review undertaken by the Farm Credit Corporation of its loans in default and of the entire problem of agricultural credit and possible bankruptcies. Although it is a welcome announcement, I would like to know whether there has been undertaken, anywhere within the government, a broad review of the farm debt load, the danger of bankruptcies and the more and more frequent foreclosures. My feeling is that this is a serious situation, indeed, that the banks are moving in on very many farmers, that this whole problem of an expanded debt load held by farmers will have to be addressed and that there will have to be some adjustment made in the broad scope of those debts so that producers will have a chance to pay those obligations in the future.

My question is: Is there a review being undertaken which is more broad than that of the Farm Credit Corporation's policy itself?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think that my honourable friend knows that the minister has taken a number of steps to help alleviate the credit crisis in western Canada. He has, of course, set up the advisory committees, which are able to consider hardship cases and make recommendations on a voluntary basis. This has, I think, been well received as being a useful initiative in identifying hardship cases. I think he has been reasonably successful in dealing with that aspect of the problem. He has also established a freeze on foreclosures under the Canada Farm Credit Arrangements, which I think is a well considered measure in view of the circumstances that arise.

My honourable friend is really alluding to a farm credit crisis which is continent-wide. In fact, if I may hazard an opinion, it is a lot worse in the United States than it is in Canada.

When the minister is looking into the farm credit situation in western Canada, I am confident in saying that he will consider not only his direct departmental responsibilities but the more general aspects of the problem as well.

Senator Argue: If I might say so, the minister's reply is not very specific. I was really zeroing in on whether or not there is any review being undertaken by the government of the broad aspect of farm credit and the ever increasing number of bankruptcies and foreclosures undertaken, in particular, by the banks of this country. I know farmers personally who will be foreclosed upon by the banks in a very few days. My question was more directed toward a review of that kind of activity.

I understand what the minister has said. All of the measures he mentioned are welcome, but I wonder whether the whole question of the huge debt—particularly the bank debt—borne at present by the farmers is being looked at.

Senator Roblin: The whole question is being looked at. My honourable friend's next question will be: When will the answers be forthcoming?

Senator Argue: That is right.

Senator Roblin: My reply, in answer to that, is that they will only be forthcoming after there has been a thorough examination of the matter.

Senator Argue: Is the minister telling me that there is a particular review going on now within the government on the question of farm debt? I have in mind a specific review as opposed to general consideration; I have in mind something that will result in a report containing recommendations.

Senator Roblin: The matter is being studied. When policy is formulated, my friend will be informed about it.

Senator Argue: That is a very bad answer.

Senator Roblin: That is the best answer you have had on the subject for a long time.

Senator Argue: You may be right, at that.

Senator Roblin: The answer is a little better than the question; I will say that.

MEXICO

EARTHQUAKE DISASTER—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Has he any information concerning possible new initiatives taken by this government in respect of Canada's assistance to the earthquake victims in Mexico?

[Senator Roblin.]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some information on that matter. If my honourable friend wants me to do so, I shall give to him some of the details.

An allocation of $1 million of CIDA emergency assistance has been made to private sector organizations such as the Red Cross and UNICEF that are working in Mexico. A fund of $250,000 has been provided for the embassy itself in Mexico to deal with emergencies that come to its notice that require quick action. There is some money there.

A Canadian Buffalo aircraft is assisting in the relief effort, moving people and material into Mexico, and a 14-man rescue team with medical and surgical supplies is being lifted to Mexico by a Hercules aircraft at the request of the authorities of that country.

We have been monitoring the whole situation to see what other measures could usefully be proposed. We are very conscious of the fact that it is the Government of Mexico to whom we must look for some advice as to what kind of help and assistance they wish us to provide, but we believe that the measures I have announced in this brief recital have received their approval.

We are also trying to assist private sector organizations that require some co-ordination of efforts that the government could provide to help them to zero in on the problem.

So we are conscious of the magnitude of the disaster. A 200-bed emergency hospital has been offered, but so far as I am aware, it has not yet been accepted by the Government of Mexico.

On the whole, we are taking measures that we hope will help the situation and we stand ready to do more if asked to do so.

Senator Bosa: As a supplementary, could the Leader of the Government identify the private organizations to which he referred in his response?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, those that have already been given government funding are the Red Cross, UNICEF and PAHO. I believe the latter is a local organization. I am not familiar with that acronym, so I cannot tell the honourable senator what it stands for.

We are also in touch with Red Cross and church groups in Canada that are pooling their resources to help in this matter.

EARTHQUAKE DISASTER—PROVINCE OF ALBERTA ACTION

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, with my usual and traditional courtesy, I lost my question to Senator Bosa but I congratulate him on his interest, and I appreciate the minister's reply. I would like to take this opportunity to say that I was most impressed by the fact that in the province of Alberta there was, in action and organization, an important group which, as I understand it, is now active in providing help in connection with the terrible tragedy that occurred in Mexico. I hope that the minister will commend to the government the view that other provinces might follow the example of that magnificent, progressive and Conservative province in the great west.

CROWN CORPORATIONS DISSOLUTION AUTHORIZATION BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-60, to authorize procurement of the dissolution of certain Crown corporations and to amend or repeal other Acts in consequence thereof.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN INSTITUTE FOR INTERNATIONAL PEACE AND SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay, for the second reading of the Bill C-69, intituled: "An Act to amend the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security Act and certain other Acts in relation thereto".—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator MacEachen is indisposed today with a bad cold. I know that he had looked forward to proceeding with this order. I sent him some material over the weekend so that he could prepare himself to go ahead today. I hope that he will be here later in the week. If it turns out that the honourable senator cannot speak to the matter this week, we will try to have someone else speak to it.

● (1425)

Senator Macquarrie: He is worth waiting for.

Senator Frith: I shall tell him you said so.

Order stands.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

MOTION TO EXAMINE AND REPORT ON FILM ENTITLED "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the activities of the National Film Board with respect to the production and distribution of the film "The Kid who Couldn't Miss".—(Honourable Senator Gigantès).

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I regret that Senator Molson is not here. His very proper, very understandable and very honourable concern about this issue is a reflection of his decency and of his patriotism. However, I feel that I must speak against his motion and his recommendation that this issue be sent to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. Obviously, from what Senator Molson has said to us, he is concerned about the reputation of Billy Bishop and the damage that was done to his reputation by a National Film Board film. Therefore, his purpose, as I understand it, is to have the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee examine this issue and, perhaps, to provide a forum for restoring the reputation of Billy Bishop, if his reputation has, indeed, been damaged by this film.

I will attempt to prove that the procedure suggested by Senator Molson may further damage the reputation of Billy Bishop and may be harmful to the Senate itself. One could say that this film—which I have seen and which upset me—is a revisionist film. It tries, as is being tried by many contemporary historians who did not live the events, to prove that a god had feet of clay. All our gods have always had feet of clay. Some of us who are not gods have feet of clay up to our Adam's apples, and I am sure I am one of those. But there are revisionist historians around. The producer based the film on the texts of some of these historians, who try to get themselves published by examining an accepted fact and proving that those who accepted it were wrong to accept it.

Let me confess that as a historian I sought in my academic endeavours to prove that the Spartans in the fifth century B.C. were wicked and that the Athenians were always fine. I approached academic work, because it is the way it is approached, to try to demonstrate that the accepted truths are poorly based, and thereby gain some academic notoriety. All academics do this. One academic who was working for me while I was a university dean wrote a paper describing how he had induced a certain behaviour in rats by torturing them. That was published. Then he would erase that behaviour from the same rats by a new series of even more fiendish tortures. That is academic work. The point is that attacks on Billy Bishop have been printed in certain journals. If the Senate conducts the inquiry Senator Molson suggests and the producer accepts the invitation to appear before the committee, he is bound to defend himself by bringing forth, not only the texts, but the authors of those texts, which have attacked the reputation of Billy Bishop. and, in so doing, will probably further damage the reputation of Billy Bishop and cause further adverse publicity for what, after all, is one of the great and precious legends of this land. The advice that a wise public relations officer would give to his minister would be, "If you are being attacked in the newspaper, unless you absolutely must answer, don't; it will only protract the attack and cause a new one." In the same fashion, for the sake of Billy Bishop's reputation, I think we should drop this matter.

Let us also look at what it would do to the Senate. In my view, this will be interpreted by the press as an attempt at censorship—and it is an attempt at censorship. What are we going to do? Ask them to retract the film? Make a new film? We will appear merely as a group of well-intentioned but misguided people who take something that has already been published and has appeared, and pick it over to try to prove that those who made that film were wrong. The press will not take kindly to it. I know there are many people in this chamber who do not take kindly to the press, but the press has more weapons than we have; they will have a field day with us. They will think that we are absurd, over-aged fuddy-duddies, interfering with a legitimate process—historical revisionism—in trying to tell a film maker, or any other creative person, how to do his or her job.

There was a committee called the Committee of Privileges in the other chamber which examined the behaviour of the press with respect to articles that appeared in The Gazette attacking certain political figures and certain of their businessmen associates. The reaction in the press was not favourable to that investigation, yet most people in the other chamber believed that they had the right to carry out that investigation.

The activities of that committee did not enhance its reputation. On the contrary, in the eyes of the press and in the eyes of the people, as the press presented the proceedings, the reputation of that committee was damaged. In the end, the weight of the evidence showed that perhaps the committee should have stayed right out of that area.

What I am saying to you, honourable senators, is that for the sake of Billy Bishop, let us not get into this argument. I would urge you to reject this motion by the Honourable Senator Molson, even though I appreciate he has the finest motives in proposing it.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I had not planned to speak on this matter but I do feel I should make one or two comments on the points made by Senator Gigantès.

First, I do not think that looking into the use of taxpayers' money by the National Film Board on a matter of this sort can be described as an attempt at censorship. If this were done in the private sector by any private film maker or book publisher, that would be acceptable in a free country such as Canada. The question that the committee can look at is whether or not taxpayers' dollars should be used by a collection of jerks to produce trash of this sort.

As for the old fuddy-duddies in the Senate being criticized by the press for looking into this matter, several of the old fuddy-duddies in this chamber were not old enough to fight in the First World War, but certainly were in the second. I cannot see why the committee should feel constrained to enter into a long debate with the producer and others involved in this film. I do not know whether I would, in fact, even call them before the committee. I think the committee can simply examine this matter on the question of whether or not this is a proper use of the money of the Canadian taxpayers, and for that reason I would certainly recommend that the matter be referred to the committee.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE

GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Gigantès calling the attention of the Senate to the Strategic Defense Initiative—(Honourable Senator Hicks).

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I do not think that I need make a very extended speech in relation to this inquiry initiated by Senator Gigantès. However, I do want to record the fact that I disagree entirely with the view that he has taken. I am enough of a scientist, having taken my first degree in science some 50 years ago, to know that the likelihood of achieving a satisfactory solution by the Strategic Defense Initiative is very remote. I am also enough of a realist to understand that if there is scientific information to be discovered, that it is impossible for men not to pursue that discovery, and I think that this is exactly what will occur from President Reagan's proposals for the SDI.

I do not use the term Star Wars. I think it is a great shame that that term was ever invented, because this is not what the Strategic Defense Initiative is. It is an attempt to develop a defensive system against intercontinental and other ballistic missiles. I think that we cannot afford not to pursue this endeavour, even though my best judgment as a 50-year out-of-date scientist is that I think it is highly unlikely that we will succeed. People have said that if only one per cent of the weapons get through, this will still be disruptive. I do not think there is any likelihood that we can devise an umbrella that will filter out 99 per cent of the weapons. In fact, I would be surprised if we could devise an umbrella that would filter out 80 per cent of the weapons. It is a terrible prospect.

However, there is no question that the research involved in this SDI project will have tremendously interesting spin-offs which will relate to all kinds of scientific activities, and I do not think that Canada can afford to be isolated from this research. Therefore, I would go completely the other way. I do not think that the Prime Minister was right in saying that Canada will not participate, but we will allow our universities and our business enterprises to participate. I think Canada should be in on this research and this project, and I think that we should have the advantage of the scientific and technical spin-off, which is bound to occur as a result of this great initiative.

Therefore I say with reluctance—because I respect his opinions very much—I differ with the view stated by Senator Gigantès. I think that Canada should be in on this project, but I would like it to be perfectly clearly understood that I do not expect that the result will be the creation of an umbrella which will protect us 100 per cent from intercontinental ballistic missiles or anything like that. However, in my opinion, if the job is to be done, Canada ought not to stand on the sidelines. We ought to be involved; we ought to have the benefit of the technology and the scientific developments that are bound to accompany an inquiry of this terrific magnitude.

On motion of Senator Godfrey, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Davey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the Senate authorize arrangements for radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and those of its committees,

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, that the motion be not now adopted, but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.—(Honourable Senator Frith.)

● (1440)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not intend to be very long in my intervention, simply because the Honourable Senator Davey has said almost everything I had intended to say when he introduced the motion. However, I do wish to say something about Senator Phillips' intervention and his motion in amendment. Senator Phillips suggested in his amendment that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. I think that some honourable senators would question whether that is the appropriate committee to which to refer this motion. Some honourable senators may think that it should be referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. I simply invite participation on that because I am not sure myself. Perhaps we should do what we have done on previous occasions; that is, refer the motion to the Standing Rules and Orders Committee and then to the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee, because there is a dimension to the amendment which raises questions that should be dealt with by the Standing Rules and Orders Committee, as well as questions that concern the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

With respect to the observations made on the main motion by the Honourable Senator Phillips, the thrust of many of his comments related to—and perhaps he was only joking—an aspect of the proposal that I do not think is relevant. He suggested in several ways and on several occasions during his intervention that there are facilities available for those honourable senators who wish to appear on television, implying that the only purpose of televising the proceedings of the Senate, and the proceedings of its committees, would be to give would be Thespians an opportunity to appear on television.

The question, of course, is whether the televising of the proceedings of the Senate would benefit the Senate and senators only because they are members of the Senate, rather than give them a personal benefit. I think it is clearly a question of weighing the pros and cons. I say that because, as honourable senators know, there are arguments to be made on both sides. Any senator could, if asked, take the brief for televising proceedings of the Senate and its committees and come up with many arguments in favour. I know that I could come up with many arguments against. So, what we are left with is an attempt to try to balance out whether, in the long run and on the whole, the Senate of Canada would benefit by the televising of its debates. I know there is divided opinion on this question.

For example, one issue we must weigh is the question of attendance. Those opposed to televising the proceedings of the Senate will say that there are some days when there is poor attendance in the chamber, and that would reflect badly on the Senate. For example, today I see perhaps 30 or 35 senators present; last Thursday, 80 honourable senators were present. That translates into about 80 per cent. That attendance record is spotty, but it is spotty in the other place as well.

I base my judgment on this question on the experience gained by the televising of the proceedings of the House of Commons. The House of Commons has benefited immeasurably from the televising of its proceedings. It, too, has had its ups and downs. We all know that there have been problems. But, on balance, I believe Parliament has benefited by the televising of the proceedings of the House of Commons.

If the proceedings of the Senate were televised, the Canadian public could see what actually takes place in the Senate, not only in terms of attendance, but in terms of the quality of debate. In my opinion, the quality of debate in the Senate is better than the quality of debate in the House of Commons; therefore, we have nothing to be ashamed of and nothing to be hesitant about in terms of showing the country what the Senate of Canada does.

Will there be criticisms? Will there be negative results? Of course there will. Again, the question is: On balance, will the Senate suffer more from having its debates televised than it would if they were not? It seems to me that there is no doubt that by having the people of Canada see what takes place in the Senate—and we know that most of them have no idea what takes place in the Senate and that some of them do not even know that a Senate exists—the Senate will benefit. The Canadian people will then know what the Senate actually does.

Another important dimension of our work is that done by the Senate committees, and honourable senators are proud of the work done by Senate committees. I venture to say that there is not one senator who, on some occasion, has not boasted about the work done by Senate committees, and for good reason. Many times during a Senate committee hearing I have wished the proceedings were being televised so that the Canadian people might see the level of investigation, the virtual absence of partisanship, and the informed line of questioning pursued by senators. They would also have seen how legislation has been improved and other inquiries have been more meaningful from studies undertaken by Senate committees. Again, on balance, there is no doubt that televising the proceedings of the committees of the Senate would benefit the Senate.

Those who accepted appointments to the Senate did so because they believed in the Senate. They believe that the Senate does good work for the country, has done good work for the country and will continue to do good work for the country. They continue to be senators because of that. They attend Senate sittings because they believe there is useful work to be done, and they attend meetings of committees because they believe there is useful work to be done for the country. With the media means at our disposal up to now, including the press, Hansard, radio, print in various other forms—in articles and reviews—for over one hundred years we have not really been able to communicate why we think the Senate serves a useful purpose, and that senators work hard and effectively at their jobs. We have not been able to do that; television, in my view, will do that.

Therefore, I support the main motion and have only some reservations as to the committee to which the matter should be referred. I do not think there is any question that the Senate should decide in favour of the principle of televising its debates and the proceedings of its committees. After doing so, the Senate should refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, or to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

[Translation]

END OF DECADE WOMEN'S CONFERENCE

MEETING HELD AT NAIROBI, KENYA

Hon. Paul D. David rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, September 19, 1985:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace, held at Nairobi, Kenya, from 15th to 26th July, 1985.

He said: Honourable senators, before expressing some thoughts inspired by the World Conference on the United Nations Decade for Women, I wish to thank you for your cordial and friendly welcome since my swearing-in on April 25 of this year.

When I accepted the responsibilities of a senator, it was because I was tempted to follow in the footsteps of my grandfather, Laurent-Olivier, who was appointed to the Senate by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1903, and my father Athanase, appointed to the Senate by Mackenzie King in 1940.

[Senator Frith.]

I feel a little like Laurent-Olivier, who wrote in the preface to his last book, "Au soir de la vie" (1924):

I believe that when a man has been involved in all the things of this world for more than 50 years . . . he should say what he has seen and observed, pointing out what could be useful to his fellow citizens and guide them, helping them avoid the errors and mistakes he may have made himself. At a time in life when he is no longer driven by passion or self-interest, I think a man has a right to believe that his comments and advice are of some value.

I would like to quote a passage from the book "En marge de la politique" by Athanase David (1934), Chapter 3, (page 180), which I find illuminating.

Only one quality can enhance the strength of an ideal that is deeply anchored in the history of a nation and that is an optimism that is both prudent and reasonable . . . Let politicians remember the role they are supposed to play. They must give instructions. They must tell the people the truth about what our goal is. And our goal, the only one we can consider without betraying our traditions, is to perpetuate in Canada the concept that formed the basis for the creation of this country.

I was very moved by what was said by Senator Riel, who paid tribute to my mother, the daughter of a politician who was a minister in Quebec City and the niece of an uncle who was a minister in Ottawa. She was a woman of action, who dedicated her life to music, creating the Montreal Festival and the Montreal Symphony Orchestra, and who did so with endless patience and perseverance. It was her dedication that gave me a taste for action and for challenging situations. It was her example that led me to found, direct and develop the Institut de Cardiologie de Montréal.

At the end of my 31 years' service at this centre for hospital care, teaching, preventive medicine, rehabilitation and research, I was looking forward to my retirement when I would be able to concentrate on reading and writing, philosophy and working with volunteer community and health organizations.

A surprise call from our Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, put an end to my retirement of three and a half months! I am counting on your goodwill and experience, honourable senators, to help me appreciate the joys of politics, avoid its pitfalls and maintain at all times the requisite will to promote essential values, and ensure that our young people will have a future full of hope, peace and success, in a country known for its tradition of hospitality, understanding, mediation, diversity and progress.

I am ready to serve those admirable objectives to the best of my knowledge and ability. You can count on my co-operation, my work, my availability and my friendship.

Honourable senators, before starting my report on the United Nations Conference on the Women's Decade, I would like to add, of course, honourable "sénatrices".

Kenya's capital became last July the world capital of women, with the attendance of approximately 3,000 delegates at the conference, and 8,000 others at the non-government body forum.

That historic event certainly will have spin-offs in all countries, especially developing countries. Even though official speeches did not always reflect a verifiable reality, each delegation head pointed to the considerable efforts made in his or her country for promoting women.

Women have become very much aware that they represent 50 per cent of humanity. In order to act and succeed, they rely on global solidarity, which is reflected in an ideal of change, transformation and sharing.

That new power of women will have to be accepted, assumed and shared in every area of human endeavour. In order to reach the goals set, the conference agreed on objectives for the year 2000.

These objectives are stated in a manifesto containing approximately 350 sections. The media placed much greater emphasis on 50 odd proposals that could hardly make unanimity, than on the 300 others that were approved as submitted by the drafting committees. After many speeches, negotiations, compromises and amendments, the over-all document finally was accepted in extremis by consensus, on Saturday the 27th at about 4 o'clock a.m.

A reading of that document is strongly recommended to all men and women who have confidence and believe in a better and different world, thanks to the active, equal and idealized participation of women. I personally doubt that a miracle, even a feminine one, might speedily change the traditions, habits, behaviours and systems of the various civilizations that have been sharing our planet for thousands of years.

Indeed, is not the over-all objective of universal happiness a dream that has always haunted our thoughts? It is perhaps the more or less depressing failure of this male-dominated world that should encourage us to trust and share that feminine ideal. In order to reach that goal, all countries join together in proposing as a priority three essential means: equality of the sexes, peace between nations within an absolute respect for their autonomy, and a better balanced economic sharing.

One of the most positive results of the Decade of Women seems to have been a gigantic effort by all countries to try to correct the countless forms of discrimination faced by women. The heads of delegations, the great majority of which were women, each in turn described a favourable evolution: less restrictive access to education, better accessibility to college, professional and university training, equal pay for similar work, the right to vote, greater representation at the political, administrative and economic levels, and increasingly egalitarian legislation.

Despite those obvious efforts, most countries are still a long way from reaching that objective. Nonetheless, it is gratifying to see in everyone such an egalitarian concern and a political determination to eliminate within the best possible time frames the traditional forms of discrimination.

On the other hand, it is difficult to imagine the prospective autonomy of women in some countries, especially developing countries, with such high levels of reproduction rates and heavy burdens of work in the homes and in the fields. For example, the reproduction rate of Kenyan women exceeds seven, while that of the Canadian woman is barely two. Where is the equilibrium to be achieved? Neither in the perspective of overpopulated poor countries, nor in that of underpopulated rich countries. How can we harmoniously reconcile the evolution of a society with that of its individuals? In either direction, excesses will have regrettable consequences.

Peace, that most enviable goal, gave rise to many conflicts which threatened the success of the conference until its very conclusion. I must stress here, with immense satisfaction, the exceptional mediation role played by the Canadian delegation. Its members, especially the Hon. Minister Walter McLean, the High Commissioner in Kenya, Mr. David M. Miller, and Mmes. Maureen O'Neil and Julie Loranger, did an excellent job of conciliation and writing to put together texts which would be acceptable by all the groups which made up the General Assembly.

There are many obstacles to peace, such as racism, imperialism, interference with self-determination, the arms race, the state of war between certain countries and the lack of a country for certain wandering populations. As it concerns these very current issues, the words of women are strangely similar to those of men: they show the same aggressiveness, and the same argumentation, not to say the same fanaticism.

On the other hand, it is easy to understand the anxiety of the millions of women now involved in the process who suffer from the lack of any concrete hope for a short-term solution. They want to take action and to put right this violent world which, until now, has been largely dominated by men, who have been the major decision-makers. They want to play an active role of prevention and negotiation, and why not?

The representatives of developing countries insistently and urgently ask the wealthy countries to review the rules of the world economy game. For some of these countries, the famine was a catastrophe which decimated populations and forced thousands of residents to exile themselves in countries just as poor as they are. For others, export is the only way to achieve progress, on the condition, however, that they produce consumer goods and can ask prices that will be sufficient to improve their own standard of living. Finally, indebtedness has been worsened by increasingly harmful unemployment rates.

This tension gave rise to several vigorous and aggressive resolutions. However, compromises on wording cooled down the debate. It still remains that these softened resolutions hide glowing embers which the nations of the world would have every reason to consider positively before it is too late.

For us who live in Canada, our standard of living is naturally in great contrast to that of the enormous populations of African and Asian countries. We have heard the sometimes desperate pleas of these women, who have expressed their anxiety and have indirectly asked us for our understanding, help and solidarity. Our duty to share is obvious. However, do we have the financial means to do our duty without accepting individually and collectively a few essential sacrifices and constraints?

These countries do not have the means to reach a minimal standard of living. However, for our part, will we really be able to maintain our own standard of living, which is becoming increasingly superficial as our debt grows larger? These countries that think us wealthy have at least the hope to achieve wealth. As for us, who are indeed wealthy, can we accept being a little less so?

I would like to close by quoting passages from two books which deal with lucidity and courage with the status of women in Canada.

In 1971, Mrs. Thérèse Casgrain, who sat in this house for nine months, concluded her book "Une femme parmi les hommes" with the following remarks:

In spite of the few steps forward women have made toward their emancipation, they remain the prisoners of our society's prejudices. Our society must rid itself of its old notions of racism, violence and snobbism . . . The true liberation of women will not happen without the liberation of men . . . The challenge both men and women will have to face is that of living for a peaceful revolution—

More recently, in 1983, Mrs. Lysiane Gagnon, a journalist for the Montreal newspaper La Presse, concluded her book entitled "Vivre avec les hommes," with the following comments:

Sharing is based on mutual support and tenderness, it stems from love . . . Both men and women will benefit from their companions becoming fullfledged human beings and able to realize their most diverse aspirations. Love is only possible between equals. Otherwise, it is a constant and relentless power struggle, where each individual tries to negotiate, bypass, dominate or intrigue, force and manipulate. In this sense, it is indeed a new humanism which more and more women are proposing to men, a new humanism and a new way to love.

In the end, the thoughts of these two Canadian women are in line with the preoccupation of the Women's Conference in Nairobi.

I am pleased to have been your representative with the Canadian delegation. Nairobi was a stimulating experience which will remain a major step in the promotion and development of women. To conclude, may I suggest the future creation of a committee with equal representation, which could reconsider, with a Canadian perspective, the objectives of the conference and suggest means to reach the proposed objectives.

Honourable senators, I thank you for your kind attention.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Senator David, the comments you have just made demonstrate qualities of which honourable senators and others have been aware for a long time.

[Senator David]

You are a generous man, a great heart. As a matter of fact, you have taken care of a great many of them!

It is an honour for us to have you here. Thank you.

The Hon. the Speaker: Since no other honourable senator wishes to take part in this debate, this inquiry is deemed to have been debated.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO MEET DURING SITTINGS OF THE SENATE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Hon. Lowell Murray, pursuant to notice of Thursday, September 19, 1985, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which was authorized by the Senate on June 25, 1985, to study and report upon the documents entitled: "The Regulation of Canadian Financial Institutions: Proposals for Discussion" and "Final Report of the Working Committee on the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation (CDIC)", have power to sit at three thirty o'clock in the afternoon on Wednesdays and at three o'clock in the afternoon on Thursdays for the duration of the above-mentioned study, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

• (1510)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am sure there is no objection to this motion, but I wonder if I might adjourn the debate for one day. I make this request so that we may have a chance to consult. We will not put it off; we will deal with it tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE TO STUDY GOVERNMENT ACTIVITIES ON POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION AND TRAINING WITHDRAWN

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Saurel), pursuant to notice of Thursday, September 19, 1985, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the activities of the Government of Canada in its financial commitment to the support of post-secondary education and training; and

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such professional, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination.

He said: Honourable senators, last Thursday, September 19, I presented a Notice of Motion in this chamber. I would like to make an alteration to that motion.

With leave of the Senate and pursuant to rule 23, I would like to modify my motion to read as follows:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the activities of the Government of Canada in its financial support of post-secondary education and training; and

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such professional, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination.

The wording of the modified motion, which I have just read, is in keeping with the wish of the steering committee and with the wish of the National Finance Committee, members of both of which reviewed and approved the wording I have just read when it was discussed in committee on Thursday last.

Somehow, and quite inadvertently, the phrase "... Government of Canada in its financial commitment to the support of post-secondary education and training" crept into the Notice of Motion. It was not supposed to. The phrase "commitment to" had been proposed to, but expunged by, the steering committee.

The phrase which was approved and was supposed to appear in the Notice of Motion was to have read: "... Government of Canada in its financial support of post-secondary education and training;" as it does in the modified motion I have just read to honourable senators.

[Translation]

In the other official language, the following phrase will be amended:

... du gouvernement ayant trait à ses engagements financiers à l'appui de l'enseignement postsecondaire et la formation professionnelle;

It should have read:

... du gouvernement ayant trait à son appui financier à l'enseignement postsecondaire et à la formation professionnelle;

I ask for leave to amend the motion. I will explain it later.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion as amended by Senator Leblanc?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Will you explain it, Senator Leblanc?

Senator Leblanc: I will discuss the amended motion.

Senator Frith: Have we reached the point of approving the amendment to the motion?

The Hon. the Speaker: Shall the motion as amended by Senator Leblanc carry?

Senator Leblanc: We are only dealing with the amendment.

Senator Frith: We are dealing with the wording of the motion as amended by Senator Leblanc, on which we are agreed. We are not now dealing with the main motion.

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Your Honour, as I think someone has said, it not a question of amending the motion, because the mover cannot do that without consent. Would it not be better to withdraw the motion and, thereafter, submit the proper one? We can all have a look at it tomorrow. I understand from my colleague here that there is really no problem with the modified version, but perhaps that is the best way to go about it.

Senator Frith: Either way would require our consent. Certainly, we on this side of the chamber consent to the rewording of the motion or to its withdrawal and its being re-presented as reworded.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, for the sake of the record and for clarification, perhaps we should defer the matter until tomorrow and get the correct wording on the order paper. I know exactly what the honourable senator is talking about; I was privy to the discussions and changes of the wording. I did not for a minute expect that the unexpunged version would show up on the order paper. For the sake of the record, perhaps we can proceed with a new motion tomorrow.

Senator Leblanc: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that I read the motion as amended? No?

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is now proposed that the amended motion be presented tomorrow for the approval of the Senate.

Senator Frith: In the meantime, we agree to Senator Leblanc's withdrawal of his motion as it now stands.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do you agree to the withdrawal of the motion now under consideration?

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: I should like to make a comment.

Senator Leblanc: I have to ask leave to withdraw the motion. It is the usual procedure. It is normal that I be the one to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Once the motion has been withdrawn there will be no further items on our agenda.

Senator Leblanc: It is normal that I should ask leave to withdraw the motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted to withdraw the motion?

Senator Frith: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Senator Tremblay: With respect to the reworded motion, may I be allowed to point out to Senator Leblanc—

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: There is no longer any motion under consideration.

Senator Tremblay: It is merely a matter of wording.

Senator Corbin: Has the motion been duly withdrawn?

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes.

Senator Corbin: If such is the case, we have no more business. We are speaking in a vacuum. What are we doing at this moment?

Motion withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE TO STUDY GOVERNMENT ACTIVITIES ON POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION AND TRAINING

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Thursday, September 26, 1985, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the activities of the Government of Canada in its financial support of post-secondary education and vocational training; and prompted by the confusion that surrounds this issue day by day.

The first indication of confusion arose when the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Prime Minister appeared to disagree on when the Prime Minister first knew about this, and if not the Prime Minister himself, then the Prime Minister's Office. It is because the Prime Minister is involved and, I think, the Prime Minister's credibility, that the confusion should be settled. I am asking the Leader of the Government in the Senate to try to take some action to clear this up, because of his reputation as an experienced politician and a pretty cool customer, because the matter has not been characterized by actions taken by cool customers to date.

The Prime Minister said that he took immediate action as soon as he knew about the matter. He said the date on which he first knew about it was when the CBC program was aired.

The latest confusion, and certainly the latest grounds for doubting the credibility of the Prime Minister—a serious matter, of course—results from what a Conservative Member of Parliament, Fred McCain, has said, that is that he raised this question of the release of this doubtful and disapproved tuna with the Prime Minister before the program was aired. Apparently, that statement was changed again adding more to the confusion. Therefore, I ask the Leader of the Government if he can tell us, and through us the people of Canada, whether Mr. McCain raised the issue of the million cans of tainted tuna with any members of the government at any time before the program was aired and, if so, with whom?

● (1400)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have not seen the report to which my honourable friend refers but I willingly accept his word that that is the report. It appears that there are now two reports—namely, the original statement and a correction.

Speaking for myself, the issue was not raised with me and I think that it would be appropriate for me to take the question as notice so that I can ask some of my colleagues if it was raised with them. I certainly have no knowledge of it.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

SALE OF CANNED TUNA UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION— EXTENT OF KNOWLEDGE OF MEMBERS OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It relates to the tuna matter and is

BANKING

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK AND NORTHLAND BANK— DEPOSIT INSURANCE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to raise a question with respect to the undertakings, guarantees and so on that have been given by the government to the depositors in the Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank. I raised this question yesterday and I do so again today because I think there are a number of people whom I could quote, although I recall my own objections to quotations from newspapers when I occupied the position of Leader of the Government—

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): This is one time we won't object.

Senator Olson: I am not asking you to confirm or deny the newspaper report, but I will quote it just for background information.

Senator Flynn: Go ahead. Don't worry.

Senator Olson: It states:

The Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank might be the last to automatically receive total insurance on their $900-million of deposits over the $60,000 insurance limit.

That quote was in a national newspaper and in several others as well. That leads some of the people who have those deposits to believe that they have 100 per cent guarantee even beyond the $60,000 limit.

The reply yesterday was that there was no undertaking given, that the Leader of the Government knew of, respecting the deposits of Northland because it had not reached the stage where any would be expected, but it was said that the particular situation with respect to certain statements and undertakings that had been made some time earlier respecting the CCB justified the 100 per cent undertaking that the government took and made a commitment to.

Senator Roblin: I am very conscious of the fact that while ministers may make statements, Parliament will ultimately decide. The ultimate disposition of this question will depend on what happens when legislation has been introduced, but certainly it would be the intention of the government to propose such legislation, particularly with respect to the CCB. My honourable friend did ask me yesterday about the Northland Bank and I told him that, to the best of my knowledge, no statement had been made. The second time around, I entered the caveat that I would like to be perfectly sure I am correct. Therefore, I took that question as notice and, when I receive a reply, one way or the other, I will let my honourable friend know.

Senator Olson: I have a supplementary question, and whether or not we get a reply today is not important; tomorrow or some later day would suffice.

The Leader of the Government, in response to the question respecting the guarantee given to depositors with the CCB, said that that policy "was dictated by the circumstances of that particular situation because certain statements had been made and undertakings had been given by various authorities which bore on the decision to act" in the way the government did. Could we have a little expansion on the particular situation—what statements were made, and by whom?

I want to be perfectly clear about this and that is why I am asking this question. It seems to me that we are getting very close to a situation where some statements may have been given by people who did not have the authority to commit the government. If that has happened, I think we should know about it because in this situation we are not talking about some small change. There is, or appears to be, almost $1 billion at stake in this situation.

Senator Roblin: I appreciate the point my honourable friend is making. I think, however, that rather than attempt to debate the issue or to define the circumstances in Question Period I would be better advised to say that those matters will be completely exposed or explained when the bill comes before us. That is when we will be trying to justify the bill and when we will be making statements as to the basis on which that recommendation is made.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my purpose in raising this matter today is to alert the Leader of the Government to the fact that there is some curiosity about this and we will be asking about it.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend. There is more than curiosity; there is real concern on the part of the people in the Northland Bank as to what happened to their money, and no one shares that concern more than members of the government. We are most anxious to come to a final decision on the matter. I tell my honourable friend that when that is possible we will be as prompt as we can in advising him.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Is it the policy of the government to carry out assurances given by the Governor of the Bank of Canada?

Senator Roblin: I believe the answer I gave to my honourable friend, Senator Olson, applies to the question asked by my honourable friend, Senator Sinclair, because the question as to who said what to whom and what guarantees were offered, I think, will all be dealt with in the bill. That certainly will form part of the discussion which will take place in the committee of this house with respect to that bill when it is received.

I think it is appropriate to suggest that those inquiries would be better placed at that time.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, the reason I asked the question was because yesterday, at page 1267 of Debates of the Senate, I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate certain questions. Part of one of my questions was as follows:

... the reason I phrased the question as I did was because of the honourable senator's statement, in answer to Senator Olson, that government officials had given assurances in regard to CCB deposits.

He seemed to indicate that he knew of some assurances given in that regard, and I was asking whether any assurance of a similar nature from similar people or their assistants was given to the banks.

● (1410)

Arising out of that my question is: If senior government officials gave assurances to the banks that their advances would be treated as if they were deposits, upon liquidation of the CCB, will the government stand behind them to ensure the protection of the shareholders of these banks?

Senator Roblin: I re-read Hansard this morning, I must confess, and my honourable friend has quoted me correctly. I have come to the conclusion that I had better allow Governor Bouey to speak for himself rather than interpret his views through my statements during Question Period. I think that it would be more satisfactory to my honourable friend and, indeed, fairer to the governor of the bank if I allowed him the opportunity to explain his statements when the time comes.

Senator Sinclair: I am sure that all honourable senators respect Governor Bouey and would want him to have an opportunity to comment on what he had to say. That, however, is not my question. My question is this: What is the government policy? Government policy to support statements made by the governor of the bank is one thing. I can understand that. My question is: Is it government policy to support statements that may have been made by senior officials to the banks with regard to the protection of moneys advanced by the banks at the request of the government?

Senator Roblin: I think government policy in that regard will be perfectly clear when the bill respecting the CCB comes down. Those matters will be part of the legislation or, if they are not, they will be legitimate subjects for examination at that time.

Senator Sinclair: Am I to take it from the honourable senator's reply that a bill will come down and that that bill will deal with the position of the banks in terms of whether they are to recover the moneys they advanced at the end of March?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend will have to wait until he sees the bill in order to find out whether it contains that specific provision. If it does not, he will be perfectly at liberty to examine the question at that time.

Senator Olson: The obvious question is: Does the government now have a policy with respect to this whole matter or are we to see what the policy might be when the bill comes in? That is the question. What is the policy? If the government does not have one, perhaps the minister could say that.

Senator Roblin: The government has a policy, all right, but I believe that it is customary for government policy to be expressed in a bill. That is where honourable senators will find it.

CULTURAL HERITAGE AND NATIONAL IDENTITY

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, on June 19, 1985, while speaking in the debate on the Investment Canada bill, I posed a series of nine specific questions about the government's attitude towards our cultural independence. I stated that they were not rhetorical questions and that I was anxious to find out how seriously this government takes its commitment to Canadian cultural survival. Perhaps it is because I did not put these questions forward in Question Period that I have not yet received any reply. If I may, then, I will put the nine questions on the record for the benefit of the Leader of the Government.

(1) Will this government continue to guarantee that all newspapers published in Canada, and all radio and television cable stations in Canada, will continue to be owned and operated by Canadians?

(2) Will this government give Canadians an ongoing commitment to public broadcasting in general, and to the CBC in particular? Can we be assured that the CBC, as we know it, will continue to serve Canada?

(3) Will this government continue to enforce Canadian content requirements on both radio and television?

(4) Will this government continue to protect Canadian magazine publishers by continuing to eliminate the tax deduction for Canadian advertisers buying space in American media?

(5) Will this government commit itself to the policy of its Liberal predecessor when it comes to government advertising? That is, that all advertising on behalf of the Government of Canada, appearing in Canada, will be created and executed exclusively by Canadian advertising agencies?

(6) Will the government continue to support Canadian broadcasters with such all-important policies as the substitution of simultaneous American programs on cable, the deletion of American advertising on cable, and, of course, the aforementioned elimination of the tax deduction for Canadian advertisers buying time on American television?

(7) What specific steps is the government prepared to take to protect the Canadian book publishing industry?

(8) What specific steps is this government prepared to take to protect the Canadian film industry?

(9) Will this government guarantee the future of the Canadian Football League by spelling out in specific terms that American professional football will be neither desirable nor welcome in Canada?

I have an additional question today for the Leader of the Government. As he knows, Time Inc. abandoned its Canadian ownership nearly ten years ago, after the Liberal government passed a law that stated that advertising could not be a deductible tax expense unless it appeared in a periodical that was 75 per cent Canadian owned and had 80 per cent Canadian editorial content.

Honourable senators, directly as a result of this legislation, the Canadian magazine industry flourished as never before. For example, Macleans doubled its advertising revenue and was able to become a Canadian weekly news magazine.

Time Inc. in New York is now attempting to resurrect a Canadian edition in a joint venture with Comac Communications of Toronto.

Senator Flynn: Ask the question!

Senator Davey: Comac would have 75 per cent control of a revised Canadian edition of Time while Time Inc. would put up $20 million for 25 per cent control.

Senator Flynn: Come to the question.

Senator Davey: I am coming to the question. This neat little arrangement would require Revenue Canada's approval under section 19 of the Income Tax Act, which was designed as an advertising shelter for Canadian magazines.

Senator Flynn: Order!

Senator Davey: Can the Leader of the Government confirm—or, I hope, deny—the assertion by a Comac director that Revenue Canada has already ruled that this scheme does meet all of the necessary requirements?

Senator Flynn: Good speech.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yes, I do recall my honourable friend's speech of June 19. It was so kind of him to repeat it. I am now doubly informed. I can say to my honourable friend that he knows as well as I do that the questions he has asked are not susceptible of being answered during normal oral Question Period. However, I can assure him that in view of his interest in the problem, and my interest in him, I will read his questions over very carefully to ascertain those to which I may properly reply. In that case, I will regard those as an order for return.

Senator Davey: Honourable senators, in particular, there is some current relevancy to my tenth question relating to Time magazine.

Senator Flynn: We have heard that. You have already made a speech on that point.

Senator Davey: I hope the honourable senator enjoyed it. I hope that we shall get the answer more quickly—

Senator Flynn: I have heard it three times.

Senator Davey: You will hear it again and again. I have a further supplementary question. Recently, the Prime Minister appeared on the Betty Kennedy show on CFRB, Toronto, and said that he was aware of this new so-called Canadian edition of Time, but that he was aware of "nothing to give it much credence."

In view of the government's repeated assertion that it is protecting our cultural integrity, can the leader confirm that the Prime Minister is, in fact, prepared officially to reject this new proposal?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I can confirm that the advertising policy of the present government is considerably different from that of its predecessors. To begin with, it is a lot less. We are spending a lot less money in that particular field.

Senator Davey: I want to know if—

Senator Roblin: The honourable senator has made his little speech, and I guess I will now make my little speech. The advertising policy is different, because we are not spending so much money on that particular aspect. I must tell my honourable friend that our economies in advertising will be widely appreciated by the Canadian public. There will be no more of those little geese flying around on my television screen, or any of those indications of Canadian sovereignty which my honourable friends failed to deliver on during their term of office.

Senator Frith: You are getting a lot of free advertising in connection with tuna.

Senator Roblin: Well, tuna is a pretty good issue these days. We will have lots of fun on the fish front. My honourable friends are encouraged to make the most of it, because they will find that—

Senator Frith: There will be another like it before long.

Senator Roblin: Well, there usually is something new to come along from time to time. I, for one, am well prepared for these little incidents that occur. If they provide my honourable friend with some amusement, I certainly would not object.

● (1420)

With regard to the Canadian football situation, I am glad to know that it has been elevated to an item on the agenda of the state. I shall certainly have to try to answer my honourable friend's question, for I know perfectly well that until I do he will not give me any peace. He wants to see this subject pursued to the bitter end, and I will do what I can to oblige him.

With regard to the Time matter, all we know, from what my honourable friend has said, is what is reported in the papers and the statement made by the Minister of National Revenue, none of which adds up to a concrete action in respect of the proposal to re-institute Time in Canada. That is a subject to which the government will certainly give its attention, as and when it becomes a matter that is properly before it.

What I do want to say is that we will take second place to none in our concern to preserve the cultural integrity of this nation. We are as well aware as any other group of Canadians of the importance of culture in our economy, in our social structure and underlying our individual Canadian sovereignty and nationality. We understand these things very well, and I would not like it to be thought from the series of questions that have been posed that the government is weakening in any way in its adherence to that principle. It does not mean that every little breeze that blows in the cultural field is important enough to attract the attention of the administrative arm of the state. However, many items in the field of culture will attract the support of the organs of the state. I might also say that in spite of some of the controversy there may be in the public at large, the present Minister of Communications is well aware of his responsibilities in this matter, and I think he can be relied upon to discharge those responsibilities in a manner which is suitable.

Senator Frith: I guess one good speech deserves another.

Senator Davey: Honourable senators, I spoke favourably of the minister in my speech, and I accept both the comments made by the leader and the spirit in which they were made. However, if the government lets Time in the back door, it will make a mockery of what it has been saying.

Senator Frith: Well said, sir.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend need not become indignant until he sees how the facts develop. My suspicion is that he will find himself well satisfied.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. As he may know, a major rally is to be held in Saskatchewan, in front of the legislative buildings, this coming Friday at about noon. Farmers and their leaders are very concerned that the government has made no announcement of assistance, particularly to the grain producers in the drought areas in western Canada and especially the drought area in Saskatchewan.

I am wondering if the Leader of the Government can tell the Senate whether or not there will likely be an announcement before the rally or even at the rally. The producers anticipated an announcement before this time and are certainly anticipating one by the time of the rally. Can the leader say whether some encouraging news may be forthcoming?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this must be the second, third, or is it the fourth time, that my honourable friend has encouraged me to make some announcement on behalf of the government with respect to this very serious problem. I think I told him on the first occasion that the matter is being studied by a special committee that is on the spot and that its recommendations will be available shortly. I think I told him that it is unlikely that that report will be available for the end of the month, and I have no information that would indicate any change.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I might just say that that is disappointing news to me. For the information of the Leader of the Government, this rally was originally to be staged on September 6. It was postponed for three weeks in the belief that there would be an announcement forthcoming from the government within that period and that the producers would have something of a positive nature to discuss at that rally. I learned this information from those who are leading the rally.

Senator Roblin: Without being able to give any detail, I am under the impression that, when the statement is made, it will be found to be a considerable improvement over the present situation. However, I have to tell my honourable friend that, while I appreciate his interest, there is no use in nagging me, if I may use his expression, to get the answer before it is ready. It cannot be produced without full consideration by a number of government departments, and from his own experience my honourable friend knows that this is not always a quick and easy process. We are sympathetic and we intend to do the best we can, but I will have to ask my friend to be patient until we have the information.

[Senator Davey.]

Senator Argue: I understand what the Leader of the Government is saying, but I do think that individual senators have a duty to raise these questions in the Senate. From past experience I am quite certain that what we say filters through to the authorities and sometimes may result in some action a little earlier than would have been the case if we had not raised the matter.

Senator Roblin: I would not like my honourable friend to think I was trying to discourage him. I regard that as an impossible task, to begin with. Even if it were possible, I would not like to try it.

Senator Frith: You are on the right track.

Senator Roblin: I have no objection to his asking the questions, but I am trying to be as candid as I can with him about the timing of the answers that I am able to give.

Senator Argue: We will weep for another 48 hours, then.

Senator Flynn: You can do that for a much longer period. You can weep all the time.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

POSSIBLE PRIVATIZATION OF PETRO-CANADA

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I would like to ask whether the federal government's policy on privatization of crown corporations applies also to Petro-Canada.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): In a general way, I can say that the principle of privatization will be considered in respect of any crown corporation. However, I am not in a position at the present moment to deal with his specific request for information about Petro-Canada, because that is a matter which, if and when it becomes ripe, is one which the minister in that department will be the first to announce, although I may be given the second chance at it. I cannot give my friend any information of a positive nature at the moment.

Senator Haidasz: I have a further question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Are we, then, to understand that the present rumour on Bay Street that blocks of shares of Petro-Canada are imminently for sale is false?

Senator Roblin: I know my honourable friend does not expect me to confirm or deny rumours on Bay Street.

BANKING

COLLAPSE OF CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—PROTECTION OF PENSION FUNDS

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Last Friday, I attended a banquet to mark the fortieth anniversary of the CNR Credit Union, in London, Ontario. At that banquet I was asked a great many questions about the CNR and Air Canada pension funds that were on deposit with the Canadian Commercial Bank.

As honourable senators will recall, on March 29, I asked the Minister of State (Finance) a series of ten questions during her attendance here in this chamber. One of the answers the minister gave me at that time was:

I just want to assure the honourable senator that the pension fund is safe because there is a combined benefit plan.

Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate could tell me what that benefit plan consists of, and where it is located.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): If my honourable friend is talking about a deposit with the Canadian Commercial Bank by the institutions that he has mentioned, I think that it is quite probable that they will be included in the guarantee of depositors that will be contained in the forthcoming bill. If it is another matter, then it is something I will have to take as notice because I have no immediate information on the matter. Perhaps that could be elucidated.

Senator Turner: Honourable senators, on June 5, the honourable Minister of State (Finance) sent me a reply to my question as follows:

In response to your question concerning the protection afforded to the various pension funds by the support package, you should be aware that there is no guarantee that the pension funds are fully protected.

Why has the minister given me two answers to the same question?

Senator Roblin: Unless I know the nature of the financial relationship between the pension funds and the bank I am unable to understand what my honourable friend is driving at. Were these pension funds on deposit in the bank, or is the relationship something other than that? That has to be made clear.

● (1430)

I know that my honourable friend is seeking information, so if he would be kind enough to give me the correspondence he has on the matter, so that I can understand more clearly, I will attempt to obtain a better answer for him, if that is what he is looking for.

Senator Turner: I sent the minister ten questions and asked for ten answers. I would be quite happy if I received those answers.

Senator Roblin: Could my honourable friend let me have the correspondence so that I can take it up with the minister?

BONN ECONOMIC SUMMIT 1985

TECHNOLOGY, GROWTH AND EMPLOYMENT WORKING GROUP REPORT

Question No. 10 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Lorna Marsden:

11th June—With regard to the reference made in paragraph 18 of the Final Communiqué of the Bonn Economic Summit 1985 to a report from the Technology, Growth and Employment Working Group on the work done in the eighteen areas of co-operation, (i) has this report been made public to Canadians; (ii) if so, how can Canadians obtain it; (iii) if not, why not?

Reply from the Secretary of State for External Affairs:

(i) Yes

(ii) By contacting the Media Relations Division, National Research Council or the Science, Technology and Communications Division, Department of External Affairs.

TECHNOLOGICAL DEVELOPMENT AND EMPLOYMENT

MINISTERIAL CONFERENCE REPORT

Question No. 11 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Lorna Marsden:

11th June—With reference to the Ministerial Conference on Technological Development and Employment, held in Venice, (i) is there a report; (ii) if so, where may Canadians obtain it; (iii) if not, who represented Canada at this Conference; (iv) when will a report be available?

Reply from the Secretary of State for External Affairs:

(i) A report is under preparation by the Italian organizing authorities.

(ii) When produced, it will be available from the Science, Technology and Communications Division of the Department of External Affairs.

(iii) The head of delegation was the Honourable Flora MacDonald.

(iv) It is expected that the report will be available by mid-summer 1985.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTINGS OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 5:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which was authorized by the Senate on June 25, 1985, to study and report upon the documents entitled: "The Regulation of Canadian Financial Institutions: Proposals for Discussion" and "Final Report of the Working Committee on the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation (CDIC)", have power to sit at three thirty o'clock in the afternoon on Wednesdays and at three o'clock in the afternoon on Thursdays for the duration of the above-mentioned study, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we support this motion.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN INSTITUTE FOR INTERNATIONAL PEACE AND SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay, for the second reading of the Bill C-69, intituled: "An Act to amend the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security Act and certain other Acts in relation thereto".—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator MacEachen will proceed on this order tomorrow or Tuesday next.

Order stands.

STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE

GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Gigantès calling the attention of the Senate to the Strategic Defense Initiative.—(Honourable Senator Godfrey.)

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I am not an expert on SDI, and I do not claim to be an expert, although I have listened to many experts over the years. Honourable senators will be pleased to hear that I am not an expert on everything. Unfortunately, I was not in the chamber to hear Senator Gigantès' speech, but I did hear Senator Steuart's and I have read Senator Gigantès'. I will not repeat what Senator Gigantès has said, because, essentially, I agree with what he has said. I will comment on Senator Steuart's intervention later.

I should like to speak from a personal point of view on the question of deterrence. In 1982 I attended a meeting of the Canada-European Parliamentary Association in Copenhagen. On the agenda for that meeting was the subject of nuclear defence. I asked the chairman of the meeting the following question: As long as there is a possibility of the United States being able to retaliate against the U.S.S.R. sufficiently to destroy Leningrad, Moscow and Kiev, what possible motive could the U.S.S.R. have for starting a nuclear war?

The answer given by the chairman was: "My dear man, don't you realize that the U.S.S.R. is bent on world conquest and that human life means nothing to them?" I did not think that was a very intelligent answer because the leaders of the U.S.S.R. like their dachas and their comforts in Moscow and would not want to see them destroyed any more than anyone else in similar circumstances would.

A month later I attended a parliamentary dinner for the Canadian Ambassador to NATO. When the Ambassador finished his speech I asked him the same question. I received a five or six minute answer containing all kinds of mumbo-jumbo; what they have, what we have, and so on. When he finished, I rose and told him that he obviously had not heard my question. I told him that I was not in the least interested in the balance of power, that I was asking a theoretical question. He then proceeded to answer with more mumbo-jumbo. He told me about how many missiles we had, how many missiles they had, and so on. When he finished with that answer I again told him that he obviously did not understand the question or was refusing to answer it. I then started to leave the room. I was intercepted by an official from the Department of External Affairs. He followed me down the hall and gave me more mumbo-jumbo. He told me that I did not seem to understand. I told him that I was asking a purely theoretical question.

I raised the same question when Lord Carrington was here. His answer was: "That's a very good question," but he really did not answer it. In fact, he came up to me on one occasion and told me again that I had asked a very good question.

On May 24 of last year, at a joint meeting of the Senate and House of Commons Committee on Foreign Affairs, Mr. Vorotnikov, a member of the Politburo was present. I put the question the other way round and asked him: In view of the fact that I have been told that the U.S.S.R.'s submarine fleet, without any intercontinental ballistic missiles, can destroy every city in the United States with a population of over 10,000, what possible excuse would the Americans have, what reason could they possibly have, for starting a nuclear war? His answer to that was: "Well, you had better ask the Americans." I thought that was on a par with the answer I had received in Copenhagen. He proceeded to launch into a spiel of five or six minutes and gave me statistics on how many missiles they had and how many missiles we had.

The last time I asked this question was in Stuttgart at a meeting of NATO members. I was on the military committee, and we heard from a Dr. Lynn Davis, the Director of Studies, International Institute for Strategic Studies. After she made her presentation, I asked her—and I was getting a little more sophisticated—the following question: What possible motive would the U.S.S.R. have for starting a nuclear war if they know that one western nuclear submarine can destroy the 40 largest cities in the U.S.S.R.? That was something I had discovered since I had put my original question. I must say that Dr. Davis fielded many other questions but chose to ignore mine. I have not been very successful in obtaining an answer to that question.

While being briefed by a rather junior official from the Department of External Affairs for a committee I was serving on, I asked him the same question. I must say that I received a rather intelligent answer from that junior official. He told me that no one would start a strategic nuclear war, that the only possible way that could happen would be by way of an accident or because of an escalation of a tactical war in Europe that got out of control.

The reason I bring this up is that I, for the life of me, cannot understand why the U.S.S.R. and the United States think they have to have parity in nuclear weapons. As long as you can destroy the other side once, why do you have to destroy them 50-times over? I can understand why you cannot depend entirely on ICBMs or on submarines, although standing alone at the present time that is enough, or on aircraft with bombs or with cruise missiles. I recently read that the worry about depending entirely on submarines is that at some time Russia might develop a satellite inspection technique whereby they could detect underwater American submarines and if they do then they could attack those submarines with nuclear ICBM missiles and if they landed within ten miles of the submarine it would be destroyed. There is always that possibility, so I quite agree that you have to have aircraft with bombs or cruise missiles, submarines and ICBMs. But when we are talking about Star Wars—and I think it is a very good description of the whole thing—people overlook the fact that it is only a deterrent against ICBMs. It has nothing to do with anti-submarine warfare or long range aircraft which the Russians are developing and which have these cruise missiles. I am highly in favour of Canada entering into this agreement with the United States to have that radar screen in the north so that they cannot sneak airplanes through the gaps and launch cruise missiles, which would destroy the U.S. deterrent.

● (1440)

When I was in Stuttgart, we were addressed by General Wolfgang Altenburg who was the Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff of the Federal Armed Forces.

Senator Hicks: The Federal Armed Forces of what country?

Senator Godfrey: The Federal Armed Forces of Germany. He gave us a very interesting discourse and I would like to read from the minutes of the meeting. One paragraph reads as follows:

Finally, General Altenburg summarized the three main areas of challenge. These were, firstly, the need to improve conventional capability (which Germany would like to see implemented through existing rather than new programmes), secondly, the reorganization of nuclear forces to guarantee a sufficient range of options—

I believe that there he is referring to what I pointed out, namely, that you cannot rely on submarines or ICBMs; you should have a range of options. It continues:

... and thus preserve deterrence, and thirdly, the need to demonstrate solidarity in the face of the SDI and to ensure that it did not become a lever to decouple the United States from Europe.

Later in the meeting he said:

...that he was not against the SDI and wanted to participate, but he also wanted to ensure equal benefits for Europe and the United States. He was not questioning President Reagan's wisdom in this matter.

I asked General Altenburg whether he agreed with the view of Bundy, McNamara and others that the SDI would need to be more than 95 per cent effective. Mr. Petersen from the Federal Republic of Germany asked him a similar question. General Altenburg responded to Mr. Petersen's question by saying:

... that 50-60 per cent neutralization of missiles would not be sufficient; even 95 per cent might not be sufficient. He emphasized that this aspect must be included in the study programme along with the whole philosophy of the SDI.

Finally, we were addressed by a Dr. John Gardner, Director of Defensive Systems of the U.S. Department of Defense. Dr. Gardner was a very impressive, able and persuasive man. He explained to us that in the mid-1960s the United States had made an assessment to ascertain whether or not it was worth developing this kind of defence and they came to the conclusion that it was not. In 1980 or 1981 another technical committee was set up which, I believe, Dr. Gardner chaired, and they decided there was a possibility of developing it and that is what inspired President Reagan. At one point I asked Dr. Gardner:

He gave a very interesting answer which he broke up into two parts and that was the first time I had heard of that idea. He said that 95 per cent would not be effective enough to protect the civilian population of the United States, that you practically have to have 100 per cent. He was almost saying to forget about the SDI to protect the civilian population. However, he said that if you wanted a protection for your own ICBMs, as low as 75 per cent might be effective. That gave me a different slant on what it was all about. In other words, SDI is not to protect the civilian population of the United States but it is to protect the power of the United States to deter, retaliate and so on.

Having listened to various people both for and against SDI, I was quite ambivalent on the subject but mainly for the reason that Senator Steuart gave. I agree with him that our relations with the United States are very important. We have to get along with them and we should do everything we can to a certain point. Although I became absolutely convinced that it was a waste of money, and I could not conceive that it could possibly work well enough to be of any use at all, I came to the conclusion, taking into account that it was a question of wasting all this money and possibly offending the United States—perhaps it has something to do with my Scottish background that I was overall against SDI—that the government handled the thing rather well by saying that we were not going to contribute any of our money. They were very diplomatic in their letter when turning it down, and while they did not give any particular reasons, I think in the end that they came to the right conclusion.

On motion of Senator Bosa, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES, POLICY AND PROGRAMS

THIRD REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Dalia Wood, Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs, presented the following report:

Thursday, September 26, 1985

The Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on Official Languages Policy and Programs has the honour to present its

THIRD REPORT

In relation to its Order of Reference from the Senate dated Wednesday, March 27, 1985 and its Order of Reference from the House of Commons dated Tuesday, March 26, 1985, both relating to the Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages for 1984, your Committee which recommended in its First Report dated, Wednesday, May 29, 1985 that it be empowered to adjourn from place to place in Canada during October and November 1985, now requests that it be empowered to adjourn from place to place in Canada at any time before December 31, 1986 in order to submit a report no later than the aforementioned date, on the problems and concerns of language minorities and majorities with respect to official languages rights, policy and programs, and that the necessary staff do accompany the Committee.

Respectfully submitted,

DALIA WOOD
Joint Chairman

The Hon the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Wood, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, October 1, 1985, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL REVENUE

DEFINITION OF "PARTNERSHIP"—TAX AVOIDANCE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate arising out of the control of Gulf Canada. When the Reichmann family in Toronto acquired control of Gulf Canada from Chevron Corporation they immediately transferred many of Gulf's assets into a partnership between Gulf and Norcen Energy Resources. Apparently, that may have cost something in the neighbourhood of $1 billion in lost taxes, based on the fact that the two corporations were treated as a partnership. If they are treated as a partnership, then when the time for recapture arrives, depreciated assets can be ratcheted up again in order to minimize the recapture and thereby avoid tax. The ruling of the tax department that provided this escape from taxes is described as being confidential, as I know some of them are, so I do not expect that the Leader of the Government in the Senate will have an answer to this question, but I do ask him if he will ask his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue and, if necessary, the Minister of Justice, to provide us with some detail of how that combination was defined as a partnership for the purposes of the section that is the basis for the ruling.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am familiar with the newspaper story as I had an opportunity to read it this morning, and it raises the point that there is a provision in the Income Tax Act that permits an effective recapture on depreciated assets or something of the sort which either eliminates or postpones tax. I rather suspect that it postpones tax. I can only tell my honourable friend that this provision is not a new one because it has been on the statute books for some time and is one that has been available for use by anyone who had legitimate reason to use it. While I do not think that I can promise to tell him the details of this case insofar as they are confidential under the Income Tax Act, what I can do is draw his attention to the regulations or legislation under which the transaction is embraced and that may give him the information he is seeking.

Senator Frith: I have a supplementary question. I do not think that it is a matter of postponement, but is actually a question of avoiding taxes. For example, taking a very simple case, if I have an asset that is worth $1,000 and over the years I depreciate it to $200 and then I sell it for $800, I am taxed on that difference between the $200 and the $800 because I have recaptured some of the depreciation. However, the Leader of the Government is on the right track about what I would like to have.

BANKING

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—SALVAGE RECOMMENDATION

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. On September 18, the Prime Minister was interviewed by Betty Kennedy, and I have in my hand a transcript of that interview.

One of the questions, in part, put by Betty Kennedy to the Prime Minister, was as follows:

... I am wondering if it is correct that it was your personal decision and your order to attempt to salvage the Canadian Commercial Bank in March?

The Prime Minister's reply, in part, was as follows:

No, the government decided on the basis of evidence made available to it that this was an appropriate decision. All government officials made that recommendation.

As I said, honourable senators, that is not the complete answer, but my question is related to that part.

Could the Leader of the Government tell honourable senators which government officials made that recommendation?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my friend, with some persistence, is pursuing a line of questioning he has employed in the recent past.

I recognize the thrust, but I have to tell him that my answer is much the same as that given on previous occasions. It is that when this matter is before the committee I expect that the officials who had anything to do with this matter will be summoned to the committee and will be able to speak for themselves on what they said. I think that is preferable to my trying to second-guess them at the moment.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I think an answer would be most helpful to the committee and to the general public. I know that, at least where I come from, Betty Kennedy's show is well received. Those viewers will not be at the committee meeting, and I am sure they would like to know who the people referred to as "all government officials" were. Surely the Leader of the Government knows who they were.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I have not only listened to but have also looked at Betty Kennedy over these many years, and I have the privilege of being able to describe her as a personal acquaintance and, perhaps, a friend. Therefore, I am always interested in what she has to say and the points she raises.

In this particular instance, a parliamentary inquiry is going to be conducted—not an inquiry on television or in the media. Therefore, I think my statement still stands that the place for this matter to be elucidated is in committee. My honourable friend is a member of the committee, and I hope to attend the hearings myself. I am sure he will have cogent questions to ask of all and sundry.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, unfortunately, I am not a member of the committee which will be inquiring into this matter. Even if I were, I still believe that my request is proper.

My next question is this: What was the "salvage" operation recommended?

Senator Roblin: What was what?

Senator Sinclair: What was the salvage operation recommended?

Senator Roblin: I was surprised to hear my friend say that he was not a member of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, because I understood he was. However, the same answer applies: All the questions in connection with this matter, which are legitimate and can be properly answered, will be dealt with in committee. It is not appropriate to ask me to deal with these matters during oral Question Period, and I must decline to do so.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have some other questions in regard to this matter.

REGULATION OF BANKS

Hon. Ian Sinclair: My next question is surely not a matter for the committee. I am quoting from statements made by the Minister of State (Finance), the Honourable Barbara McDougall. She is reported to have said:

The crisis has to do with the regulatory environment in which we live. It was not created by this Government but by the former government which ignored the problems that arose.

We have for too long relied on overburdened regulators to use the limited tools available to them. To remedy the defects, some action is required.

Our regulators are restricted by rules written in the age of the quill pen.

This document, which is generally referred to as the green paper, was published in April 1985. Honourable senators will realize, from having read it and from its size, that it took some weeks to prepare. My question is this: If those rules regarding the banks were written in the age of the quill pen and the minister knew it, why did she not take some action to rectify them before she went on that billion-dollar weekend?

● (1410)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend, in the first instance, is quoting from a speech made in the other place. It is not our usual custom in this place to indulge in comments or reflections upon speeches made in the House of Commons, and I do not intend to do that myself. I happen to think that what the minister said was correct, and I happen to think that the honourable senator will find out that the minister has proposals to make which will bring our regulatory system into good shape. I also hope, if I may express this view, that, when the committee meets to discuss this question of the CCB, my honourable friend or those who speak for him will take it upon themselves to investigate the origins of our problems and the development of events with respect to the role of the Inspector General of Banks, the expansion of the banking system and other matters that flow from that. It seems to me that if that is done we will have a much better understanding of the problems with which the minister finds herself faced than we might otherwise have.

Senator Sinclair: If the regulations that she has proposed are not the full regulations, is the Leader of the Government suggesting that there are some more? What the minister has referred to is the document in my hand that she worked so hard to bring forward. Are there some more regulations that she has in mind for the banks other than those contained in this paper to which I have alluded?

Senator Roblin: Perhaps my honourable friend would agree with me that that green paper has, as its thrust, an entirely different subject from the one that he is raising.

Senator Frith: Not entirely.

Senator Roblin: Well, it has as its thrust the re-organization of the financial and quasi-financial institutions in the country,

[Senator Sinclair.]

as to how they should be related to one another and how the four pillars of the financial establishment should interact—

Senator Frith: And how they should be regulated.

Senator Roblin: And how they should be regulated under a new dispensation. But my honourable friend knows perfectly well that that report is being studied by a Commons committee and by our committee. There is no guarantee that that report is going to be approved in toto. In fact, I think it is safe to say that substantial changes will be required. My honourable friend has to separate in his mind the events—at least I do, and I think it is not unfair for me to do so—to realize that the particular problems that have arisen in the past with respect to the Inspector General of Banks are ones that were not in contemplation because the crisis had not really developed at the time this green paper was prepared. It has been prepared over a period of time.

Be that as it may, however, I will be glad to hear any suggestions that my honourable friend wishes to put forward as to how he thinks the regulatory system of the banks should be improved upon, strengthened and changed.

Senator Sinclair: If the minister responsible was of the view that the regulation of the banks was inappropriate or that those who were in charge of that regulation were not carrying out their duties, she must have had that examined before she consulted with her advisers and before it was decided to write this paper and release it. My question is: That being so, why did she not take some action about those regulators and the scope of the regulation before the end of March 1985?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend overlooks the fact that there is legislation pending—I do not remember precisely whether or not it has been presented to Parliament—but I know that it has been in preparation since this development arose, to give new powers to the Inspector General of Banks and to the minister.

I am relying on my memory here, but I really do not think that the legislation has yet been presented to Parliament, so I am not at liberty to give any details on it. But I can assure my honourable friend that the minister has not been sitting idly by while the weeks have passed. She has prepared new legislation dealing with the very subject that my honourable friend talks about, and he will get a chance in due course to say what he thinks of it.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, the point of the matter is that if the minister had concerns she should have acted on those specific concerns before the billion-dollar weekend.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Why don't you move a Notice of Inquiry?

Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. The honourable senator has been arguing the case since the beginning. He has not put any real question.

Senator Frith: He certainly has.

Senator Flynn: He has not. He has only been arguing about the statements made by the minister in the other place. If he wants to discuss that, and give other honourable senators a chance to intervene and reply, let him move a Notice of Inquiry and we will deal with him and with the subject matter.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I believe I have a right to ask the Leader of the Government—

Senator Flynn: You have no right to debate at this time. You certainly don't have.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I think I have the right—

Senator Frith: The questions have been misunderstood and he is explaining them.

Senator Flynn: He will talk for hours, because he will never understand.

Senator Frith: He never gets any answers. That is why he keeps arguing.

Senator Flynn: He should put a Notice of Inquiry on the order paper.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, if the regulation of banks—

Senator Flynn: That is a debate.

Senator Frith: Let him speak—

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, my rights are involved here. I do not have to listen to a debate at this point without having a chance to intervene. I say that this is entirely out of order. If the honourable senator has a question, he should put it; but if he wants to debate the subject, he should move a Notice of Inquiry.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the last intervention made by Senator Flynn was made after Senator Sinclair had said, "If the regulation of banks," and then, before he could get out another word, Senator Flynn rose and said, "Debate!" Senator Sinclair had managed to say only five words. How does Senator Flynn know that the senator was not going to end with a question?

Senator Flynn: I know him.

Senator Frith: It may very well be that you know him; but we know you, too.

Senator Perrault: You are not a prophet. You are afraid of facts.

Senator Flynn: I have never behaved that way.

Senator Frith: It is the way you are behaving now; that's the point.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, my question to the Leader of the Government is this: In the opinion of the government, in March 1985 were the regulations pertaining to banks inappropriate?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I must tell my honourable friend that he had better address his questions to the minister in charge, namely, the Minister of State (Finance), because it is impossible for me to deal with a question like that in the middle of September, not having been a party to the discussions because it is not in my departmental brief. If my honourable friend wants to address those questions to the minister when she comes here, he is welcome to do so.

I would like to say that Senator Flynn's point is not entirely without merit, because we are conducting a mini-debate here. Senator Sinclair knows that is what he is doing, and he is enjoying it—and, in a sense, so am I. But Question Period is for questions, and we should try to get back to the basics of parliamentary decorum and expect short, concise questions and, hopefully, short, concise answers.

● (1420)

Senator Frith: That was certainly a short, precise question.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government along the line that Senator Sinclair was pursuing. I note that the Minister of State (Finance) is blaming the former government for the inadequacy of the rules and the regulatory structure.

Senator Balfour: Come on!

Senator Olson: That is what the Globe and Mail says. I wonder if the Leader of the Government can help me to understand why they would print it on the first page and print it again in its entirety on the fourth page.

Senator Phillips: It shows you how inaccurate they were.

Senator Roblin: The argument must have appealed to them.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order to comment on a statement made by the Honourable Senator Roblin. He said that it is not the practice in this house to comment upon speeches made in the other place. I would like to draw to Senator Roblin's attention rule 34A, which reads:

The content of a speech made in the House of Commons in the current session may be summarized, but it is out of order to quote from such a speech unless it be a speech of a Minister of the Crown in relation to government policy.

Senator Flynn: That does not apply.

Senator Godfrey: I would suggest that we can refer to speeches made in the other place, that we can summarize speeches, that we can quote a minister and that we can comment.

Senator Flynn: Not during Question Period.

Senator Roblin: I always respect an interjection by Senator Godfrey because he has a distressing habit of being right—sometimes.

Senator Godfrey: Name one time.

Senator Doody: It has certainly escaped me.

Senator Roblin: However, I do not think that he is right on this occasion. I do not really think that the rule which he has quoted refers to Question Period. I think it refers to speeches made in the course of our normal transactions, and in that respect I would agree with him.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I am just an ordinary little Canadian. I have never been chairman of Canadian Pacific Railway.

Senator Sinclair: Thank God for that!

Senator Muir: Or president of any of these great corporations. Nor do I belong to the old boys' club.

Senator Frith: Oh, yes, you do—just a different branch.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Muir: May I ask just a humble little question?

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Perrault: No Tory was ever humble.

Senator Frith: If you are going to be properly humble, you will have to become a Liberal.

Senator Muir: I shall consider the source whence that came.

May I ask the honourable Leader of the Government: Since we have had this problem with the banks and since there was a long term when another government was in power—

Senator Perrault: The good old days!

Senator Muir: —why were all these great regulations which are being proposed now not put into effect? We have been in power for only one year. Why were they not put into effect previously to prevent any such thing from happening?

Senator Frith: It is because it is McDougall's idea, not ours.

Senator Roblin: I note the interjection from my honourable friend that it is McDougall's idea, not the Liberals' idea. That's the truth, God knows.

Senator Frith: You bet!

Senator Roblin: I hope that in the course of the investigation into this matter the question raised by my honourable friend will be pursued and that answers will be sought and will be forthcoming as to what is the history of the regulatory apparatus. I do not intend to say any more about the matter now because I would be trespassing on Senator Sinclair's ground in trying to debate the issue.

Senator Olson: Perhaps it is the minister who is the problem.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It is true, as the Leader of the Government has said, that this whole line of questioning, and the idea, was originally advanced by Minister McDougall who said, when asked about the bank failure and near failure, that when the Liberals were in power we did not do enough about regulations. But we did not have any failed banks either.

Senator Flynn: Good speech!

Senator Frith: Thank you.

Senator Roblin: What my honourable friend has said bears on the very issue as to why.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Frith: So, it was our fault, and I suppose the rancid tuna is our fault, too!

Senator Roblin: I am not going to debate the issue.

Senator Frith: Five years from now the Tories will probably still be blaming all their mistakes on the Liberals.

Senator Roblin: If somebody wishes to introduce an inquiry to debate the issue, that will be fine. I tell my honourable friend that I am positive that the matter will be elucidated in the committee and that he will have the answer to his question in spades.

Senator Frith: In canned spades.

Senator Godfrey: May I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he is charging that the former Liberal government was responsible for that bank's investing all the money that it lost in the United States?

Senator Frith: As Senator Doody said, you name it—

Senator Roblin: I would point out to my honourable friend that the charges are all being made on the other side of the house. I am not making any charges. I am just doing my best to answer the questions that come to me, but I am quite sure that before the whole issue is concluded the question of charges will be raised on both sides of the house.

EDUCATION

TORONTO SCHOOL—CHANGE OF NAME

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Perhaps he will recall that in the mid-1970s a public school in Toronto was named "Argentina," in a reciprocal gesture on the part of Canada and Argentina to underline the friendship that existed between the two countries.

Senator Doody: Not "Caboto"?

Senator Bosa: It has nothing to do with Caboto.

Senator Doody: I am very sensitive about that.

Senator Bosa: The Falklands war in 1982 generated a great many hard feelings in Toronto and elsewhere. As a result of that, many people exerted pressure on the school board to change the name of that school from "Argentina" to something else. That school is now known as Garden Avenue School.

Since that time, Argentina has become a democracy and I believe that President Alfonsín needs all the moral and psychological support that a prestigious country such as Canada could send his way. Notwithstanding the fact that Canada is a young country, it is also a well-established democracy and highly respected in the international community.

I know that this is not a matter that normally comes under the jurisdiction of the federal government, but I wonder whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate could use the prestige of his office to influence the school board to rename that school "Argentina" as a gesture of friendship and support from the people of Canada to President Alfonsín.

Senator Doody: Do you want a time limit on that?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend expresses a noble sentiment. I have to tell him, however, that those who are in charge of naming schools at the school board would resent my interference in the matter, in the same way as some here would resent any interference in our affairs in this chamber. I do not think, therefore, that it would be advisable for me to accept my honourable friend's invitation, but I commend him on his kind thought.

Hon. Robert Muir: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators, on the same subject. I would like to fully endorse the comments of Senator Bosa. In Buenos Aires we have an establishment called "Canada School." The school day begins every morning with the singing of O Canada, together with their national anthem. The Canadian flag is displayed in a beautiful glass case.

Senator Marshall: Do they know the words to O Canada?

Senator Muir: Yes, Senator Marshall, indeed they do know the words.

I commend Senator Bosa on his suggestion. I realize that the Leader of the Government in the Senate has nothing to do with what happens in a school board in Toronto. However, all senators could take it upon themselves to write to the school board in Toronto regarding this matter. I know there was a problem in Argentina under the generals, but now President Alfonsín has been elected and, please God, democracy will continue in Argentina for a long time. I would hope that the Leader of the Government and any other senator who is interested would do their utmost to prevail upon the school board in Toronto to rename the school "Argentina" as it was named before the Falklands episode.

Senator Roblin: That is a constructive suggestion, honourable senators, and I hope that some senators are moved to adopt it. However, I have to repeat that, as a member of the government, it is a little difficult for me to do so. I will rely on you, Senator Muir, to take care of my interests.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

NOVA SCOTIA—CAPE BRETON ADVISORY COMMITTEE REPORT—REQUESTS FOR COPIES

Hon. John B. Stewart: I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I understand from a Canadian Press story that yesterday an economic blueprint with a potential price tag of $600 million was unveiled in Sydney, Nova Scotia, by the Cape Breton Advisory Committee, and that the Honourable Sinclair Stevens is said to have welcomed this report.

● (1430)

I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate would ensure that copies of the report are made available to the members of the Senate immediately and, at the same time, could the leader give us the names of the members of the committee who signed the report?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): It is perfectly true that the report was issued yesterday under the auspices of the Government of Nova Scotia and the Government of Canada. The report contains a number of useful proposals for reviving the economy of Cape Breton and, indeed, other parts of Nova Scotia. Some of the proposals, I suspect, are already under consideration; other proposals are new.

I do not believe the report has been tabled, but it can be obtained from DRIE. A telephone call from your office would, I am sure, produce a copy. I think it would be a good idea if I were also to telephone to ask for copies for all honourable senators.

With respect to those who have signed the report, I do not have a copy of it in front of me, but I understand that the chairperson was Teresa MacNeil and that Donald Sobey was the vice-chairman. The only person who comes to mind as being one of those who signed the report is Mr. Frank Stornach. Approximately half a dozen people have signed the report. I just had a glance at the report and do not have those names on the tip of my tongue, but those names are available. If my honourable friend telephones DRIE for that information, I am sure he will obtain it.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a humble request to make. I am a very humble, unassuming and modest person. I should like to ask the Leader of the Government why it is that in the case of a report such as that which Senator Stewart has mentioned, members of the Senate have to chase up and down the halls and plead or ask a member of the House of Commons for copies. People such as Senator Stewart, Senator John Macdonald, Senator Graham, Senator MacEachen and myself have worked for years to see what we could do to enhance the quality of life in Cape Breton, but for some reason senators are not given copies of these important reports.

Senator Perrault: We are all humble.

Senator Muir: Yes, we are. Yesterday, I had to call the minister's office to ask for a copy of the report. I said, "What do I have to do? Do I beg? Do I plead? Do I purchase or do I kiss someone's ass to get a copy of this report?"

Senator Frith: That's unparliamentary language.

Senator Muir: After I called the minister's office yesterday I received a copy of the report inside of 20 minutes. But, as Senator Olson says, and has said in the Senate on many occasions—

Senator Frith: What did you do to get it?

Senator Muir: —and as Senator Frith has said—if he would stop interrupting and listen to a very good comment—senators are also members of Parliament. At least, I always thought they were members of Parliament. So why is it that senators have to plead and beg and are ignored by ministers regarding these reports?

I would hope that the Leader of the Government in the Senate would speak to the ministers concerned and see that we receive copies of these reports from their offices. He may have to use a little whip or a little strap or some type of force. He has to realize that senators receive telephone calls from the Canadian Press, from the Halifax newspapers, from the Sidney newspapers and from radio and television stations asking, "What do you think about the report?" We have to tell them that we have not seen the report.

So, please, please, consider us as members of Parliament, just as are members of the other place. I served in the House of Commons for 22 years and I would like to receive the same treatment here as I received there. Do not ignore the bright and intelligent men and women in this chamber.

Senator Roblin: If I ever required any inspiration to get this report, I just got it. I will represent my honourable friend as completely as I can to the minister, and I will obtain a copy of the report for him, as I will for all other honourable senators.

Senator Muir: I'm a bit shy; I need to ask.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to draw the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate to the fact that there are still some answers outstanding to questions that are of current interest. I should like to ask the leader to do better in obtaining answers. Knowing the leader as I do, I know that he is trying hard. I am tempted to say that the leader is doing his best, but I would be worried if this were his best, because I believe his best is better than this.

I may be a little premature, and I hope that I am. I hope that on Tuesday the Leader of the Government in the Senate will rise and chastise me for being so premature as to raise these questions. I should like answers to the series of questions I asked arising out of the Memorandum of Intent. That Memorandum of Intent will, of course, be the basis for discussion at a Senate committee meeting, if this matter goes before a Senate committee.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate and all honourable senators will recall that during an exchange between the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Government on the subject of the bank failure, and the desirability of having that subject examined by a committee of the Senate, the Leader of the Government made the suggestion that the subject matter of the forthcoming bill could be referred to the committee, and that the Leader of the Opposition supported that approach as being a reasonable one, provided we had the bill. I hope that the bill will have been placed on the Order Paper of the other place because, of course, the whole plan will fall if we do not have a bill. If that is the case, we will have to find another way to get the matter before a Senate committee.

We had the illustration the other day of how the Leader of the Government in the Senate—and I am not criticizing him, praising him, or otherwise—in answering questions regarding the bank failures, suggested that the questions would be better raised in committee. That was a good point, but that is not useful if the matter is not before a Senate committee.

I ask the Leader of the Government to find out between now and Tuesday when the Senate might expect to have a bill before it, because I give him notice that if we do not have a bill before us then, we will discuss another way of getting this matter before a committee.

I should also like the leader to get some information for us over the weekend regarding the series of questions I asked earlier this week on the tuna issue. That is a matter that is current. I ask him to distinguish between questions on which information is not necessary immediately and questions on which the information is rather stale. I do not mean that as a pun, but that information can be rather stale unless the answers come quickly.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on the matter of the Memorandum of Intent annexed to the agreement, I must warn my honourable friend that it will take some time to prepare answers to those questions because this is an extremely complicated subject. A great many documents have to be searched.

Senator Frith: That is why I mentioned the committee.

Senator Roblin: That is fair enough. If the answers are not available before the committee meets, those questions can be asked at the committee meeting. I will do my best to obtain those answers for my friend, but there will be no quick answers.

The important aspect to the question he has raised relates to the time the Senate has a bill before it. I gave no assurances but I intimated that I hoped the bill would be before the Senate in the near future.

Senator Frith: And it was your understanding that it would be.

Senator Roblin: Yes. I can tell my honourable friend that I am monitoring this situation daily. I have not given up hope. I expect that on Tuesday next the subject will be raised again and I will know more about it.

Regarding the committee study, I think it is sound to base that on a bill, but I admit that it is not the only way.

Senator Frith: Let us be clear. I raised a series of questions arising out of the Memorandum of Intent just as an illustration of why I felt it was important that this matter be referred to a Senate committee as soon as possible. I agree that the nature of the questions I have asked was such that they were intended to be a foundation for questions to be asked at the committee. I realize they are all questions that will take time to answer.

On the other point, I think we understand each other in that we can explore some other way of getting this matter before a committee if the bill is not before the Senate to serve as our springboard.

Senator Roblin: That is fine.

CANADIAN INSTITUTE FOR INTERNATIONAL PEACE AND SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay, for the second reading of the Bill C-69, intituled: "An Act to amend the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security Act and certain other Acts in relation thereto".—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was speaking with Senator MacEachen yesterday and he expects to proceed with this order next Tuesday.

Order stands.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

MOTION TO EXAMINE AND REPORT ON FILM ENTITLED "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the activities of the National Film Board with respect to the production and distribution of the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss".—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise to support the motion of Senator Molson as I did when he first raised the issue in February 1984 on the production of the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss." I am pleased that we now have a Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs under the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology to which such a motion can be referred for an in-depth examination of the facts surrounding the questionable depiction of a military officer through the production of a film which, to use the kindest words, was unfortunate.

Here is an agency of government, supported financially by government, which should be helping us to identify ourselves as Canadians, an agency which should be helping us to find sources of pride in our history but has nothing better to do than destroy the sources of pride that we have and, as well, to destroy one of our proudest accomplishments, an accomplishment that is recognized around the world even by our enemies, and that is our contribution to peace for our country and, indeed, the world. Instead it warps the actions of one of our heroes—Billy Bishop. I can only ask: What was the author or the National Film Board trying to prove? What good did they do? What motive did they have, and what was their purpose?

I should like to have put on the record for Mr. Cowan something that we keep repeating and that we are proud of. I refer to a speech made by my leader on May 8, 1985, on the fortieth anniversary of D-Day. He said:

It was a time when there was a feeling of comradeship, which is not ordinarily to be found in our relationships one with another; there was personal commitment to a cause we esteemed; and there was a clear purpose which united us one with another. Alas, after 40 years, those great emotions have eroded. The clear dedication, which we found so much to our inclination in those days, is by no means as strong as it used to be in times of war. In a sense, we can thank God that it is so, because it means that we are not challenged in this day and generation with the horrors that were apparent to those who served and to those who waited in those six years of struggle over 40 years ago.

But I hope that the spirit that quickened in our nation in war-time is a spirit that can still be found among our people in these days of peace—relative peace though it may be. I hope that the spirit will inspire us to dedicate ourselves, not so much to the past, because that is part of the record of our history, but to the future so that we may summon up, once again, those qualities that made this nation great in war-time and that can make it great in peace-time and a leader in the quest for harmony among nations.

That is the type of thing that Mr. Cowan and the National Film Board should be thinking about. I am not as close to the Billy Bishop experience as Senator Molson was, but I am just as concerned as are all those who were close to war. In particular, I join the many in this chamber and the many thousands of veterans across the land who have shown their anger at this film and their support for the suggestion that the producers of the film in question demonstrate to a committee that the production was factual.

Honourable senators, my concern is not only because someone sneers at the courage and accomplishments of a recognized war hero, but also because I question his justification for displaying a narrow-minded disapproval of what Billy Bishop stood for. And it is not related to just this one event. I think it is our duty to prevent this agency or its personnel from having the freedom to inflict on viewers their own personal point of view without our having the opportunity to call them to account. Most importantly, we have to ensure that the film will not be a forerunner of others with the same philosophy. The question that comes to mind is: Who will be next? Will there be a film to show that the Canadians who landed on the beaches of Normandy did not really get shot at, that they were simply out for a swim and that there were no Canadian troops wounded or killed? Will we see a film to contradict the fact that Canadians were massacred in Dieppe or taken prisoner, or that the thousands of soldiers who were awarded medals for bravery really did not deserve them? Will we be told that flying officers such as Buzz Beurling or Mynarski and other heroes did not fly missions and deserve awards for heroism? Perhaps the NFB is preparing a film to show that the Hong Kong veterans who were prisoners of war were not chained, were not starved, were not beaten and were not forced to march miles without food or water?

Senator Gigantès expressed concern that we would be criticized for referring this matter to committee. He said that the press will not take kindly to it, and I say to him: "So, what else is new?" He thinks that they will say that we are absurd, over-aged fuddy-duddies. They will say that as they do every day of the week. I do not think that Senator Gigantès should be concerned, because I can refer him to articles written by Ron Lowman of the Toronto Star which support the action we are proposing to take. I can mention Sir William Stephenson who really castigates the production which caused embarrassment to us, particularly in the view of our neighbours below the border. It is up to us to make a decision on whether this course of action is right, and I think it is right.

This film has hurt over 20,000 air force officers who are still living; it has hurt and affected the thinking of the 700,000 veterans who are still living. I believe that it is our duty to have this matter referred to committee as soon as possible so that we may vindicate that part of our history which this production has defamed.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I rise to take part in the debate on this subject for the second time. I spoke on it when Senator Molson first raised the issue in February 1984. This question has been before this chamber for a considerable length of time and it is my belief that it should be dealt with—and promptly.

I believe that Senator Molson established an irrefutable case for a review of this film by a Senate committee. To those who did not hear his brilliant speech I recommend that they read it in Hansard, because it is a speech that is well worth reading.

I want to deal with a couple of aspects of the case that might be of interest to honourable senators. I have seen the film and I think it would be worthwhile for honourable senators to take the time to see it. Basically, it is an anti-war film. It raises two major issues: First, war is fought to satisfy the lust of generals and to increase the profits of arms manufacturers; second, war is fought, according to the producer, in order to sustain a decadent capitalist society. There is absolutely no recognition in this film that the majority of people fought—and many were wounded and died in World War I and World War II—because they valued the lives they lived, the freedom they enjoyed and the democracy that they lived under. There is absolutely no recognition of that fact.

● (1450)

Billy Bishop is used by the producer to establish this case. He is portrayed as a liar and a cheat. It is stated, by implication and, indeed, directly, that he obtained his Victoria Cross fraudulently; and the basic premise is that generals create heroes in order to sell the war to the public.

[Senator Marshall.]

I have heard remarks made that, if we were to refer this to a committee, the Senate would be involved in some sort of censorship of free expression.

Both to the National Film Board and to the press in this country, I say this: Freedom of expression and freedom of the press carry with them a very heavy responsibility, a responsibility which often is not discharged as it should be by those exercising it.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Everett: This film has been treated as a documentary. It purports to deal with the issue of Bishop as he really existed; yet, in fact, even people on the National Film Board admit that it is not a factual documentary. That is the essence of Senator Molson's case.

War is a horrifying business, and the heroes of war are not always the most attractive people when we look at them in peacetime. If the producer of this film wants to make an anti-war film, he is, as far as I am concerned, entitled to do so. He can make his case, and it can be refuted. That is what freedom of expression is all about. However, when he bases his case, as he does in this instance, on character assassination, then there is something fundamentally wrong with what is being done, and to point out that fact does not involve censorship. We must be clear on that. For that reason, I have absolutely no hesitation and no qualms of conscience in supporting Senator Molson's motion. I feel most strongly that a committee ought to look into this matter with a view to nullifying the character assassination that has taken place.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, this is a matter on which I did not intend to speak, but I do wish to make it clear that I am in support of the motion.

I know something of this business, having spent a lifetime in the broadcasting and production fields. In my view, even if this were a private agency, it would still have to accept some responsibility for the nature of the program, and would have to accept the consequences following upon that fact.

This production did not win awards because of its substance or its facts. This is a comparatively new device, sometimes referred to as a "documentary." I believe Senator Molson was having difficulty with that definition because this is a hybrid type of process which mixes entertainment with fact to develop a new type of exotic animal.

I congratulate the honourable senators who have spoken on this subject. I am not unaware of the fact that if we refer this question to a committee for study we incur certain risks, but I believe that those risks are worth taking. I think a good case has been made and, indeed, an excellent one was made last week by Senator Frith when he made reference to the fact that an otherwise first-class body which we have set up to preserve our identity and to foster matters involving nationhood should, at least, have an opportunity to appear. Senator Molson makes it abundantly clear that he is not engaged in any kind of witch hunt. He is not out to challenge the credibility of the producer. I say that our proposed procedure is not without some risk, but I do believe, under the circumstances, it would be a risk well taken.

I was delighted to hear Senator Marshall quote our distinguished leader. I would quote you another statement from another distinguished senator, the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen, speaking on April 13, 1925. He said:

The story of a nation's heroes is the fountain from which it draws the wine of its later life. There is no inspiration that quickens the ambition of youth, stimulates public service and deepens love of country like the memory of great men who have gone.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Godfrey, debate adjourned.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

SUPPORT AND GOVERNMENT POLICY—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marsden calling the attention of the Senate to the importance of research and development in every province and territory and the need for caution and sensitivity in the realignments of support, and of policy by government, which relates to research and development.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I made reference to this order yesterday and have since spoken to the sponsor of this inquiry, Senator Marsden. There is no evidence that any other senator wishes to speak on this inquiry, but she would like to speak to it again, and that would have the effect of closing the debate.

Therefore, I would ask that the inquiry be adjourned in her name, and if in the meantime some other senator wishes to speak, I am sure she will yield and not close the debate. Otherwise, she means to close the debate within the next week or so.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Marsden, debate adjourned.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY GOVERNMENT ACTIVITIES ON POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION AND TRAINING

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc, pursuant to Notice of Motion of Wednesday September 25, 1985, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the activities of the Government of Canada in its financial support of post-secondary education and vocational training; and

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such professional, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to comment briefly on that notice of motion, recommending that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance examine the activities of the Government of Canada, its financial support of post-secondary education and vocational training.

As honourable senators will know, the committee in its provisional report dated May 30, 1985, stressed the fact that the role of the Canadian government in educational matters raises a great many questions. The report stated that committee members were considering a more in-depth study of the matter.

Since then, a number of events have convinced me that, more than ever, such a study is needed.

First, members of the Committee on National Finance recently gave their full support to that initiative.

Moreover, Senators Bell and Doody responded to the report submitted by the Committee on National Finance by urging the latter to undertake such a study.

Later, Senator Marsden, while calling the Senate's attention to government policies in the area of research and development—as mentioned earlier—raised quite a number of questions more or less linked with the proposed reference.

Finally, the Royal Commission on Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada, in its report of September 5, 1985, voiced many reservations concerning the matter of post-secondary education.

The Commission stated, and I quote:

The Commission agrees with its positions and is altogether convinced that the Government of Canada has an essential role to play in post-secondary education and vocational training.

Honourable senators, that quotation is taken from Volume II, page 819.

The Commission has submitted specific recommendations that differ slightly from the current provisions of federal support to that sector, because it felt, and again I quote:

All normal fiscal transfer mechanisms have been tried and found unsatisfactory. We therefore recommend that Canadians seriously consider the possibility of having more comprehensive reforms.

That quotation is taken from Volume II, page 832.

In view of the need to fully consider the findings of the Royal Commission in that respect, and the support given by some honourable senators to the inception of that study by the Committee on National Finance, I urge this house to support the motion.

If the honourable senators do give their approval, I would propose having the hearings start as soon as possible, in order that a report may be tabled within the shortest possible time frame and the recommendations might influence the reform of the funding provisions that apparently will be undertaken starting from April 1, 1987.

I want to emphasize that the committee sent to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, a budget providing for enough funding to undertake that study.

I take this opportunity to call the attention of honourable senators to the fact that, thanks to the former chairman and in particular Senators Everett and Doody, the committee on National Finance always fulfills its mandate with very modest financial support. It has managed its meagre budget in a most satisfactory way. It will continue in that splendid tradition.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, October 1, 1985, at 2 p.m.

BANKING

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK AND NORTHLAND BANK— COMPENSATION OF DEPOSITORS—REFERRAL OF SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate to do with the business of this chamber.

The Leader of the Government will be aware that there has appeared on the House of Commons Order Paper a notice indicating that first reading will be given to a bill with respect to the reimbursement of those who had deposits in certain banks.

Would the Leader of the Government be able to tell us when he expects to move that the subject matter of that bill be considered by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I intend to ask my honourable friend, the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to consider, with his colleagues, the moving of such a motion immediately upon first reading of this bill in the other place. My information, which I hope is accurate, is that that will take place on Thursday. Therefore, I expect that at some time on Thursday afternoon, during the course of our proceedings, the chairman of the committee will move a pre-study of that bill in the expectation that the investigation about which we have been talking for some time will proceed without delay.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I have one point which perhaps does not require underlining now. When this matter was raised earlier, the Leader of the Government agreed that the precise terms of the reference would not in any way inhibit the amplitude of the inquiry that members of the committee might make. I do not foresee any difficulty; I merely want to ensure that there is a meeting of minds on that point.

Senator Roblin: I expect that, in the usual way in which we do things, the motion will simply recommend that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the committee for pre-study. There would be nothing else in those terms of reference that would inhibit the activities of the committee.

ESTEY COMMISSION OF INQUIRY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question about the bill that has been the subject of questions between the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Government in the Senate. From a press release, I note that Mr. Justice Estey has been appointed to inquire into the circumstances surrounding the failure of these two banks. The press release indicates that he will begin his hearings on Wednesday, October 2—that is tomorrow—and that he will submit his report to the Governor in Council as soon as possible.

Honourable senators will remember the circumstances surrounding the first failure. Initially it was going to be studied by a joint committee and then we were told that it was not going to be a joint committee but a House of Commons committee. Now I take it that there will be no investigation made by a House of Commons committee but that there will be this investigation undertaken by Mr. Justice Estey.

I have two questions arising out of those facts. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us when Mr. Justice Estey was first consulted? I note that the Prime Minister was acting on a recommendation of the Minister of Finance and of the Minister of State (Finance). I repeat my question: Can he tell us when Mr. Justice Estey was first consulted?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have that information.

Senator Frith: I did not think that the Leader of the Government would have that information to hand, but, assuming that he will get it for us, my next question is: Will the government expect the bill to be passed before Mr. Justice Estey has made his report? May we expect to have Mr. Justice Estey's report before being asked to pass the bill?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I regret that I have no means of knowing when the bill will be passed by Parliament. That will depend largely on the opposition.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am not asking for a prediction. I am asking whether the government, as a matter of policy, is setting up this inquiry as background for the bill so that we will not be asked to pass it until we have Mr. Justice Estey's report.

Senator Roblin: I do not think that I should give an assurance of that kind because, while I do not have the bill in front of me, I suspect that the purpose and thrust of it will be to make it possible to reimburse those depositors of the bank who have sums on deposit in excess of $60,000. This, it seems to me, is an issue that is quite separate from that which will be examined by Mr. Justice Estey. Whether we should reimburse these depositors is an issue which I think is severable from Mr. Justice Estey's report. I think we can proceed with both issues at the same time.

Senator Frith: The Honourable Leader of the Government and I see matters differently. I had hoped that he might consider taking this question under advisement. If he says that he is not able to do so, then, in my view, that raises a question for all honourable senators.

Let us assume that the bill is before us and that we have no report from Mr. Justice Estey. The government will then be asking us to spend taxpayers' money to reimburse the depositors. The Leader of the Government is saying that our consideration of whether the depositors should or should not be reimbursed has nothing to do with the inquiry of Mr. Justice Estey. However, we act as trustees of the taxpayers. It seems to me that, if honourable senators and other legislators are being asked to spend the money of the taxpayers, it would be quite reasonable for them to be able to explain why that money is being spent. Part of their reasons can be based on a report from Mr. Justice Estey. It seems to me that the two matters are not separate but are very closely linked.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend wants to debate the bill now and I think that that is a mistake. I think he should wait until the bill is before the committee in pre-study and before us later in this house. If he continues in his present frame of mind—if he does not wish to pass the bill until certain conditions have been met—then that is something he can tell us about in time.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am not debating the bill. I am asking whether the government realizes that there is a close connection between the report of Mr. Justice Estey and the passage of this bill. To my mind, the government should be able to say if we are going to be asked to pass this bill and to reimburse the depositors with taxpayers' money even though we do not have that report before us. If that is the answer, then it is an answer.

• (1405)

Senator Roblin: The connection that I see in the bill is the connection between the bill and the depositors of those banks who are anxiously awaiting Parliament's verdict on what will happen to their affairs; and the longer we keep them dangling and the longer we keep this uncertainty in the air, the less satisfactory it is for all concerned. I believe that would be particularly appreciated by those senators who come from western Canada and who are familiar with the local currents of opinion with respect to this matter.

So the policy of the government is to obtain the will of Parliament as soon as possible as to how we should treat the depositors. The other matters can be left for the consideration of Mr. Justice Estey who is going to examine it—and if my honourable friend wishes, there is nothing to stop him, when this committee meets, from asking all the questions he needs to ask to satisfy himself that this bill is proper or otherwise. He will have the opportunity; and if he considers it improper for us to proceed in the way we are doing—my policy statement on the matter is clear—he will have plenty of opportunity to express his views and to secure the support of those he can in this chamber.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that is perhaps an answer. I listened carefully to the Leader of the Government, and I understood him to say that the government's policy is to deal with the dangling depositors and that the sooner we can deal with that, the better that will be for all concerned. My question, again, is: Are the taxpayers not included in the "all concerned"?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend will have an opportunity to express his concerns to the taxpayers when he is in committee. The government is making its position perfectly clear—

Senator Frith: Will the Leader of the Government—

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend will allow me to make my statement. The government's position is perfectly clear. We consider that the first priority now is to satisfy the situation with respect to the depositors, and it is our conviction that Canadian taxpayers, when they hear the full story, will agree with the policy we are adopting.

Senator Frith: But they will not hear the whole story until after the report. However, that is an answer: The government's priority is the depositors. That answers my question.

Senator Roblin: I object to my honourable friend's statement that they will not hear the facts until after the report—

Senator Frith: Then why have the investigation and report?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend can ask any question he likes to satisfy his curiosity in the committee, and he cannot slough off that responsibility on the Estey Commission.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: What my honourable friend's impression is of his honourable friend—namely, me—is not dealing with the question. What I do or do not do concerning the committee is not the question. The question is: Will the government be asking Parliament to pass the bill, and spend taxpayers' money in consequence, before the Estey Commission has reported? I do not think I am misinterpreting the Leader of the Government by saying he is not prepared to say one way or the other, but that the priority in the bill is to look after the depositors.

Senator Roblin: That is correct. Our priority is to pass this bill; and my honourable friend has it within his own power to deal with this bill when he gets it. He is raising points on policy. What is his policy? Is his policy going to be to support the bill or not? We will hear about that in due course.

Senator Frith: Now, just a minute. Has Question Period now changed to the point that the Leader of the Government is asking what the opposition's policy is? What I am going to do or not do in committee, or what the opposition is going to do or not do in the committee proceedings, has as much to do with the question I asked as the flowers that bloom in the spring—

An Hon. Senator: Tra, la!

Senator Frith: The question was asked and explained, and I do not know why my honourable friend insists on saying what I can or cannot do. I tried to say that if I understood his answer correctly, it is that we might very well be asked to pass the bill, rescuing the depositors, without having the report of the Estey Commission. Is that not correct—apart from what I can do? I know what I can do. Don't tell me again what I can do.

Senator Roblin: I will be watching to see what my honourable friend actually does.

Senator Frith: More flowers that bloom in the spring.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question with respect to the appointment of Mr. Justice Estey. A report in the Ottawa Citizen dated August 21, 1985, says:

Canada's Chief Justice warned today that judges' independence may be compromised if they continue to sit on royal commissions and inquiries in which they're "embroiled in politically contentious disputes."

In a speech at the Canadian Bar Association's annual meeting, Mr. Justice Brian Dickson repeated one of the basic tenets of law: "Justice must be seen to be done as well as be done."

He said he's becoming "increasingly concerned" about certain extra-judicial activities which could tend to politicize the role of judges and potentially detract from their impartial and independent status.

"I think there's always a great danger of a judge engaging in a royal commission—most of which are highly political and highly contentious—that his objectivity and impartiality, his independence may be prejudiced."

My question is: Did the Prime Minister discuss with Chief Justice Dickson the question of the appointment of Mr. Justice Estey before he actually made it?

● (1410)

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I cannot answer that question, nor am I entirely sure that I can undertake to answer it. However, I shall give my honourable friend my opinion, that it is quite likely that Mr. Justice Estey discussed the matter with Chief Justice Dickson before accepting the assignment.

NORTHLAND BANK—COMPENSATION OF DEPOSITORS— GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, on September 25, I asked the Leader of the Government whether the government had given a commitment to compensating all depositors even those with deposits in excess of $60,000. However, the leader answered at the time that since the government was not faced with that situation he could not answer the question. However, if one reads the newspapers today one will get an indication. Can the leader indicate now whether it is government policy?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Is my honourable friend talking about the Northland Bank?

Senator Olson: Yes.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend will see the government's full policy when the bill gets first reading on Thursday. At this point I do not have it, and I do not want to describe a bill that I cannot refer to accurately.

Senator Olson: The question is not very complicated. The Leader of the Government was able to answer that all the depositors in the CCB would be compensated. Is that also the policy of the government respecting the Northland Bank?

Senator Roblin: I see my honourable friend's point. I am firmly of the belief that the bill will cover both banks.

Senator Olson: Up to 100 per cent of all deposits?

Senator Roblin: Yes.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

SALE OF CANNED TUNA UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION— CONSUMER CONFIDENCE—FUTURE OF STAR-KIST PLANT— GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I would like to know what, if anything, the government is currently doing in order to restore in the public and in the minds of consumers, at home and abroad, confidence in the wholesomeness of Canadian fish. Also, does the government have a plan to maintain the jobs of the workers at the Star-Kist plant in St. Andrews which, as everyone knows, has been seriously affected by the publicity of the past weeks?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think I can tell my honourable friend that the government is examining in depth the whole question of certification of the wholesomeness of food of every kind. I think that I am within proper bounds if I tell my honourable friend that some announcements may be made with respect to this matter when the policy has been thoroughly considered.

With respect to employment at the plant in St. Andrews, New Brunswick, one must hope that the plant will continue in operation, because it has produced an acceptable product over many a long year, no matter what one happens to think of the particular issue that has been in the public press so persistently for the last little while. I believe that it will continue to produce a good product. However, it is clear to me that the plant will have some difficulties in re-establishing the full market, and for the next short period of time I would expect that to be the situation. We will just have to wait and see how the matter develops.

INDEPENDENCE OF INSPECTORS

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Will the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate give us the assurance that these steps that are being taken will involve firm promises that there will be no more political interference with the work of professional inspectors in whom the public can put its trust without fear of partisan intervention?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think I ought to say to my honourable friend that when he sees the new arrangements that have been made he will find that they are a distinct improvement over the present ones which have been in effect for so many long years.

INSPECTION FUNCTION—CONSULTATION WITH INDUSTRY

Hon. Romeo LeBlanc: May I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if the government intends to lay the blame on the fisheries inspectors for the government's own problems and its own mistake in overruling them in their professional functions and capacity, and return to an old canard which is the sweetheart of central agencies, namely, that somehow everything will be perfect in food production if you centralize all inspection functions in one department, be it Consumer Affairs or another? I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he can give an undertaking that the government will consult with the industry before eliminating inspectors in fish plants who are performing duties way beyond the duties of policemen, as it seems to have been interpreted.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My friend is really asking me to anticipate what the government intends to do in respect of this matter. I think I would be unwise to attempt to do that at the present time. However, the central point that I get from what he has said, and I think it is a sound observation, is that before any changes are made, there should be full consultation with those who are affected by those changes, and I agree with that.

[Senator Roblin.]

THE SENATE

VICTORIA BUILDING—SENATORS' PARKING

Hon. Pierre De Bané: Honourable senators, I have a representation to make to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I had the honour to join this institution approximately a year and a half ago. I am one of that group, consisting of perhaps one-third of the Senate membership housed in the Victoria Building. For the last year and a half we have been asking for decent parking there. This morning it was pouring, as everybody knows. I am not one of those fortunate enough to have an office in this building. We have discussed this matter at length in the Internal Economy Committee. Some of my colleagues have even spoken to officials of the Department of Public Works about this matter.

May I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to speak to Mr. La Salle, the Minister of Public Works, about this matter so that those of us who are housed in that building can have decent parking there and not be subjected to the vagaries of the weather, as we were this morning?

I know that others in this chamber have been in that building longer than I have been. Some of your own party, in fact, are housed there and they have been very patient. How much longer must we wait before something is done to rectify this situation? Must we wait another year and a half, two or three years? I would like to have an answer.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I wish I could give my honourable friend an answer, but I am sure he knows as well as I do that the subject to which he has referred comes within the purview of the Internal Economy Committee. That is a body on which all parties in the Senate are represented. That is the body which can make whatever representations it likes to the minister, and that is also the body which has the responsibility for this matter. I sympathize with my honourable friend, because nobody likes to get their feet wet. On the other hand, I have to tell him that he is applying to the wrong official at the present.

Senator De Bané: With all due respect, I must tell the honourable leader that everyone on that committee is, of course, in favour of the idea that all senators in this chamber have decent working conditions. However, there is only one of us who is a member of cabinet and that is you, Mr. Leader. I would be very grateful if you would speak to your colleague, the Minister of Public Works, about this matter.

We can discuss matters at great length in that committee, and everybody is in favour of motherhood, but it is only you who are sitting at the same table as Mr. La Salle, and I am sure you will defend our interests.

Senator Roblin: I am also in favour of motherhood. Don't count me out. It is an important institution. However, I have to say to my honourable friend that if I allowed myself to be seduced by his persuasive argument, I might find myself in the position of telling the Internal Economy Committee what to do, not only on this issue but on others. If I yield on this one, then people will ask, "Who is running the Internal Economy Committee?" Well, it ain't me, and I want to make that perfectly clear. Therefore, despite my honourable friend's blandishments, I cannot give him much hope that I can do what he wants me to do.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William M. Kelly moved the second reading of Bill C-71, to amend the Customs Tariff.

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to say at the outset how much I regret that Senator Sinclair is not present in the chamber today. He responded to my presentation of Bill C-60 by referring to the relative, as I believe he put it, "light weight" of the bill. He referred to that bill as being not too important. I simply want to say on the record that Senator Sinclair was appointed to the Senate after I was, so I suppose he is having difficulty understanding how the system works. My leader, quite properly, is cautious about assigning bills of too much weight to junior senators, such as myself. I wish to draw attention to the fact that Senator Sinclair's leader demonstrates the same care and caution in reserving bills of a lightweight nature for Senator Sinclair to respond to, as I think he should.

I hope that I have moved now to something a little heavier by sponsoring Bill C-71, which is a bill of considerably more significance than was Bill C-60. I am sorry to see that the burden has not fallen to Senator Sinclair to respond to this very difficult and complex bill. However, I will proceed in his absence.

Honourable senators, Bill C-71, which was recently passed by the House of Commons, proposes a number of amendments to the Customs Tariff. Its provisions were originally included in the notice of ways and means motion amending the Customs Tariff which was tabled by the Minister of Finance on May 23 as part of the budget papers.

Honourable senators, the Customs Tariff is a major commercial policy instrument which affects Canada's economic performance, trade interests and international relations. More specifically, the Customs Tariff has a direct impact on the costs, prices and competitive position of imported and domestically produced goods. It is therefore important that its provisions be kept up to date to reflect accurately the changing needs of domestic manufacturers and to ensure that our international commitments are implemented in a timely fashion.

A brief overview of the amendments to the Customs Tariff, which comprise Bill C-71, will make it clear that these objectives are met by this piece of legislation.

At the request of an independent automotive task force, Bill C-71 makes provision for motor vehicle parts imported from developing countries to be entered into Canada under the General Preferential Tariff at two-thirds of the most-favoured-nation rate as of May 24, 1985. Automobiles and other motor vehicles from developing countries will continue to be allowed duty free entry until January 1, 1987, at which time they will be subject to a 6 per cent General Preferential Tariff rate.

It should be noted that it was decided to defer the tariff increase on the motor vehicles until 1987 in order to give foreign vehicle manufacturers in developing countries an opportunity to increase the "Canadian value added" in their vehicles, thus enabling them to reduce the impact of the tariff through the use of existing automotive remission programs.

Recommendations of the Tariff Board to the Minister of Finance on two references are also being acted on in this bill. As honourable senators are aware, the Tariff Board is an independent body established to hear appeals on certain matters pertaining to the Customs Act, the Excise Tax Act and other federal legislation. It also, at the request of the Minister of Finance, conducts inquiries and makes recommendations to the Minister of Finance on tariff related issues. The Tariff Board has proven to be an effective "arm's length" forum in which Canadian manufacturers can make their views known about the scope, coverage and rate structure of tariff items covering products which they produce.

Honourable senators, I refer to the two specific references of the Tariff Board. First, action to prevent future erosion of the protective effect of the tariff on lightweight woollen fabrics and duty reductions on raw wool and woven fabrics for dyeing and finishing, continuance of five temporary tariff items by order in council covering wool fabrics for men's clothing, the government's response to this report is now complete.

Secondly, the government will also have completed its action on phase 1 of the report of the Tariff Board entitled "Tariff items covering goods made/not made in Canada."

The Tariff Board review of the "made/not made" items arose as part of Canada's Tokyo Round multilateral trade negotiation agreement with the United States. Last December, for 19 tariff items Parliament approved the removal of the condition that imported goods must be of a class or kind made, or not made, in Canada in order to be allowed entry at specified rates. This bill contains similar provisions for the remaining items of phase 1 of the board's report.

Several amendments take action on representations received from the private sector; most of these provide for lower rates of duty on various goods that are not made in Canada. A few restore rates of tariff protection that have been lost because of appeal decisions concerning the classification of goods. These amendments are varied in their impact. Three rather interesting examples will provide an indication of the benefits of the actions proposed in this connection. First, duty free entry is being provided for aluminum drop-centre livestock trailers, allowing livestock producers and trucking companies to lower their costs in transporting livestock by road; second, all industrial workers using welders' helmets and face shields, as well as industrial face shields, will be assured that the costs of such important, protective equipment are kept to a minimum through the duty free entry of all these pieces of safety equipment; and, third, all those interested in encouraging the safer participation of their sons and daughters on the football field will welcome the proposal to provide duty free entry of football helmets, face masks and shoulder pads.

Again referring to Senator Sinclair—and I must say I am so sorry that he is not here—in looking through this vast book of items that were covered, I came across something that I felt was of particular interest to him. He has been an associate and friend of mine for many years so I may be excused for perhaps appearing to be somewhat less than respectful, but please keep in mind that we are friends. Tariff item 40904-1 has to do with the clarification of the definition of manure spreaders. I felt that Senator Sinclair would be particularly interested in that because that is a device that I believe he has need for many, many times.

Senator Murray: Here he comes.

Senator Kelly: I shall hasten to the end of this because I want to get clear of him.

Senator Frith: We should reverse the tape and hear a replay.

Senator Kelly: In order to streamline the Department of National Revenue's administration of the tariff, particularly insofar as the travelling public is concerned, Canadians will now be able to import duty and tax free goods up to $100 any number of times during the year, provided they have been absent from the country for 48 hours. Canadians are currently restricted to one such importation per calendar quarter.

Furthermore, authority previously delegated to the Minister of National Revenue will now be delegated to the deputy minister of that department which will enable him to impose or remove seasonal tariff rates on certain horticultural products as Canadian production comes on line or ceases. This will ensure that protection designed for the Canadian agricultural producers is available when needed but that consumers are able to purchase imported products at as low a cost as possible when Canadian production is no longer available.

Honourable senators, it is clear that Bill C-71 contains a number of tariff measures which are important to certain segments of the Canadian economy and, in some instances, to individual citizens. It is also in keeping with Canada's international undertakings and meets a number of our specific international commitments. This is a brief summary of the provisions of this legislation which should provide sufficient information to honourable senators on the reasons why Bill C-71 deserves speedy consideration and approval of this chamber.

On motion of Senator Hicks, debate adjourned.

CANADIAN INSTITUTE FOR INTERNATIONAL PEACE AND SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay, for the second reading of the Bill C-69 intituled: "An Act to amend the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security Act and certain other Acts in relation thereto".—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.).

[Senator Kelly]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it was our understanding that the debate on Bill C-72 was to proceed today. Senator MacEachen does intend to proceed on Bill C-69, but he has just left the chamber for a few moments. Perhaps we can revert to this order later.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, that we postpone this order until later this day?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

MOTION TO EXAMINE AND REPORT ON FILM ENTITLED: "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the activities of the National Film Board with respect to the production and distribution of the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss".—(Honourable Senator Godfrey).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Godfrey was in the chamber earlier, and it is my understanding that he wishes to proceed on this order today.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): He was here; I can vouch for that.

Senator Frith: Perhaps we can also stand this order until later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it your wish that we postpone this order until later this day?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE
AUTHORIZED TO ADJOURN FROM PLACE TO PLACE WITHIN CANADA

Hon. Jack Marshall pursuant to notice of Thursday, June 13, 1985, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, which was authorized by the Senate on Wednesday, December 12, 1984, to review and update the recommendations contained in the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, entitled: "They Served—We Care", tabled in the Senate on 20th October, 1981, and to enquire into any matter related thereto, or any sub-committee so authorized by the Committee, be empowered to adjourn from place to place within Canada for the purpose of such consideration.

He said: Honourable senators are aware that the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology was authorized to form a sub-committee to deal with veterans affairs, which I am happy and honoured to chair.

I would remind honourable senators of the report which was produced by the former committee of the Senate on Social Affairs, which made seven recommendations to the Government of Canada concerning various anomalies in the veterans legislation and some of the programs which we felt should be put into practice. We are pleased to note that the Government of Canada has implemented legislation covering four of those recommendations.

With the age of veterans being what it is, I feel it most important that government should consider the three remaining recommendations carefully, as they are being considered by many of the veterans groups across the country including, particularly, the Dominion Command of the Royal Canadian Legion and the National Council on Veterans Affairs.

I believe that two of the outstanding recommendations are most important. One has to do with the eligibility of veterans residing outside of Canada. I feel it is urgent that this be recognized. I know that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has this matter under active consideration. However, because of the age of veterans, I feel the urgency of this should be stressed at every opportunity.

Honourable senators, another point which I have previously mentioned in this chamber has to do with the fact that many veterans without Canadian military service have, since 1960, been able to draw veterans allowance in Canada and then return to their homeland or other countries and continue to receive the allowance. This situation prevails in the case of allied veterans who moved to Canada and, as a result of legislation which gave them eligibility after residence of ten years in Canada, were able to qualify for War Veterans Allowance. Having received it, they then returned to the foreign country and remained eligible to receive this allowance. Yet, our Canadian veterans—many of whom had lengthy overseas service—who took their discharge and remained, for instance, in the U.K., now, under the act, find it necessary to return to Canada, remain here for at least one full year and be in receipt of the allowance before proceeding back to the U.K. Because of the costs involved, illness, age and other commitments, few are financially able to do this.

I believe it is important to remind honourable senators that, when the Canadian soldiers, the youth of our country, went overseas, no one told them that, if they served overseas, they would have to return to Canada in order to be eligible for the benefits to which we committed ourselves.

To qualify for the allowance, our veterans who are now aged approximately 65, would have to leave their families in, say, the U.K., return to Canada, qualify immediately and spend a year here. Meanwhile, they would have to pay not only for their own shelter and accommodation in this country; they would also have to provide shelter and accommodation for the family they had left behind.

Honourable senators, payment of this allowance to those veterans would not cost Canada a lot of money because many of them are receiving social assistance in the U.K. We would be paying only for their treatment benefits and the difference between the amount they are receiving under social service programs and the amount they would receive if eligible for the allowance.

The Canadian Legion, in the report which they submitted to our committee a few months ago, says that it is only fair to extend the legislation to provide eligibility for those Canadian service men and their widows without forcing them to come back to Canada for one year. This prerequisite really accomplishes nothing except to impose expenses on and create hardship for those involved. If the allowance can be paid to non-Canadians after ten years' residence in Canada and can be continued for life after their departure from this country, then surely our own veterans living outside of Canada should receive the same benefits without being compelled to return.

That is one of the recommendations contained in the report "They Served—We Care" which has not, as yet, been fulfilled. While I recognize that it is being examined carefully, I think that our committee must do everything it can to impress upon the government the need for that change.

Another matter to be raised is that, under Prisoner of War Compensation, there is an unfair variance in compensation given on the basis of the length of incarceration. Between those veterans who served only three months and those veterans who served up to three years, there is only a difference of between 10 and 20 per cent in compensation. I think it is very important that this discrepancy be taken care of in more realistic terms. I hope that, through our committee, we can impress upon the minister and the government that that is an anomaly in veterans' legislation and it should be corrected.

Honourable senators, these are only two of the items which we would like to take up in committee. There are others, and I will mention them briefly. There is now a move towards recognizing the eligibility for war veteran's allowance of those who served in Canada for one year. There is certainly a change that has to be made under the Charter of Rights—women qualify for war veteran's allowance at age 55, while men have to wait until they are 60. I maintain that this is reverse discrimination and should be corrected. In the veterans legislation, there are many anomalies that still exist—those related to pension adjudication, casual earnings, and, particularly, the new aging veterans program, which, although it is successful, does not include all of the veterans.

I would appreciate the authorization sought in this motion, honourable senators.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as Senator Marshall has pointed out, the reference has already been made to the committee as of December 12, 1984. All we are really concerned with is the additional power he is requesting to enable the committee to adjourn from place to place within Canada for the purpose of such consideration. Has he any idea whether there is any budgetary problem involved with that? If not, it seems to me that we should adopt the motion.

Senator Marshall: Originally, I had no definite information as to where the committee would travel, so it was an inconvenience to seek the necessary funds. The most important place to visit is Charlottetown where the headquarters of the Department of Veterans Affairs is located. The plan is to go through all of the offices there in order to learn more about how the legislation is implemented, with a view to examining the background to these recommendations that we are making. If need be, the committee will visit other parts of Canada in order to hear different views on a country-wide basis.

Senator Frith: I understand that and I am persuaded that these powers are needed. I am only asking whether there has been a draft budget submitted to the Internal Economy Committee. Does the chairman of the committee who is also the sponsor of the motion know whether there might be a shortage of funds, because adequate funding is necessary to empower him to carry out this investigation?

Senator Marshall: We have a budget ready and I will take my chances.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN INSTITUTE FOR INTERNATIONAL PEACE AND SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 3:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay, for the second reading of the Bill C-69, intituled: "An Act to amend the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security Act and certain other Acts in relation thereto".—(Hon. Senator MacEachen, P.C.).

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in taking part in the debate on second reading of this particular bill, I should like to thank Senator Macquarrie for introducing it and for making some very important comments about the purposes of the institute and its activities. I have no difficulty with the amendments which are proposed, which are, basically, of an administrative or housekeeping character. I would like to make a few general comments with respect to the circumstances which led to the idea of creating an institute, and then refer to some specific activities with respect to the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security.

The idea for the institute was first mentioned in the Speech from the Throne of December, 1983, in which His Excellency the Governor General stated:

Improving the climate among nations requires knowledge, creativity and a determination to find solutions. Reflecting Canada's concern about current international tensions, the Government will create a publicly funded centre to gather, collate and digest the enormous volume of information now available on defence and arms control issues. Fresh ideas and new proposals, regardless of source, will be studied and promoted.

That speech was delivered in an atmosphere of East-West relations which, at that time, was much more tense than it is today. At the time the institute was promoted, in the context of Mr. Trudeau's peace initiative, there was certainly cessation in the arms negotiation talks in Geneva, and certainly the prospect of a summit between the leaders of the Soviet Union and the United States was almost non-existent. Happily, the international atmosphere has improved. Today, we have resumed negotiations in Geneva and we have the prospect of an early summit—the first summit between President Reagan and his counterpart in the Soviet Union. By way of preparing his approach to the summit, the president is consulting his allied colleagues.

When I spoke in the final debate in the House of Commons supporting the original bill, I made a comment or two which I think may be worth repeating in order to set this subject in its historical context. I said:

The Institute for International Peace and Security is the legacy of Canada's latest peace initiative, an initiative which all parliamentarians have supported and earnestly encouraged. In recent months we in Canada have made a special effort through the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his associates to make a contribution to the search for peace, and particularly to bring about an improved atmosphere in a deteriorated East-West relationship. As I said, that effort has been encouraged by Canadians. It has been supported by all Members of the House, and I believe the effort that Canada has made, led by the Prime Minister, has been outstanding, has drawn attention to very important issues, and has had an effect in lessening the tensions which still exist in a serious way between the East and the West.

As I said, honourable senators, the atmosphere has happily improved, but the necessity for support for the Institute for International Peace and Security has not in any way diminished. It was the intention of all members of Parliament, and particularly the members of the standing committee in the House of Commons—and certainly in this body—to create a world class institute, an institute of which Canadians could be proud. Even though we have a lessening in tensions, I do not believe that the necessity for the institute has diminished.

It was apparent in our discussions on East-West relations—and I think it is still apparent—that there are relatively few Canadian sources of information and expertise. I should not say that those sources are non-existent in Canada, but they are relatively few. I made that point in the House of Commons debate in saying:

At present the principal sources of information on defence and arms control questions lie beyond our borders. This means that public judgment in Canada is shaped by perceptions of security devised by others and for the most part reported by others consequently. Issues of special importance to Canada have not received adequate coverage, nor have the concerns of Canadians been fully appreciated.

I believe that is still evident. Frequently, when leading television programs call upon experts to deal with matters of international security, matters of peace and war, almost always the expert is from the United States or Europe, and seldom is a person from Canada—even though in this country there are those possessing the necessary qualifications—called upon to give an opinion on these developing circumstances.

It was interesting to me, honourable senators, in reading the report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, chaired for the Senate by our colleague, Senator Flynn, to find that reference was made to this particular problem. The committee had to struggle with the question of making a recommendation on the Strategic Defense Initiative. We may have an opportunity later to discuss the conclusions of the committee on that question. I hope we do, because Senator Flynn has promised that he will be moving a motion that would put that report before us.

The committee, on the subject of Canadian information, made the following comment—and I am quoting from page 18:64 under the heading "Commitment to Arms Control":

The majority of the Committee was struck by the fact that an overwhelming portion of the testimony it received, both in favour of and in opposition to the SDI was drawn from secondary sources, such as journals, magazines and newspapers of U.S. origin. They concluded that a significant Canadian effort is required to inquire into the strategic and technological issues involved in ballistic missile defence and they recommend that the government continue to do primary research on the subject of ballistic missile defence and attempt to expose the public to primary sources of information on this issue.

A very good thought and very relevant to the purposes of this Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security—because one of its purposes was to create a centre in Canada that would add to the expertise in this country relating to questions of international peace and security, in which Canada has a very deep interest, to which Canada has a deep commitment and a deep desire to make an important contribution.

What the committee found in its deliberations just recently is an added reason why we should pay a good deal of attention to the institute, which has the capacity to add to Canadian expertise and knowledge.

Another important point I want to stress is that when the original bill was in the House of Commons, there were provisions made that the minister could ask the committee for advice in relation to any question involving international peace and security. It certainly was the view of the government of the time that it would be useful when confronted with an important question—for example, the testing of cruise missiles in Canada—to have the opportunity to go to a body like the independent Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security and ask it for its views, which could be tested against, or added to, the views which would normally come from the Department of National Defence and the Department of External Affairs.

The minister has the opportunity to ask the institute for advice. I believe it is a good provision, and I want to ask the spokesman for the government whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or the Minister of National Defence, or the Prime Minister, have taken advantage of that opportunity to ask the institute for advice on any questions—such as, for example, the Strategic Defense Initiative, or any other matter related to international peace and security; because, when we come later to the composition of the board of the institute, we will find that it is made up of a very diversified group of people, reflecting many viewpoints, and its advice might be useful to, although not necessarily binding on the government.

Members of the House of Commons asked why, if the minister could ask for advice, the standing committee of the House of Commons could not ask for advice. A provision was put into the bill enabling the members of the Standing Committee on National Defence and Foreign Affairs in the House of Commons to ask, with the consent of the House, for the views of the institute on matters relating to international peace and security.

I must in a sense apologize, being the one who presented the bill in the House of Commons, for not having provided the opportunity for the standing committee of the Senate, if it wished, to make a request to the institute for an opinion or advice.

An Hon. Senator: An oversight.

Senator MacEachen: I apologize. I regret that my oversight was not picked up when the bill came to the Senate.

• (1500)

Senator Roblin: There is a reason for that.

Senator MacEachen: It may be that we ought to think of recommending, if we are not bold enough to make an amendment, that the Senate be given treatment equal to that given to the House of Commons.

Having made that point, which is not one that I would press very hard, I was interested, after looking at the long list of persons who appeared before the Joint Committee on Canada's International Relations with relation to the trade issue and the Strategic Defense Initiative, in noting that I could not find that the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security had made a formal submission to that committee dealing with the relevant question of Strategic Defense Initiative. Perhaps the spokesman for the government or a member of the committee can enlighten us as to the reasons why this institute was not called upon formally to present its views before recommendations were made to the Commons and the Senate.

The first annual report of the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security has been published. Included in the report are pictures of the members of the board of directors and a brief biography of each one. It is an impressive list of persons. Honourable senators will recall that consultations were held with many national organizations, all of which made recommendations as to persons who might sit on this board. Then there were consultations with all the political parties in the House of Commons so that when the bill was concurred in on June 28, 1984, it was possible for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, myself at the time, to list in the House of Commons the names of all those who had been approved. I find that that undertaking has been carried out and that everybody is included in the photograph except three members. These are the international members of the board.

Perhaps the honourable senator who is sponsoring this bill for the government would tell us why we have not yet—or have we?—appointed the three persons who are on the original list. They include Mr. Paul Warnke, former Director, U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency; Mr. Ian Smart, former Director of Studies, Royal Institute of International Affairs, London; and Mr. Christoph Bertram, editor of Die Zeit, and former Director of the International Institute for Strategic Studies, London. The annual report states that it is likely that two of the international members will be appointed. A lot of time has passed since June, 1984. It may be that the appointments have been made, but I would like to know if that is the case, and, if so, the names of the persons appointed. While it is important to have Canadian views on these questions, I think it is also useful to have the views of the European countries and the United States when dealing with questions of international peace and security.

Even though the impulse for the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security derived from the deteriorated situation in East-West relations, the institute has a role beyond that. Certainly, it has a role in any area and in dealing with any subject that affects international peace and security anywhere in the world. Just recently, the institute funded a round table conference in Ottawa on negotiations with respect to peace in Central America. I read in the annual report that in October there will be a workshop or conference in Ottawa on the question of the Strategic Defense Initiative and all its implications. I noticed also that the institute has supported financially various studies in various fields and various programs that have a bearing on international peace and security. As of the end of last month the institute has funded 62 different research and public education grants totalling about $500,000.

From what I have said honourable senators will readily gather that I am very much in support not only of the institute and its efforts, but of the bill itself because it gives us an opportunity to approve the amendments and an opportunity to recall the circumstances in which the initiative was launched, the fact that it received all party support, that those who are leading it, the board of directors, received the endorsement of all parties and that it was launched in that spirit. I believe that we are fortunate, not only to have the directors who are listed in the annual report, but also the chairman, Mr. Bill Barton, an outstanding Canadian diplomat and, as the Executive Director whom Senator Macquarrie has mentioned, Mr. Geoffrey Pearson. I must say that insofar as the government of the day was concerned, when Mr. Pearson was proposed as one who might be considered a suitable Executive Director, he received its support. When the board of directors met and deliberated, as was provided for in the legislation, they selected Mr. Pearson. The choice of Mr. Pearson, as well as that of Mr. Barton, has received the support of the present government, as it received our support at that time.

I hope that we will keep a watchful eye on this institute. It may be premature to have a discussion on the institute in the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs but later on, as it develops in its work, it would be a good thing for us to have the chairman and the director appear before our committee in order to hear about their work and to present our views so as to ensure that as the program develops it continues to meet the original objectives of Parliament. It would also give us the opportunity to ensure that the effort is not being spread too thin, but is being concentrated in areas that have a chance of making a contribution to a better understanding of the obstacles to peace and security in the world and to the development of policy in this area.

Perhaps, honourable senators, Senator Macquarrie will take into account the questions I have asked and if he does not now have the information, he might provide it when we give third reading to the bill.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the sponsor of Bill C-69 with respect to the membership of the board of directors of the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, since the Leader of the Opposition has named three possible directors from outside of Canada. Is the sponsor aware of any internal regulations pertaining to this bill, or any clauses in the original act which provide criteria and qualifications relating to a director who can serve on this committee, whether he be from an English-speaking democracy or from any other country or any other continent of the world?

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that if the Honourable Senator Macquarrie speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have not much to add to the debate that has taken place in this chamber with respect to this bill, but I do want to refer to an observation made by the Leader of the Opposition with respect to the reference in the bill to the presentation of the activities of this institute to bodies in the House of Commons.

We are, of course, always interested to have this chamber recognized in legislation from time to time as may be deemed appropriate, and perhaps it was an oversight that it was not included in the original legislation. However, whether or not it was an oversight does not prevent us from correcting it, because in this chamber we have quite a different committee system, by which I mean to say that the committees themselves can decide what they wish to do. They do not require a reference from this house, except of a general nature. On the other hand, if they do require a reference from this house, it can be given in accordance with the expressed will of the Senate rather than by a decree of the executive.

Therefore if honourable senators think that representatives of this body whose activities we are discussing should appear before the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs to deal with the matters we have raised and to give an account of its activities, there is nothing to prevent that committee from so arranging, and without in any way attempting to instruct the members of that committee, I simply say that the matter is before them. If they feel that it requires their attention, they are free to act, and the notion that it requires executive agreement has no bearing on our procedure.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I would like to take the opportunity of thanking Senator MacEachen for his comments. We knew that those comments would be good and helpful because we know that he was a very fine Secretary of State for External Affairs. As I promised him when he came to the Senate, because I was a great friend of his I would never talk about his tenure as Minister of Finance. However, as Secretary of State for External Affairs, he was a positive force in the world and, in my opinion, one of our best ministers. He has again proved himself today by his wisdom and his counsel and even by his confession that, in another place, he may have been a bit remiss in considering the rights and the importance of this honourable chamber which he now graces and in which we value his presence.

I will take the question that Senator MacEachen has asked, and similarly that asked by Senator Haidasz and, in a researched and academic way, verify what I am confident will be answers with which they will be content.

In these matters, when an organization of some sort is set up, members of Parliament of both houses are anxious to display their interest in, concern for and support of such an organization. However, in the process, we might momentarily be working against the arm's-length principle upon which the whole thing depends. Senator MacEachen was profoundly correct in his suggestion that, while it may have been created in the days of obvious East-West tension, the institute should not confine its emphasis to that particular aspect of foreign policy. As Senator MacEachen rightly indicated, in the projects which this institute has already undertaken, it also has demonstrated that it is not so limited.

At this stage it is not for me to introduce new material, but I hope that honourable senators will allow me to confess that, in the old material, I made an omission. I regret that I did not make reference to Ambassador William Barton, the chairman, whom I first met at the United Nations longer ago than his appearance would indicate. He is a man whom I have admired for a long time and I think the institute in Canada is most fortunate that he is its chairman, together with that distinguished gentleman diplomat, Geoffrey Pearson, the Executive Director. I am glad to get the reassurance from my honourable friend that Mr. Pearson was the chosen candidate of the former government, because he is truly a proven and dedicated statesman.

With reference to such other answers as may be required, I will consult with such people as Senator Roblin, Senator Macdonald and other learned persons and have that information available when the bill comes before us for third reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Macquarrie, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

MOTION TO EXAMINE AND REPORT ON FILM ENTITLED "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—DEBATE CONTINUED

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 4:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the activities of the National Film Board with respect to the production and distribution of the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss".—(Honourable Senator Godfrey).

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, the reason I am speaking on this motion is really to discuss the problem of this type of matter being referred to a committee. This point has already been well covered by both Senator Frith and Senator MacDonald. I have seen the film and can only say that I do not wish to go into the merits of the film itself at this point.

I recall the question of government interference with cultural organizations, which is so topical lately. When I was appointed to the board of directors of the Canada Council approximately 15 years ago what people spoke most to me about for the following year or so was two grants the Canada Council gave, one of $800 to a piano smasher in Vancouver—that was supposed to be a new art form—the other in the amount of $3,000 was given to the town fool of Vancouver. That was supposed to be an old art form. Those grants were the result of a whimsical sense of humour on the part of Peter Dwyer, the then Director of the Canada Council. Those grants had been given before I was a member of the board of directors. Nobody ever mentioned the other $42 million in grants given out each year. The board had already handled those matters by telling the staff in no uncertain terms that those were matters they should draw to the attention of the board before authorizing grants because of political flak and adverse publicity.

After I had served on the board for approximately 18 months, an emergency meeting was called of the executive committee. That meeting dealt with bitter complaints about government interference because the Secretary of State's Department was authorizing grants to cultural organizations that council officials thought should go through the council. Honourable senators should remember that this took place 14 years ago.

When I listened to all of those people I must confess that I blew up. I said: "Listen, has anybody, the Director, the Associate Director, the Chairman of the Canada Council, spoken to the Secretary of State, the man we rely on to obtain our funds, Mr. Pelletier?" I asked whether anyone had asked him to attend a meeting with the Canada Council or whether there was any liaison with the man we were looking to for funds to support the council's causes. They confessed that they had not and were persuaded to invite Mr. Pelletier to a meeting. He spent two hours with the board. I must say that that was a very productive and pleasant meeting. We discussed various mutual problems.

One has to be pragmatic on this question of arm's length as it relates to grants to cultural organizations. I will give honourable senators an illustration: Let us suppose that the Canada Council decided that it was only going to donate to large organizations, such as the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, the National Ballet of Canada, the Stratford Festival, Canada Opera, and the Montreal Symphony, instead of spreading the money around amongst many small organizations as well. Surely the government would have a right to step in and question them on that policy. I think that the same rule applies to any of these art organizations. The government should have the right to lay down some kind of general policy without getting into the nitty-gritty.

Having got that off my chest, I will come back to the National Film Board. I do not think that having the officials of the National Film Board appear before a parliamentary committee is the same as so-called government interference or government non-arm's length. I think Parliament is the watchdog of the expenditures and can go into the details. I think that if a cultural organization has done as the National Film Board has done in this case, they should explain and defend their actions to a committee of Parliament. They should have to justify their expenditures. Even though it may now be too late to undo the damage, if at this stage such an action should be taken, at least they will be more cautious in the future.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Godfrey: For that reason, I support the motion of Senator Molson.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, the last phrase my honourable friend, whom I much admire, used perturbs me.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Is this a question? You have spoken in the debate already.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I am sorry, senator, but—

Senator Gigantès: May I ask a question?

Senator Godfrey: Certainly.

Senator Gigantès: Do you not find that the last phrase of yours is precisely what is most disturbing about examining an opinion that has been presented by other people in an atmosphere in which we are going to induce in them the idea that they must be more cautious next time? And where do we stop? I will not bore you, honourable senators, with John Stuart Mill; they have all warned against this. Do you not think that the pride of the Canadian democracy is freedom; do you not think that the pride of the Canadian democracy is that in this country—

Senator Doody: Question!

Senator Gigantès:—we can have separatists in power, whereas in other countries they are in jail? Do you not think that this is what makes Canada ideal and great?

Senator Godfrey: When I said that they would be more cautious in the future, that was an unfortunate turn of phrase. What I really meant was that they should be more careful and accurate in the future, and I do not make any apologies for that.

When I saw the film—and I did not want to get into the film—a mechanic was speaking. Everyone who saw the film was under the impression that this mechanic was saying exactly what Billy Bishop's mechanic had said 65 years ago. It turns out that he was saying what a lot of other people were reported to have said.

As far as I am concerned, the film was misleading and inaccurate and, therefore, they should be more careful in the future in doing better research. That is what I really meant.

Senator Gigantès: Does the honourable senator think that intimidating writers and film producers before a Senate committee is really the best way to obtain more accuracy? Would he not concede that, on the contrary, that would expose the Senate, and quite properly so, to accusations of censorship?

Senator Godfrey: I have had correspondence with the Director of the National Film Board. There was a man by the name of Group Captain Bauer who went over there two or three years ago to conduct research. I believe that Senator Molson financed a later trip. Anyway, he did a great deal of research. I have written to the Director of the National Film Board about that. They have not answered the points I made in detail. I think it is about time they appeared before a body to answer those questions and not just brush those things aside.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, briefly and unusually in support of Senator Godfrey, I think that what we have to appreciate is that, yes, there is a great necessity for maintaining an arm's length relationship between the agencies of government and government itself in some cases. That does not apply in the same sense as between an agency of government and Parliament. Parliament has not only the right as the supplier of agencies of government—and I use “supplier” in the context of financial support—but the obligation to act on occasion, when it is called for, as a brake upon the untoward activities of agencies of government.

I think this is a clear case where one of the icons of Canada, one of our great heroes, has been demeaned in a most outrageous fashion by an agency of government. It is an ideal situation for Parliament, not government, to send a signal to those people that there are some things that are not acceptable in this country, and one which is not acceptable is tearing down the reputation of a man such as Billy Bishop.

I support Senator Molson's motion.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE—UNITED STATES AMBASSADOR'S COMMENTS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am sure that most of us noticed the comments made by the Ambassador of the United States on the question of free trade talks, at a Chamber of Commerce meeting. I have no objection to the ambassador giving his views on these subjects because I think it is quite useful, but he did raise some important points upon which it would be interesting to ascertain the policy position of the government. In urging Canada to engage in the widest possible discussion on the topic of free trade, he advised Canadian lumber producers that it would be wise for them to restrict their sales to the United States market, a warning which, on the face of it, seems to be contradictory to the whole concept of free trade.

I ask the Leader of the Government whether the government is prepared to state that it finds such a suggestion quite offensive, as Canada has now indicated its intention to engage in talks, and the ambassador seems to imply, to say the least, that it would be useful if Canadian producers were now to engage voluntarily in a restraint of trade.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think we must allow the ambassador the right, as my honourable friend suggested, to present his views which, presumably, are the views of the Government of the United States, in connection with the proposed opening of negotiations on the question of enlarged trade between our two nations. I do not think that we should take those comments as being indicative of policy on the part of the Government of Canada, as I am sure nobody does. As to whether or not it is the intention of the government to take up the suggestion at the present time, I would think that it is not our intention to do so.

If I can interpret what the ambassador was trying to tell us—and I may be incorrect in this and I will be seeing him this afternoon and perhaps I can ask him—he recognizes certain obstacles in the United States that will have to be dealt with by their administration rather than by ours. That seems to be at the heart of his particular dilemma. The Government of Canada, as far as I am aware at the present time, has no comment to make on the speech made by the ambassador.

Senator MacEachen: It is timely that the Leader of the Government is meeting the United States ambassador this afternoon. He might seek clarification from him as to what his meaning is when he suggests to Canadian lumber producers to engage in voluntary restraint, which is quite inconsistent with a free trade posture. But that is not really my question.

What I asked the Leader of the Government was: Would the government itself not find it unacceptable to have advice given to Canadian lumber producers by the United States ambassador to restrict their sales into the United States—sales that are legitimate and that have proven to be not in contravention of any international agreement even by American procedures? Is that the view of the government, or does the government find some merit in this suggestion?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend amuses me because for a number of years he had to respond to the statements made by the previous United States ambassador with respect to Canadian affairs which, I think, went a good deal deeper into our national psyche than does this particular matter. He has some experience in dealing with these matters. I confess I have not.

I was encouraged by the general tone of the ambassador's statement because he seemed to say that the door was open. I think what he was trying to tell us was that he saw certain obstacles which would have to be dealt with in the course of discussions, and I am sure that is the truth.

As to the question whether the Canadian government is advocating that particular policy with respect to lumber exports to the United States, the answer is, positively, no.

Senator MacEachen: I hope you tell him that.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

SALE OF CANNED TUNA UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION— SUGGESTED INQUIRY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of a recent CBC news item reporting a statement of a fishing industry spokesman that seven Progressive Conservative members of the House of Commons met last April to discuss the tainted tuna problem, can the Leader of the Government state whether his government will respond positively and hold a federal inquiry into this matter to restore public confidence in fish products?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I do not think my honourable friend really expects me to confirm or deny statements in the newspaper. There have been so many on this particular issue that one can hardly keep up with them.

As far as the government's policy is concerned, we have dealt effectively, promptly and, I think, correctly with the tuna industry problem.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: In agreeing to the leader's statement that the government has reacted promptly and correctly in the tuna situation, I should also ask him: Is the federal government also going to remove other harmful products from the store shelves of this nation, such as alcohol and tobacco which the government has already stated are hazardous to health?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I have to admit that my honourable friend raises a problem that has perplexed public men over the last century or two. I can recall that the temperance movement in this country was very strong at one time. In my own province it succeeded in carrying a referendum by which all liquor was abolished and banned from the shelves of stores in the province and from the reach of citizens. We found, however, that this measure was not one that really reduced the consumption of alcohol or dealt with the problem.

If my honourable friend wants to make a suggestion as to how—

Senator Frith: Tuna bootleggers!

Senator Roblin: —to impress upon the public the dangers of alcohol consumption and of smoking cigarettes, I would be glad to accept his suggestions and see what we can do with them.

The government has taken its clear stand on the matter because we have supported a number of measures to try to bring the use of both of these products under control, but, human nature being what it is, I think it would be foolish to strive for perfection.

Senator Haidasz: I have a question in response to the leader's comment regarding further suggestions about how to protect the Canadian public from the harmful effects of tobacco.

The federal government, I believe, can, if it wants to, start in its own domain by forbidding smoking in federal places of work and also by urging Canadian airlines to prohibit smoking on commercial flights.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has had many years of experience in public life, and I am sure he has raised the same suggestion with his colleagues on previous occasions.

I can give him a constructive answer by telling him that we do restrict the use of tobacco on publicly owned airlines—indeed, on any airline. I can also tell him that we do restrict the use of tobacco in many public areas.

Senator Doody: In this chamber.

Senator Roblin: In this chamber, to start with, as my honourable friend has just said. If my honourable friend wants me to introduce prohibition, we had better start with the committees of the Senate of Canada.

● (1410)

Senator Haidasz: I would then ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate why the federal government does not start by requesting that its national airlines completely prohibit smoking on commercial flights, just as certain other airlines in the maritimes have done.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I will take note of the fact that, after who knows how many years in Parliament, my friend has come up with this interesting suggestion. I will pass it along to those concerned, but I doubt that it will receive a positive reply.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE—AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question arising out of a statement made by the U.S. ambassador. I am really asking for clarification from the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I would like to know the government position with respect to the negotiation of free trade for agricultural products. I think that I can safely say to my honourable friend that there is a good deal of apprehension in this country—even in western Canada, which has always been considered a supporter of free trade—about what might happen to the egg producers, the potato producers and the grain producers who might be wiped out by the importation of American products. We certainly do not have free trade respecting grain crossing our borders—and I think of wheat, in particular, although there are other important grains to consider.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us just where the question of free trade for agricultural products will fit into the picture? Is the government removing from the free trade discussions the whole question of the trade of eggs, potatoes, grains and so on?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I can tell my honourable friend that the subject of free trade in agricultural products will fit into the negotiations with great difficulty. That is clear, because not only have we certain problems in the areas that he has suggested, but our Canadian producers of cattle, hogs, fish, potatoes and strawberries have the same problem with respect to United States policy. It is going to be very difficult for both parties to reach an agreement with respect to agricultural trade.

Senator Argue: I appreciate the comments of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. He has said that there will be great difficulty reaching agreement. Can I take it from his statement that those questions will not be discussed? Does the Leader of the Government mean that, even in the light of the alleged difficulty—which I agree exists—they will be up for discussion or will they be removed from discussion?

Senator Roblin: It is entirely premature for me to speculate on the nature of the discussions because we have not yet agreed to open any. Speaking purely from experience, however, it seems to me that the cattle producers, the hog producers, the fish producers, the strawberry producers and the potato producers will be rather disappointed if we do not make some reference to their problems. How those problems are to be reconciled with our interests with respect to the other agricultural producers we have mentioned is a question the answer to which only the future can tell.

Senator Argue: I take it from the minister's answer that there will be discussion on the question of the access for these items from Canada to the United States market. But I would impress upon him the impossibility of having in place anything approaching free trade in those areas without destroying a vast segment of Canada's agricultural industry. In my judgment, when it comes to the producing of eggs, poultry and certain other products, we cannot compete with a country that has a warm climate and cheaper grain products. We have been able to compete thus far because our system has helped us get somewhat higher prices.

Senator Roblin: My friend is quite correct. It is a very difficult problem, and the question of a fair, competitive environment is one that is central to the entire argument. I am not dismissing it out of hand. I think, however, that our cattle producers and, perhaps, the hog producers would give my friend something of an argument because they do send a fair portion of their goods south.

BANKING

GREEN PAPER ON REGULATION OF FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS—STATUS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question respecting the green paper. The chairman of the finance committee in the other place has described the government's green paper as "a bunch of crap, which it is," and, since that green paper has been referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, I just wonder whether that committee ought to continue to examine it. Will the government continue to use the green paper in terms of the structure that it attempts to set up for future financial institutions?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will tell the honourable chairman of the House of Commons committee that he received favourable mention by my honourable friend in the Senate today.

With regard to the report of that committee, let us wait and see what it is. We have not even seen it yet; so it is quite premature for me to comment on it. Furthermore, I am aware that our own Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is looking into this question, and I would like to see what it has to say.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend would not be correct if he reported to the chairman of the House of Commons committee that he received favourable comment from me. What I said was neither favourable nor unfavourable. I was merely quoting his opinion of the green paper, that "by comparison to what we will produce in our report, it will make the green paper look like a bunch of crap, which it is". That's what he said.

Senator Frith: That is what he said—Mr. Blenkarn.

Senator Olson: I would like the Leader of the Government to try to answer the question, namely, whether it continues to be the structure that the government is putting before Parliament to study—and, I suppose, modify, and accept or not—in view of what the chairman has said about it.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend, the chairman of the committee in the House of Commons will be deeply disappointed now that I will have to retract that commendatory statement that I thought my honourable friend made.

The answer my honourable friend seeks is the answer I have already given him. When the committees of the two houses have reported on this green paper, consideration will be given to their views; and I think it is quite premature for me to say what is going to happen until that is done.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE—UNITED STATES AMBASSADOR'S COMMENTS

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government arising out of the American ambassador's comments on Canada-U.S. trade.

The ambassador is reported to have urged that publishing, which he admits is a sensitive area, should be included on the agenda of the free trade talks. Is that the policy of the Government of Canada?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the policy of the Government of Canada, of course, is not enunciated by the Ambassador of the United States, no matter how much we may like and respect the gentleman concerned. He is entitled to his views and we express ours as the necessity arises.

Senator Frith: He is asking whether it is the same.

Senator Grafstein: The publishing industry, which is a fragile industry in this country, knows enough uncertainty without having that uncertainty further fomented by prolonging an answer to a very simple question. My supplementary question is: Is it government policy to put publishing on the agenda of the Canada-U.S. trade discussions?

Senator Roblin: No policy statement has been made in direct terms in that respect, and I acknowledge that. The policy statement that has been made is that the cultural integrity of the country will be preserved; and to the extent that publishing is—and I believe it to be—an important aspect of the cultural integrity of a country, the Government of Canada will certainly be ready to defend it.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—1983 STABILIZATION PAYMENT— GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government concerning sugar-beet, a subject which has been raised many times on both sides of the house during the past few months.

It was my understanding that the question of a stabilization payment for the 1983 crop would be considered by the federal government during the past month. Can the government leader indicate whether the government has now made a commitment to make such a payment to the sugar-beet producers, particularly in southern Alberta, where no crop was grown this year?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I heard my honourable friend correctly, she talked about the 1983 crop. Is that correct?

Senator Fairbairn: Yes.

Senator Roblin: I have no information about that. I do not believe that is a live issue at the present time.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. The 1983 crop definitely is an issue, because no policy has ever been stated under the Agricultural Stabilization Program until the final payment for that year is known—and that would only be known a few weeks after the total crop from that production year has been sold. The sugar-beet producers have been waiting for an announcement, and up until a very few weeks ago the government has always said that it could not make an announcement until it knew what the producers would get from the marketplace.

● (1420)

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend and I are at cross purposes here. I was dealing with the 1983 crop which, in my opinion, was—

Senator Olson: I am too.

Senator Roblin: Has that not been settled yet?

Senator Olson: I am talking about the 1983 crop year. The government has stated that it would be unable to make an announcement about beets produced in that crop year until just a few weeks ago.

Senator Roblin: I shall take the question as notice and see if I can find out anything more about it.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EXPULSION OF IRANIAN NATIONALS FROM INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION CONFERENCE

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable senators, last September 19 I directed a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning an incident which occurred during the Inter-Parliamentary Union Conference held in Ottawa during the first week of September 1985.

When I pointed out to the Leader of the Government in the Senate that Iranians had been expelled from the conference on the instructions of the chairman of the Canadian section, the Leader of the Government replied, and I quote:

I think my honourable friend will find out that whatever action was taken by officials of the IPU was taken by them on their own authority, and on no other.

I have learned today that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police took action pursuant to their mandate under the legislation governing them, that they provided security services for the Inter-Parliamentary Union Conference, and that they enjoyed full discretion to make a judgment on real, possible or probable incidents.

The situation was not quite as the Leader of the Government in the Senate described it. There was a conference of parliamentarians in Ottawa, the RCMP stepped in and recommended that the public be excluded from the conference. This happened in the last hours of the conference. They also asked for the expulsion of peaceful Iranians who had come to Ottawa to gather support signatures from conference participants. They did get such signatures from 35-odd delegations out of the hundred or so attending the conference.

I would like to know whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate would enquire and report on the real reasons which prompted the RCMP to intervene during a conference of parliamentarians being held in a democratic country, Canada.

On the basis of what information did the RCMP take it upon themselves to ask that Iranian nationals and Canadian citizens of Iranian origin be expelled? Why was such action taken, pursuant to the general mandate of the RCMP? I would suggest the question relates directly to this country's freedoms.

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I would be very surprised to hear that the RCMP did anything in this respect that did not carry the sanction of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, and the Inter-Parliamentary Union is a body for which I can accept no responsibility whatsoever. It does not come under the jurisdiction of the Government of Canada in any respect. We act as facilitators when they are in our country for a conference and I suspect that that is the way in which the Mounted Police acted in this respect. However, if my honourable friend wishes me to do so, I have no objection to making sure that my opinion in this matter is the correct one.

BANKING

NORTHLAND BANK—COMPENSATION OF DEBENTURE HOLDERS

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Has the government received representations from the Surrey Credit Union of British Columbia that they should be reimbursed for the $7.5 million that they invested in Northland Bank debentures on the grounds that Wood Gundy, who were selling the debentures, had been assured by William Kennett, the Inspector General of Banks, that the investment was sound, reasonable—or whatever words he happened to use.

I believe that representatives of this group were in Ottawa yesterday making representations to the government, and I am wondering if the Leader of the Government in the Senate can tell us whether or not those representations are being considered.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend is talking about an organization that bought stock in this company, is he not?

Senator Argue: I think it is quite clear that what they bought are debentures; not stock, not deposits but debentures. By way of further information on this matter, Mr. Wayne Carpenter, the general manager of the credit union is quoted as saying that Wood Gundy had received similar assurances from Gerald Bouey, Governor of the Bank of Canada.

As I understand it, a representation was made yesterday to the government to reimburse the credit union for the $7.5 million they invested a short time ago in debentures of the Northland Bank. I would like to point out to the Leader of the Government in the Senate something that I am sure he knows as well as I do, that this credit union is owned by tens of thousands of members who can ill afford to suffer this kind of loss, and because of the assurances they received from the authorities named before the investment was made, their request should be given consideration.

Senator Roblin: There are a number of organizations of the same class that are involved in this matter as shareholders. Indeed, there are several pension funds in the same situation and the sequence of events with respect to their purchase of shares is another interesting matter that should be looked into.

I am not aware of the delegation that my honourable friends speaks of. I can make inquiries about it, but I suspect that no immediate answer can be given in view of the investigations that are taking place.

Senator Argue: I would appreciate that. I will not mention the names of particular organizations, but I can say that there is a section of the co-operative movement in Canada that had as much as $700,000 invested in shares of the Northland Bank. I do not know whether or not they have made any representations with respect to recovering that sum of money represented by those shares. However, I do feel that there is a significant difference between going out and buying stock in a company and investing in a debenture which, after all, carries a guarantee. Stocks, as far as I know, never have carried a guarantee.

Senator Roblin: It is perfectly true to say that one of the moving spirits behind the establishment of the Northland Bank in the first place was the co-operative movement in western Canada and elsewhere. However, I do not think that my honourable friend could claim there is any guarantee on debentures. There is no guarantee on debentures; there is a priority that, if there are assets left over, the debenture holders come ahead of the stock holders and we will have to wait until the matter plays out before we can be certain what the fate of these debenture holders will be.

Senator Argue: That is not an encouraging reply. I hope the minister will follow up on my question as to whether representations have been made and let us know what consideration may be given to those representations. Their ground for seeking a return on those investments is the assurance that was given by the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Inspector General of Banks that that was a company that was solvent and on the go. They gave the same assurance to other people with regard to deposits and they are being paid.

• (1430)

Senator Roblin: That is part of the problem.

GREEN PAPER ON REGULATION OF FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS— SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL

Hon. Leo E. Kolber: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and relates to the green paper on financial institutions.

One of the cornerstones of the green paper will be the authorization of a new class of banks, namely, the Schedule "C" banks. The rationale for that suggestion is that it will help competitiveness in the banking industry.

In view of the incredible fiasco we are witnessing with the CCB and the Northland Bank, and what I am told is the precarious position of a few other relatively new banks, would it not be a good idea if the government withdrew the green paper, scrapped that provision, and attempted a rewriting job?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I must say that I do not agree with that view. I think that the advice the government receives from the committee of the other place and from the Senate committee will be very helpful in reframing the green paper. I do not know of any green paper that gave perfect satisfaction on first reading. Many changes may be required, and it would be much better to take advantage of the work that has been done.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

CONSUMPTION OF ALCOHOL—"A LITTLE OF WHAT YOU FANCY..."

Hon. Leo E. Kolber: Honourable senators, my colleague, Senator Haidasz, has suggested that people drink too much in Canada. Since I am closely associated with that industry, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate not agree that drinking in moderation is not a bad thing for anybody?

Senator Walker: You ought to know!

Senator Doody: No commercials or endorsements!

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend possibly discloses a conflict of interest in connection with the consumption of alcohol in this country.

[Senator Argue.]

Senator Kolber: My honourable friend is absolutely correct; I do have a conflict of interest.

MULTICULTURALISM

SUGGESTED JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to address my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It does not concern alcohol directly, but it is closely related.

This afternoon in the Commonwealth Room the Canadian Ethno-Cultural Council will hold a reception to which all parliamentarians are invited. The occasion is the establishment of a standing committee of the House of Commons on multiculturalism.

Could I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate why the authorities have refused the suggestion to make that committee a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I thought my honourable friend was going to ask me another question; that is, why that meeting this afternoon is not going to be dry. I am really astonished that he will attend it because he will see alcohol being passed around in the form of wine and other beverages. I would have expected him to do something about that.

Senator Doody: There will be no smoking either!

Senator Haidasz: I do not have to respond to the remarks of the Leader of the Government.

Senator Roblin: Aren't you lucky!

Senator Haidasz: I do not want to leave the impression that only alcohol will be served at that reception. I am sure that Canada Dry and Coca Cola will be served.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—1983 STABILIZATION PAYMENT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, on June 27 the Leader of the Government, by way of a delayed answer to a question asked earlier regarding the sugar-beet industry, stated that at that point the government did not have the legal authority to make a stabilization payment, but he went on to say that with the passage of Bill C-25 retroactive payment would be permitted. Bill C-25 has been passed. In fact, it received Royal Assent on that very day, June 27.

Could the leader inquire why there is now an additional delay when, back in June, the answer apparently was that there was no legal way of making a payment? Since the legality has been covered, why has that payment not been made?

A second subject which he also covered on that day related to the policy involved. He indicated that the minister responsible, the Honourable Charles Mayer, was to hold a meeting on July 24 regarding a permanent policy, and that an announcement on the subject would be made this fall. Could the leader tell us when we might have this information?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I will check into the first question my honourable friend has raised, because I must confess that that had escaped my memory.

Regarding the second point, the minister did meet and is meeting, as far as I know, with the ministers of agriculture from the affected provinces, but they have not yet reached a meeting of minds.

I have been in touch with my colleague and have asked him to keep me informed because I know the interest many senators have in the subject of sugar-beet. I want to satisfy their requests for information just as soon as I can.

CANADIAN INSTITUTE FOR INTERNATIONAL PEACE AND SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Third Reading of the Bill C-69, intituled: An Act to amend the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security Act and certain other Acts in relation thereto.—
(Honourable Senator Macquarrie).

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I must say I have been made somewhat nervous by some of the items raised in Question Period, specifically the discussion about moderation and those—

Senator Frith: Move third reading, please.

Senator Macquarrie: I thought I did that yesterday.

Senator Frith: No. The bill is on the order paper for third reading today. You have to move the third reading of the bill.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, that this bill be read the third time now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Macquarrie: I could be right on this and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition might be wrong. In any case, I was about to say that I was off-put a bit by some of the questions raised in Question Period. I am glad that I was not asked, as the Leader of the Government was, to reflect upon moderation, and so forth. When I am faced with these bad habits, I say that I do not smoke and let it go at that. I learned that long, long ago.

I am not going to prolong the debate, a debate which, in my opinion, is already going very well. I repeat my observation that yesterday's comments were extremely helpful. I shall endeavour to provide the replies sought by honourable senators on the other side.

In reference to the appointment of directors, Mr. Paul Warnke, the former Director of the United States Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, is now a director of the Institute, as is Mr. Christoph Bertram, an editor of Die Zeit of Hamburg, a former Director of the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London.

These are two of the people about whom Senator MacEachen asked yesterday. There was, of course, not room for a third, with the full complement being 17. With Mr. Pearson's appointment, the full complement of 17 was reached.

Senator Haidasz asked a question about regulations in respect of linguistic and other considerations in the choice of directors.

There are no such regulations insofar as the institute is concerned. The process by which these directors are chosen, a process which, under the statute, requires consultation with the party leaders in the House of Commons—and only in the House of Commons, I note—would make it difficult for anyone acting on behalf of the Governor in Council to lay down rigid formulae. I think, too, it would be unwise. But naturally it would be the course of wisdom in the case of future appointments over the long range, or even the short range, to consider such things as I assume Senator Haidasz had in mind.

In our own country, domestically, we have in certain places formulae in respect of government appointments. For instance, in the structure of the Supreme Court of Canada there is no leeway; there is engraved in statute a formula. In the appointment of Governors General, there is not a rigid formula but there is a very important conventional one, and that is how conventions grow.

And that is all I think I can say in response to the question of Senator Haidasz, and I think that is all that need be said.

I want to say, too, that my friend, Senator Doyle, who was one of the learned persons with whom I had consultations—and I do not use the expression “my learned friend,” because we non-lawyers find that highly discriminatory. It is a heavy projection of this High Court of Parliament idea into the Senate—one of the learned persons, Senator Doyle, who was a distinguished member of the Joint Committee on International Affairs for Canada, tells me that Mr. Geoffrey Pearson appeared before that committee and was with them for about half a day and that, as we would expect, his evidence was helpful and useful to the members of that committee.

I have done my best to answer the interrogations. I again thank those who have helped to put forward this amendment to a statute which, I think, has launched us well on a valued, valuable and worthy course of action. I thank all honourable senators.

● (1440)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the honourable senator a question relating to the appearance of Mr. Geoffrey Pearson before that committee? Did Mr. Pearson appear in his personal capacity or as a representative of the board of governors of the International Peace Institute? Did or did not the committee take advantage of the provision of the law in asking the institute to provide advice on this matter from a Canadian source?

[Senator Macquarrie.]

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Mr. Pearson appeared before the committee not as a witness but as a briefing officer and at the time a long list of his credentials for being there was read. Without going back to the source documents, which I do not have with me this afternoon, I could not say whether or not he was an official representative of his committee or whether he was there because of his vast and long experience in matters of external affairs. I can say that he was one of the most useful people who did appear before us as a briefing officer.

Senator MacEachen: If I may continue with one or two other questions because it is not clear yet whether the institute as a corporate body was asked to give evidence before the committee. I will not press it further, but it does raise, I think, a point that I may want to discuss further when Senator Flynn's motion comes before this chamber for debate.

There was a further question which I asked yesterday and which was not answered with reference to a provision in the bill that permits the minister to ask the institute for advice. I wanted to know yesterday, and I want to know today, whether the minister has taken advantage of that provision and, if so, upon what subject has he sought advice?

Senator Doyle: I will attempt to find the answer to that question for you.

Senator MacEachen: There is a procedural difficulty here. Has Senator Macquarrie transferred the sponsorship of the bill to his colleague? Who is speaking for the government on this bill? Is it a double effort?

Senator Doyle: I was asked to respond to questions about what the committee had done. I was not able to answer your question in the way that you wished it to be answered. I have volunteered to ascertain that answer for my leader, of course, and I will find that information for him and then I leave it to you.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, my question was as to whether the minister had made a request to the International Peace Institute for advice. Who is going to get that information for me? I asked for it yesterday and I assumed that since the bill has been given second reading we would have it today before we give it third reading. Can I get an assurance that I will have that information? Who is speaking for the government on this question?

Senator Macquarrie: I imagine that the Leader of the Opposition, who has been on Parliament Hill for quite a while, knows that I am in difficulty because when I endeavour to take my place before you I am told that if I speak I will close the debate and that is the last thing I would want to do. I belong to a party that was opposed to closure for many, many years.

I also say that Senator Doyle, as a member of the Senate, has a perfect right to participate in this debate whether I suggest it to him or not. I thought, as a long-time academic and since I believe in going to the best possible sources, that a member of the joint committee would be a very good person to comment upon and reflect upon the appearance of Mr. Pearson. Personally, I think Mr. Pearson, having been asked to come to the joint committee in a very important and valuable position as a briefing officer, would have satisfied the desires of any internationalists in the country. They were sending for a good person. They were very impressed by what he said. The question as to whether he produced his card as the executive director of the institute strikes me as being much less important than the fact that he was there and was valuable to that important committee. We could ascertain how he felt he was appearing and in what guise. I do not think it would do the common weal much good to find that out, but we certainly could find it out, and any other information relative to the matter that is before us.

Senator MacEachen: On the same question, I let the question of the institute and its appearance before the committee rest because, as I stated, I can discuss that further when Senator Flynn's motion comes before the house, but I would say there is quite a difference between receiving the views of Mr. Pearson, however valuable they might prove to be—and I am sure they will be valuable—and the views of the 17 members of the board on a question such as the Strategic Defense Initiative which is a very different matter. It is on that second point that the joint committee has received no advice, but, as I say, I let that rest.

The only continuing question is: Has the minister asked, in accordance with the provisions of the act that we are amending, for advice from the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security? There is nothing ominous about the question. One need only ask the minister's office or the institute. I would presume that the government can do that very easily and that the information should be made available. I would really like an undertaking before the bill receives third reading that I can get that information.

Senator Macquarrie: I think that such an undertaking can be given and I give it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a procedural point, Senator Macquarrie said that he was afraid that if he spoke he would be closing the debate. I believe that only applies at second reading. It is only on second reading and on an inquiry or substantive motion that the sponsor closes the debate by speaking at the end, and not on third reading.

Senator Macquarrie: This time the deputy leader could be right.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It was moved by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, seconded by the Honourable Senator Muir, that the bill be read the third time now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: No. The information which the opposition leader asked for has not been supplied.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: The bill is adopted at third reading, on division?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I thought that the sponsor of the bill had agreed to try to obtain the information—

Senator MacEachen: Not to try; he undertook to get the information.

Senator Frith: All right. In any event, I think the better procedure would be to adjourn third reading in Senator Macquarrie's name.

Senator Flynn: In your name.

Senator Frith: In anyone's name, just so long as we have an opportunity before we give it third reading to get the information that Senator Macquarrie undertook to get.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacEachen, that the debate on the motion for third reading be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), for the second reading of the Bill C-71, intituled: "An Act to amend the Customs Tariff".—(Honourable Senator Hicks).

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I started off by appearing to be obstructionist, and that is not my intention at all. However, I would ask that this motion also stand until tomorrow, the reason being that I was most interested in Senator Kelly's remarks in moving second reading. I was only able to look at those remarks in the Debates of the Senate a few minutes ago. I should like to have an opportunity to comment on one or two of the points he made.

Therefore, I would ask that this order stand until the next sitting of the Senate.

Order stands.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

MOTION TO EXAMINE AND REPORT ON FILM ENTITLED: "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the activities of the National Film Board with respect to the production and distribution of the film

"The Kid Who Couldn't Miss".—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it had been my intention to stand this order to await the return of Senator Molson who is not in the chamber today. It is my understanding that he will join us tomorrow.

However, I understand Senator Robichaud would like to contribute to the debate on this particular order, so I would defer to him and I will take the adjournment in my name later.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I should like to make only a few observations, which may be of some value, on this motion of Senator Molson.

As we know, Senator Molson sits as an independent in this chamber and does not frequently move motions. However, when he does so, they usually, as in this instance, make a lot of sense. Although it is not unanimous, he is receiving wide support in the Senate for this motion.

Honourable senators, I have heard and read a lot about this National Film Board so-called "documentary" called "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss," which disturbed me. However, after hearing Senator Molson's comments on the subject, I am even more disturbed.

Billy Bishop was an idol for many Canadians, including myself. Young Canadians need idols, be it in the political, science, arts, military or sports fields. As a young Canadian, my idols were mainly in the political and sports fields. As a youngster, I somewhat idolized Billy Bishop because of what I had heard and read. He was a star; an aviation ace. He helped us to win the First World War.

Honourable senators, I am not a military person by any stretch of the imagination. My only contact with the military was, because I was too young to be a soldier, to belong to the COTC, the Canadian Officers Training Corps, when I was at college. I might say, respectfully, that I despised the COTC because I had to train when I could have been playing hockey or baseball. Honourable senators, I would rather have been doing that than be involved in a military parade.

Idols are to be respected. Billy Bishop was and remains one of them.

In the United States, for instance, it is traditional for teachers to teach kids at all levels of schooling to idolize Americans such as Wyatt Earp, Davy Crockett, Benjamin Franklin, George Washington, Abraham Lincoln and others. They have respect for their own people and they do not discredit their own idols.

In Canada, the National Film Board, on this occasion, has decided that Billy Bishop should not be considered an idol and that we should downgrade him. By this film, the National Film Board is telling us that we should not idolize such a man. The National Film Board acknowledges that he did accomplish certain things, but insists that we must downgrade him. The National Film Board has been successful in downgrading one whom we referred to, until the production of this film, as a national hero.

Why did it occur to Senator Molson to move such a motion and to have this matter brought before the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology? Honourable senators, he did so because it is the proper procedure. We, in the Senate, have a certain role to play in this respect. We have to respect regional and national interests, and this film is of national interest. We have to protect our heritage, and our Canadian idols are part of our heritage. We, as Canadian taxpayers sponsoring the National Film Board, must protect the national interest. If the board did not respond to its obligation to protect the national interest, then we should come to the rescue of the Canadian people. We should do this not by censoring or by chastising, but by making sure that a mistake of this magnitude—and I will classify it in that manner at the moment, although I may change my mind—will not be repeated.

Yesterday, Senator Godfrey made a statement and was told that it is no argument to say that we must prevent further mistakes. I think Senator Godfrey's argument was a valid one.

I know that the National Film Board has made certain mistakes in the past on certain other issues. If we, as members of this august institution, can prevent further mistakes of such an order, I believe it is our obligation to do so.

Therefore, honourable senators, I support the motion of Senator Molson with much enthusiasm. Although I am not a member of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, I will make a point of attending the meetings of that committee.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

CANADA'S INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—INTERIM REPORT ON BILATERAL TRADE WITH UNITED STATES AND CANADA'S PARTICIPATION IN RESEARCH ON STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Interim Report of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's International Relations pertaining to Bilateral Trade with the United States and Canada's Participation in Research on the Strategic Defense Initiative, tabled in the Senate on 17th September, 1985.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I gave notice of this motion on September 17. I preferred to wait until today with my comments in order to give the Senate a chance to discuss the committee's interim report after the government had made a decision, one way or another.

Honourable senators will recall that on June 27 of this year, the Senate adopted the order of reference establishing the Joint Committee on Canada's International Relations and asking it to consider the green paper published by the Department of External Affairs under the direction of the Right Honourable Joe Clark.

Honourable senators will also remember that the order of reference contained an obligation for the committee to submit an interim report on Canada's participation in research on the Strategic Defence Initiative and on Bilateral Trade with the United States no later than August 23, 1985.

In the other place, the opposition had demanded that the government refrain from making a decision on these two questions until the committee had been able to hear witnesses on these two subjects. As a result, the committee had to start its hearings rather precipitously, owing to the time frame agreed upon by the parties in the other place for submission of the interim report on these two questions. The committee was therefore not in a position to prepare a very long study. After all, it had only seven weeks, including the time required to prepare the report.

The committee had to sit this summer and visited six cities representative of Canada's various regions. Unfortunately, some provinces had to be left out, including Newfoundland, Saskatchewan, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. The committee held its hearings in Halifax, Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver.

Many witnesses appeared before the committee at all these locations. It was a novel experience to have the public invited to appear before a parliamentary committee, to express its views on a matter of international policy. It was an interesting though exhausting experience. In some cases, the committee had to sit from nine o'clock in the morning until past midnight. It was necessary to limit witnesses and testimony, because of lack of time. The committee was working under constant pressure.

Finally we produced the report on time, and it has been given adequate publicity. I do not intend to go into the details of the recommendations it contains. I point out that it is a fairly long report, considering how little time the committee had to draft it.

The foreword was written by one of the committee members, Senator Doyle. He was commended for his attendance, and I want to express my appreciation in that respect.

Recommendations were made on two subjects. In the case of bilateral trade with the United States, the committee produced a unanimous report. At least there was no statement of dissent from the official opposition. The New Democratic Party did express certain reservations. As to the issue of Strategic Defence Initiative, there was dissidence as we all know.

I should like to read the conclusion of the summary resolution:

The majority of the committee, including those who were inclined to say no and those who were inclined to say yes, agreed, however, that the committee was not able to obtain crucial information at this time because the material is classified or otherwise unavailable. This might influence a final decision, and the majority of the committee feels that the government is best equipped to gather the additional information required. Therefore the majority of the committee recommends that the government not take a final decision on participation in the research phase of the SDI until it has been able to acquire the required additional information related to the strategic, financial and economic implications of the invitation.

I indicated that the Liberals and New Democrats stated their dissent on this issue. Their statements can be found at the end of the committee report. The Progressive Conservative members of the committee agreed to give the two opposition parties an opportunity to express briefly their dissent, and those statements appear in Appendices F and G of the report.

The summary resolution of the majority indicates that the Progressive Conservative members of the committee were not unanimous. They were divided. There is no secret about that. Some were inclined to accept the invitation, and others no. Where reasons were concerned, there were all shades of opinion, not only within that majority, but also among dissidents.

It remains that dissidents, ironically, were known even before the committee started working. The Liberal Party had set up a task force, which heard witnesses. It came to the conclusion through Mr. Chrétien, that that party did not favour accepting the American invitation.

The New Democrats had said the same thing. Indeed, having already opposed NATO membership, they had logically stated their opposition to any SDI participation.

Liberal dissidence is not very clear. The report and later events show that in that group also various views were held.

When Senator Gigantès gave notice of an inquiry indicating that he wanted to discuss the SDI question, I told myself: Why all that rush? There will eventually have to be a debate on the matter anyway, because I myself had already given prior notice of that inquiry. Later on, I realized his move was an excellent one. It allowed him to express the view he had already expressed even before the committee started discussing the matter, and this view he published in newspapers before leaving the committee. The speech he made the other day is almost to the letter the text he had published in the papers. On the other hand, his inquiry allowed Senators Steuart, Hicks and Godfrey to express their views, which are different from those of Senator Gigantès. As regards Senators Steuart and Hicks, both agreed to simply accept the invitation. Senator Godfrey agreed with the decision made by the government on September 7, 1985. That decision, as honourable members are aware, declines the invitation, while pointing out that Canada does not disagree with the American initiative, in as much as research is and remains the responsibility of the United States. Canada said, in particular, that it felt the decision was a wise one in view of the fact that the Soviet Union no doubt is already doing research for such a space deterrent.

• (1510)

Considering the differences of opinion in the general public, in the government party, and in the official opposition, the government's decision is quite logical in my view. Practically speaking, I believe it was the only one the government could make, given the circumstances, to decline the invitation because we have other priorities. The committee report comments on those various priorities the government would have.

In any case, the debate on this issue will continue. We shall see whether new developments will eventually require a re-examination of this government decision.

I point out that the committee said that it did not have the necessary information. It could not hear Mr. Kroeger, who was the special advisor in charge of the inquiry and reporting to the Government. The committee could not ask Mr. Kroeger to testify and say what he thought and what advice he had given or should be given the government. A committee cannot ask someone's lawyer or personal advisor what was his advice. It is confidential.

We therefore did not know what advice was given. The government had probably received the report of Mr. Kroeger when the decision I have already mentioned was made on September 7.

I now come to the second part of this report which concerns bilateral trade with the United States.

As I have said, this part of the report is the result of what I would call the joint opinion of the Progressive Conservative and Liberal members of the committee. The report includes four major recommendations. If I may, I would like to summarize them.

The first one suggests that we pursue our vigorous efforts to promote a new round of multilateral trade negotiations within the GATT. The second, is that we try, in cooperation with the provinces, to reduce the barriers to inter-provincial trade, and the third, that we pursue a more aggressive trade strategy, for instance, by emphasizing trade promotion efforts, by improving export financing and by finding new mechanisms to help exporters facing trade disputes with other countries.

Fourth, the committee recommends that discussions be initiated immediately with the United States, centred initially on resolving current trade irritants, particularly non-tariff barriers. . . . These discussions should be used to explore the potential for freer trade between the two countries.

The committee did not see any problem in these discussions being undertaken at the same time as the GATT negotiations.

However, the committee gave, and this is one of the sensitive points which has already been debated and which will continue to be debated, a list of items that the Canadian representatives would not be authorized to negotiate. Therefore, matters of social and cultural policy deemed essential for the preservation of a distinct Canadian identity would not be negotiable. It was also suggested to make exception for specific areas of the economy, including the farm industry which Honourable Senator Argue referred to a while ago, and some soft areas of the economy.

Any bilateral trade agreement would have to provide for a gradual implementation of changes to trade barriers and of adaptation assistance programs which would be offered, so that workers and communities would not have to suffer because of these changes.

[Senator Flynn.]

The report deals also, and it is a rather important point, with the need to set up a new instrument to implement the agreement and settle any disagreement which might result from its application.

When we compare these recommendations with those published, I think, in 1982 by our Committee on Foreign Affairs and those contained in the Macdonald Report, as well as the government decision which the Prime Minister announced last Thursday, I believe we can say that there are no major differences between them.

As a matter of strategy, the committee agreed with the idea expressed by the Liberal Party that we should prefer the term discussions to negotiations. When it is proposed to have negotiations, as the government is now doing, there must be discussions first. The idea would be to explore the possibilities. The Liberal Party said we should be very careful.

It is clear that if we cannot get a favourable agreement, there will be no agreement. One thing is sure, and on this point everybody agreed, and it is that every effort should be made to stabilize the existing markets.

The United States accounts for between 75 per cent and 80 per cent of our trade. Stabilization remains a consideration of utmost importance. It is an objective on which our economy depends.

On this point, I do not think that there is any disagreement. The removal of tariff barriers is something that could be discussed and phased in. The first thing to do would be to take down the non-tariff barriers, which are a destabilizing factor, by creating an organization to settle conflicts under a potential agreement. This organization could perhaps be modelled on the International Joint Water Commission.

Without going any further, these are the recommendations of the committee which must be considered in the light of the previous report of the Senate, of the Macdonald Commission report, as well as of the opinions expressed by the provincial premiers. As it has already been pointed out, the provinces will have to be consulted. They have a lot to say in the matter. Non-tariff barriers within Canada will be involved if an agreement is signed.

I believe that only good can come out of the proposed negotiations. There are many problems. All the difficulties we hear about every day in fields such as agriculture, beer, textile, lumber, pork, and so on must be taken into account. All this must be considered.

It is essential to explore and clear up our trade relations with the United States to know where we are going. The United States is and must remain the major trading partner of Canada.

I believe that, in view of the circumstances I have already mentioned, the committee has done a good job. I wanted to make these comments to allow all those interested in the issues mentioned in this interim report to express their views.

While this has meant a lot of hard work at a time when I would have preferred to do something else, this experience has left me excellent memories.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, might I ask the Honourable Senator Flynn if he would answer one or two questions about a particular item in his comments?

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator MacEachen: I noted in the reading of the conclusions of the report on the Strategic Defense Initiative the committee said that it was unable to be more definite because of the lack of information, and it referred to particular documents. As I listened to Senator Flynn speak today and heard him reiterate that point, I wondered whether the committee had specific documents in mind that would have helped it, or was it a general reference to documents that may be secret? If it was a general reference to documents that may be secret, I think it would be helpful to know that, or did the committee have a specific list of documents that it could not get?

My second point is related to Mr. Kroeger's report. Can Senator Flynn tell us whether Mr. Kroeger completed his report after the joint committee completed its report, or whether the reason the committee did not have access to his report was because he was advising the government and the government alone?

Senator Flynn: I do not know when Mr. Kroeger's report became available and, therefore, whether or not it was made before or after the committee made its interim report. However, one thing is certain, and that is that we did not have access to that report. We were told that we could not have it. I think that this was a reasonable position for reasons I mentioned earlier. We cannot force someone who has the mandate of advising the government on a decision to be taken to appear before a committee and tell us what his recommendations will be, would be or have been. I would say that such reports should be regarded as privileged documents.

With regard to the other documents that the committee did not have, we did not receive a formal invitation, so exactly what it implied we could not say. What part were we invited to play in this research? We did not know. What amount of money would Canada be obliged to contribute? We did not know that either. We had a vague idea as to the exact scientific nature of the research. Some experts told us something about it. But exactly how this initiative was to operate, we had to rely on hearsay information. We did not have access to the advisers to the Government of the United States. Honourable senators will remember the speech made by Senator Gigantès in which he described how, according to Time magazine, there was no totally safe system, that if one nuclear bomb out of a 100 were to pierce the shield it could destroy 50 U.S. cities. I do not blame him for believing it. My point is that we could not really assess the efficacy of the system on that basis.

On the other hand, I for one think that research in this area has to be done one way or the other. It is difficult to say that there should not be any such research. That is why I agreed with the government when it said that it would not participate on a government-to-government basis but that it would let Canadian enterprise participate. I think that research is something that you cannot and should not stop. Whether the government should be involved is an entirely different question. However, I am sure that honourable senators can understand that in the time allotted the committee, we could not obtain all the required information. We were authorized to travel only in Canada. We were not authorized to go, for instance, to Washington to meet with government experts there. Possibly, if we had had the time and the authorization, we could have gone there and obtained more information. Certainly the government, with the advice of Mr. Kroeger and keeping in mind all the other elements that are secret and which could not be divulged before we formulated our report, was in a better position to make a final decision.

Senator MacEachen: I thank Senator Flynn for answering the questions that I raised. I also thank him for making the effort to explain to us this afternoon the work of the committee and the significance that should be attached to the various recommendations both on the Strategic Defense Initiative and on the big question of enhancing trade or free trade with the United States. These are very important questions. They will be before the country, certainly, for some considerable time and I think it is useful to have the opportunity in this body to debate these questions.

I would like to make some extended comments on the report. I read it on the weekend and found it useful since it contained some very good analyses of certain aspects of the Strategic Defense Initiative. Also, it raised further questions that I am sure many of us want to have answered, and I would like to make comments along those lines. Perhaps I might have its consent to postpone my comments until later.

On motion of Senator MacEachen, debate adjourned.

THE CABINET

ACCESS TO INFORMATION—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Davey calling the attention of the Senate to the Government's preoccupation with secrecy.—(Honourable Senator Stollery).

● (1530)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Stollery has advised me that he has decided he does not wish to speak on this matter. However, I have been asked to have this matter adjourned in the name of the sponsor of this motion, Senator Davey, who wishes to speak again. This is an inquiry and, therefore, his speaking again will close the debate. He has asked me to advise honourable senators that he will not speak on this matter until next week and if anyone wishes to speak to it in the meantime, he will yield. I will stand the order in his name.

Order stands.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

TWENTY-SIXTH MEETING—INQUIRY STANDS

On the inquiry of Senator Stanbury:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-sixth Meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-

Parliamentary Group held at Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario, from 16th to 20th May, 1985.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Stanbury has advised me that he will table the report of this meeting tomorrow and then will speak on the subject of that report next week. Perhaps, then, this inquiry could stand until Tuesday next.

Inquiry stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, October 3, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Martial Asselin, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE HONOURABLE MALCOLM MERCER HOLLETT

TRIBUTES

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I should like to draw to your attention the death of a former colleague, the Honourable Malcolm Hollett. I had the honour and privilege of attending his funeral a few days ago.

Senator Hollett died at the advanced age of 94. I am sure honourable senators would be pleased to know that until a short time before his death he appeared to have all his faculties intact.

Senator Hollett was a member of one of Newfoundland's most famous mercantile families, the Holletts of Burin. Theirs is a household name in Newfoundland and, indeed, in international circles, because that family was among the leading fish producers, buyers and sellers of this century. The late senator served in World War I and was seriously wounded in 1916 in the Battle of the Somme, the battle which brought grief to more than a million families and, indeed, brought grief to almost every family in Newfoundland. He had been awarded a Rhodes Scholarship, but decided to serve in World War I.

After he recovered from his wounds he attended Oxford, which led to a distinguished academic career, as one would expect from one who attended that great institution.

Following that he became, first, a magistrate, and then the Chief Magistrate of Newfoundland. In 1946 he was elected a member of the National Convention which was established by the British government to examine and inquire into the future form of government for Newfoundland. He became one of the leading spokesmen at that Convention for those who advocated a return to responsible government rather than have Newfoundland join Canada or, for that matter, any other country.

He was elected to the House of Assembly in 1952. As a matter of fact, I was elected in the same round of by-elections. He soon became Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party of Newfoundland, a position he held with great distinction for ten years. He was defeated in an historic tussle with the then premier of Newfoundland, the Honourable Joey Smallwood.

I can say, honourable senators, without exaggeration, that the late Senator Hollett was a distinguished orator, debater and gentleman.

He was summoned to the Senate in 1961 and retired from this chamber in 1971.

That brief résumé on his career will throw some enlightenment on the role he played.

I indicated earlier that I had the honour to represent the Senate of Canada at his funeral. The family very much appreciated having a representative of the Senate at the funeral. I send my condolences to the late senator's family and assure them that the Senate of Canada appreciates the contribution the late senator made to this body, as well as to Newfoundland and Canada generally.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take just a moment of your time to add my voice to that of Senator Rowe in paying tribute to a distinguished Newfoundlander, a man who was active in the public life of our province—indeed, long before it was a province; a man who fought the good fight in many theatres.

I note that Senator Rowe mentioned the military career of Senator Hollett. I think it should be said that Senator Hollett was one of the youngest Rhodes Scholars in the history of Newfoundland up to that time. He put off his Rhodes Scholar right to be educated in Britain to join the Royal Newfoundland Regiment, that historic military body which was wiped out at the battle of the Somme on July 1. If my memory serves me correctly, something like 73 Newfoundlanders answered the roll call the next morning. Malcolm Hollett was one of those who had been grievously wounded.

His career in public life in Newfoundland led many of us to have a great deal of respect for people of that ilk. His brilliance as an orator and leader was an inspiration to many of us younger people. I always regarded him highly. He fought for the Progressive Conservative Party when that was not a popular thing to do in the province of Newfoundland. He will be sadly missed and greatly honoured.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-77, to amend the Criminal Code (pari-mutuel betting).

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next, October 8, 1985.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, October 8, 1985, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

BANKING

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—MEMORANDUM OF INTENT—REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question about some questions. The Leader of the Government will recall that when I asked a series of questions about the Memorandum of Intent that had been tabled in the House of Commons in connection with the Canadian Commercial Bank, he, quite understandably, took the questions as notice. At that time, we agreed that those questions would relate to any pre-study of the deposit insurance bill undertaken by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I should like to draw to the attention of the Leader of the Government that it is possible that that committee will undertake that pre-study soon. As I mentioned when I put the questions to him, it would be desirable to have that information in order to be properly prepared for the appearance in committee of the minister and any other witnesses. Will he ask his assistants to provide that material to us for next week?

As the minister knows, it is proposed that the committee will meet Wednesday night. There are a few slips between cup and lip—a few things that have to be done—before that comes about. I would ask him to try to provide that material to us next week before the committee meeting.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe that I accepted the questions in the form of an order for return. I have already explained to my friend the problems involved in putting together the large amount of detail and documentation that he requested. I cannot really tell him at the present moment when it will be forthcoming, but I want to tell him this, that on the day we spoke I passed the whole of that exchange on, in the form of Hansard, to my colleague, the Minister of State (Finance). I made it perfectly clear to her that honourable senators expect to have that information when the committee meets. I will once again remind her of that fact.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

DEPARTMENTAL STAFF REDUCTIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I have before me a newspaper article which indicates that there is a large shake-up in the works for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Over the next three years, apparently, the department will let go 1,500 employees, at a saving of some $200 million. I would first like to ask the Leader of the Government whether this information is correct. Could he tell us the government policy on this particular matter?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am afraid that government policy in respect of the specifics outlined in the newspaper report to which my friend refers has yet to be decided upon and finalized, so I am not able to give a specific answer. I think I can, however, give to my honourable friend some information, which is that the government does intend to take steps to improve the administration of that department, with particular reference to divesting itself of certain authority that it now uses by which it exercises some controls over the Indian and aboriginal peoples' activities in Canada.

The thrust of the study that is being made is to see how far we can introduce a greater element of self-government in the case of our aboriginal people, rather than adhering to the procedure we have followed these many years of centralizing it all in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

It is true that plans are being considered to improve the administration of the department, and it is quite probable, in my opinion, that there will be some changes in respect of jobs and also in respect of financing. But the thrust of it clearly is to get a framework that will better suit the wishes of the aboriginal people of this country.

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, in connection with this process, I have also stated on a number of occasions that I would like to see the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development disappear and that I would like to see self-government for the native people. But there are a couple of aspects on which I would like some assurance. First, will the Leader of the Government ensure that there is adequate consultation not only with the Indian organizations but also with the existing Indian band governments regarding this matter; secondly, that there will be no contemplation of turning over the programs to the provinces?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I think I can give an assurance to my honourable friend concerning the first point, because my colleague the minister is very conscious of the need to consult with those who are likely to be affected by any changes that he makes; and I know that that consultation process is in full swing at the present time, as it should be. So I can assure my honourable friend that that is the case.

I have no information that would lead me to think that the government intends to transfer any of its functions to another jurisdiction; but if that should be the case, we will have to discuss it at the time. But I have no information on that at the present time.

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, in providing me with further information at a later date, would the Leader of the Government comment upon the savings that are contemplated of $200 million? That figure seems awfully high in terms of savings strictly from the administrative changes.

In turning over government authority and government programs to the native people, and to Indian band governments, there must also be adequate funding to go along with it in order that there can be an adequate level of programing.

I am very concerned that perhaps in this whole shift of government operation of programs to the native community there will be some attempt to make some large savings.

I plead with the Leader of the Government that we should not look at it in that manner. We need to spend more money on Indian communities in order that they may have a better life, in terms of economic development and education. We must not look at it in terms of saving a few dollars and ruining the lives of many of the native people.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I should tell my honourable friend what I am sure he already appreciates, namely, that he is basing his questions on a series of newspaper reports which do not really reflect final government decisions or policies, and I am at a complete loss to know where the sum of $200 million was pulled from. I certainly would not like to make any comment on that at the present time.

However, my honourable friend's point about making sure that whatever we do really is in the best interests of those whom we are trying to help, is a point that is well taken; and I undertake on his behalf to see that his remarks are brought to the attention of the minister.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, on the same subject, I would point out that the articles in the press, as the Leader of the Government appreciates, cause a great deal of confusion and sometimes apprehension within the native community. Can the Leader of the Government send out today a signal reaffirming what the Minister of Indian Affairs told honourable senators in the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs last June when the committee was discussing Bill C-31 and there was a discussion on funding of native programs? At that time, Mr. Crombie stated categorically that there would be no cut in Indian programs. I wonder if that could be reaffirmed today, to take the apprehension out of this current speculation in the press.

Senator Roblin: I think the leaders of the native groups in the country probably know more than the writer of the press report does about what is going on because they have been, and are being, consulted. It is very clear that consultations are proceeding with the representatives of the native peoples, so they know directly from those consultations what the situation is, and I think that is the best assurance that we can give them.

JUSTICE

CANADA COMMISSION OF INQUIRY ON WAR CRIMINALS— SCOPE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I would like to ask whether he is aware that Canadian ethno-cultural organizations of Ukrainian and Baltic origins have asked the Minister of Justice to dissuade the Deschênes Commission from going to seek evidence in the U.S.S.R. and Poland in conducting the inquiry with respect to Nazi war criminals. I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether any representations have been made to him to dissuade the commission from going abroad in pursuit of this type of evidence.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): In the opinion of those who are interested in this matter, I do not seem to count because I have received no direct applications along the lines mentioned in my honourable friend's question. Personally, I think it would be extremely difficult for me to ask the Minister of Justice to interfere with the activities of the Deschênes Commission. After all, the commission was set up in order to bring as impartial a view as possible to the very serious problems that are before them and, in my opinion, it would not be appropriate for the government to attempt to direct their activities. We may have our views, but I think we must be patient.

It may be some comfort to my honourable friend to know that the commission has stated that there are only eight people out of the hundreds of names that they have been looking at who might be considered the subject of inquiry, should the commission go across the seas. I do not know whether they are going or not; that is not within my knowledge at the moment but, if they do, there are only eight people concerned.

I think it should also be recognized that even if these eight people are found to be worthy of further investigation—which is by no means clear—justice will be done in Canada by Canadians, and I hope that we can rely on that system to winnow out any false information, or misleading or intentionally disruptive evidence that might be presented elsewhere.

Senator Haidasz: I have a supplementary question. To further clarify this issue, would the Leader of the Government table in the Senate correspondence between these national ethno-cultural organizations and the Prime Minister, and any correspondence with the Minister of Justice?

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend wishes to pursue that topic, he should enter an order for return on the table of the house.

THE SENATE

QUESTION PERIOD—"ORDER FOR RETURN"—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Roblin has used this expression "order for return" on several occasions. I do not recognize that as a term that describes procedures in the Senate. I know there is a provision for questions that require extra information to be given in writing. I think that is the rule. However, I do not think that there is such an expression as "order for return" except that there is a provision for asking a minister for return. I remember that, about four or five years ago, we had that situation arise on one occasion with a senator from New Brunswick where he was asking for the production of documents that were in the custody of a minister.

Perhaps this is merely a misunderstanding and that what Senator Roblin means is that it should be treated as a written question or that he would take the question as notice.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think my honourable friend is right in saying that I intend my answer to imply that the matter should be converted into a written question. I used the expression "order for return" because that sticks in my mind as being a description of a written question. If it is not the case, I am sure that the Clerk of the Senate can straighten both of us out and advise my honourable friend of the correct procedure to be followed.

● (1420)

Senator Frith: I think you followed the correct procedure. It is just a matter of vocabulary.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—1983 STABILIZATION PAYMENT—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, yesterday we asked whether or not under the Agricultural Stabilization Act the government had decided to make a payment for the 1983 sugar-beet crop. I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate can tell us whether or not a decision has been made to make the payment.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am rather flattered that my honourable friend thinks that I can get an answer that quickly, but the truth is that I cannot. I will let my honourable friend know as soon as I can.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, His Honour called Orders of the Day and in the heat of the moment I forgot I had some delayed answers to questions.

Senator MacEachen: I thought it was a cool afternoon in the chamber.

Senator Argue: It's warming up!

An Hon. Senator: You have your raincoat on.

Senator Roblin: I think one's attitude depends on whether one is on the receiving end or the giving end of these things. Since I am on the receiving end most of the time, I am afraid my honourable friend will have to allow me to describe my situation as best I can.

TRANSPORT

PORT OF CHURCHILL, MANITOBA—GRAIN SHIPMENTS TO U.S.S.R. AND AVAILABILITY OF HOPPER CARS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): The first answer is in response to a question raised on June 19 by the Honourable Senator Guay respecting transportation, Port of Churchill, Manitoba, with particular reference to grain hopper cars.

I have another response—

Hon. Hazen Argue: Do you have the answer?

Senator Roblin: It will appear in Debates of the Senate, so you can read it.

Senator Argue: I would be interested in hearing it, if it is not too long.

Senator Roblin: I think you can look at it over the weekend. Unless you insist, I would rather not get into that.

Senator Argue: It has been the practice to read the answers.

Senator Roblin: I have another question by Senator Guay—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I thought that we had agreed that when the Leader of the Government notified the Senate that he had an answer to a question, he would leave it to any senator to ask that it be read. Otherwise, it would be taken as read. I remember we had an exchange on that subject. The practice previously was to read the answer unless it was agreed to take it as read. If a senator asks for it to be read, I think the leader should comply.

Senator Roblin: My recollection is that if the senator asking the question asked for it to be read, it would be read. I will ask the Clerk of the Senate to take the copy across to Senator Argue so that he can read it.

Senator Frith: But some other honourable senators might be interested in the answer. Honourable senators will remember that when Senator Roblin was on this side—and I am not criticizing him for it—quite frequently, after he had heard an answer to a question that he had asked, he would rise and make some supplementary observations on the answer given. It may very well be that when we hear the subject matter of the answer, we might want to ask something further about it—as was the practice when Senator Roblin was sitting where I am now sitting. That is why I think he is quite right in saying that if nobody asks that it be read, then it should be taken as read; but if someone asks that it be read, I am sure that the Leader of the Government would not mind reading it.

Senator Roblin: I want to tell my honourable friend that Senator Roblin, in his former capacity, had some rather bad habits which I hope other senators will not follow in the future!

Senator Frith: We think they were fine.

Senator Petten: They were good habits.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend is so reasonable today in Question Period, then I am not inclined to disoblige him, so I will read the answer.

This answer is in response to a question raised in the Senate on June 19, 1985 by the Honourable Joseph-Philippe Guay regarding transport, Port of Churchill, Manitoba, with reference to grain shipments to the U.S.S.R. and the availability of hopper cars.

CN began field testing the prototype hopper car on the Churchill line and the mainline July, 1985.

Final tests will be conducted during spring break-up on the Herchmer subdivision in 1986.

CN is not in a position to indicate when or how many of these cars will be manufactured until all tests have been completed and the results analyzed.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, some weeks ago I noticed a picture of the prototype hopper car in the Winnipeg Free Press. It looked like an excellent vehicle and as though it might serve the purpose. I wonder if I might ask the leader how many of the cars will be put into the test. I would not think that they would manufacture many until they had tested the prototype and I would not think that they would need more than one to test, but I do not know. Maybe they need a series to test because of the rhythm effect over that railroad.

Senator Flynn: Do you have an exact figure?

Senator Argue: I suppose one.

Senator Flynn: One, two, three?

Senator Argue: You are becoming more and more intelligent in your comments every day! You are even able to count now!

Senator Roblin: I am sorry to tell my honourable friend that I do not have the foggiest idea how many hopper cars are involved in the test.

STATUS OF WOMEN

BROADCASTING TASK FORCE—REMUNERATION OF WOMEN MEMBERS

Hon Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on September 17 last by the Honourable Senator Marsden regarding Broadcasting Task Force—Remuneration of Women.

(The answer follows:)

The Co-Chairmen of the Task Force are receiving remuneration of $440 per day, for a total of $59,840 over 136 days. All other members of the Task Force on Broadcasting Policy receive equal professional fees of $48,000 based on a per diem of $400 for 120 days. The gross contract values as reported in the September 14 "The Ottawa Scene" column of the Globe and Mail are misleading because they include amounts for expenses (travel, living and hospitality) in addition to professional fees. Daily expenses were calculated on an equal basis for all members: the only variable factor in the calculation of the contracts was consideration of the member's place of residence.

In the case of Madame Côté (Montréal) and Ms. Fullerton (Toronto), travel expenses to the Task Force HQ in Ottawa were estimated to be lower than those for Messrs. MacDonald (Halifax), Lavigne (Timmins) and Fraser (Edmonton). As well, the daily fees and increased number of days (with corresponding incremental travel costs) account for the higher contract values for the Co-Chairmen (Messrs. Caplan and Sauvageau) and Executive Director (Mr. Audley).

TRANSPORT

SECURITY AT CANADIAN AIRPORTS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 25 last by the Honourable Senator Gigantès regarding transport and security at Canadian airports.

(The answer follows:)

The special security measures which were implemented following June 25, 1985, apply to the international operations.

Those air carriers operating international flights, with the exception of transborder flights to Continental USA, are required to:

- physically inspect or X-ray all checked baggage;
- ensure all hand baggage and passengers are fully screened; and
- hold all cargo for a minimum of 24 hours unless a physical search or X-ray has been done, with the exception of perishables which have been received from a known shipper.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators I have a delayed answer in response to questions asked in the Senate on September 17 and 18 last by the Honourable Senators Olson and Argue, regarding agriculture and the drought situation in western Canada.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to have the reply read.

Senator Roblin: I would be glad to oblige my honourable friend. He is here in the flesh, he has made the request, and he will get it.

Senator Flynn: Where—in the nose?

Senator Roblin: The Minister of Agriculture agreed to provide $30 per cow, or an equivalent for other classes of livestock, for Saskatchewan producers, as well as producers in the other affected provinces. It was a decision of the Government of Saskatchewan that the maximum payment should be $60 per cow. Since they had already made the payment, Mr. Wise had no choice but to reimburse the Saskatchewan treasury for the federal share.

With regard to the government's policy on drought assistance, at this time the policy has not been formulated and will not be formulated until the 1985 crop is harvested and the impact of the losses can be assessed.

Recommendations were made to cabinet with respect to the livestock industry and cabinet was asked quickly to implement them. No recommendations for assistance to grain producers have been made and none will be made until after the harvest. It is expected that cabinet will act quickly upon them as soon as they are put forward.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question with respect to the drought program. Since there is obviously a problem with the harvest in much of this same area because of wet conditions now, as opposed to the drought conditions that created the problems, is the Leader of the Government saying that there will be no decision taken by the government with respect to the grain growers in that area until all the harvest is in, which will likely not be until next spring in some of those areas?

Senator Roblin: I am familiar with the problem my honourable friend has raised. If you have unsatisfactory climatic conditions you have trouble getting the harvest off the fields. I can tell my honourable friend that there is a special committee which is meeting in Regina right now in order to try to bring some finality to this question so that the agricultural community will know what is intended.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, why should the people in the drought area in southern Saskatchewan have to wait for the completion of the harvest in northern Saskatchewan before consideration is given to their plight? Surely, the drought disaster area is well known. The situation there has no relation to and does not depend on the crop which is harvested in any other part of western Canada.

● (1430)

On the basis of the announcement of the $60 or $30 from Ottawa as payment to the western beef producers, is the minister aware that the Premier of Saskatchewan, in announcing the $60 payment in his own press release—I do not have that in my hand, but I can certainly produce it—said that he was going to ask the Government of Canada for additional money for those beef producers?

My question is: Did Mr. Wise send the money to the treasury of Saskatchewan in response to a request by the Premier of Saskatchewan, or the Minister of Agriculture of Saskatchewan, or the Minister of Finance of Saskatchewan, or any member of the Government of Saskatchewan?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I think the answer that has been given to the question is perfectly clear—that is, the Government of Saskatchewan named a sum that it was distributing to the farmers of Saskatchewan and the Government of Canada made a contribution to that.

Senator Argue: That was a contribution made to the Government of Saskatchewan, not to the beef producers.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend may say that, but I cannot be expected to answer for the Government of Saskatchewan; I can only tell my honourable friend what the federal government has done in the matter.

Senator Argue: I asked if the Premier of Saskatchewan had asked that he receive the money instead of the beef producers, contrary to what he said in his press release. I cannot hold the minister in Ottawa responsible for what the Premier of Saskatchewan has done, but surely it is a legitimate question to ask whether the money was sent to the Government of Saskatchewan in response to its request, or was it the automatic policy of the Minister of Agriculture of Canada to send that money to the Government of Saskatchewan instead of to the beef producers? It is unbelievable that that could have happened. I cannot understand, for the life of me, how that happened.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend had listened carefully to the answer he might have understood, because the answer clearly said that the Government of Saskatchewan had made the payment directly to the farmers before the federal government was in the business, if I may use that expression. Therefore, the federal government's payment was made to the Government of Saskatchewan because the payment to the producers had already been made.

Senator Argue: But you have missed my point. The Government of Saskatchewan said to the beef producers: "Here's $60 per head paid by the Province of Saskatchewan without strings attached, and watch for more because we are asking Ottawa to add to that payment." After that payment was made, nothing happened. I said from a public platform in Saskatchewan that that was the biggest robbery this country had ever seen; $16 million at a crack was stolen from the beef producers. It was literally taken from them, because they were promised an extra payment. The Premier of Saskatchewan—not the federal government—broke his word as given in the press release.

Senator Roblin: I cannot comment upon that matter.

Senator Flynn: You have made your point.

Senator Roblin: I can only respond to questions that affect the Government of Canada. I cannot deal with questions relating to the policies of the Government of Saskatchewan. My honourable friend knows that, and if he wishes to make a protest to the Government of Saskatchewan, then he should do so, but there is no sense making a protest to me.

Senator Argue: My question was: Did the Premier of Saskatchewan ask the Government of Canada to make that contribution to the Government of Saskatchewan? That was my question and I think it was perfectly clear.

Senator Roblin: That position is set out in the written answer I have given my honourable friend, and that is as far as I can go.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. The manner in which the Leader of the Government answered the question regarding the grain producers is very, very discouraging, because that answer indicates that there will be no action taken until all of the harvest for 1985 is in, at least that is the excuse the leader gave. If this is going to apply to the payment of crop insurance and whatever other factors may be taken into account, I must say that that is extremely discouraging. I wonder, therefore, if the leader would reconsider and resubmit the question to whoever provided the reply and ask if they were really serious that any consideration of the situation of the grain producers in the drought area is going to await the considerations the leader has outlined today.

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend has a point, and I agree with him. I think the government will move on the matter much faster than the answer indicates, and I think we should know in a matter of days what the policy is.

I will certainly do my best to see that that statement is made as promptly as possible.

Senator Olson: That is the most encouraging reply I have heard in some time.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

TWENTY-SIXTH MEETING—REPORT OF CANADIAN DELEGATION PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, on Tuesday next, October 8, 1985, I shall call the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-Sixth Meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group held at Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario, from May 16 to 20, 1985.

I ask leave today, honourable senators, to have the report printed as an appendix to Debates of the Senate of this day so that senators will have it available when I speak on the subject next week.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "A", p. 1332.)

CANADIAN INSTITUTE FOR INTERNATIONAL PEACE AND SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the third reading of the Bill C-69, intituled: "An Act to amend the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security Act and certain other Acts in relation thereto".—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I adjourned the debate on this motion yesterday to give the sponsor of the bill, Senator Macquarrie, an opportunity to obtain the rest of the information—in fairness to him, he did provide some information yesterday—requested by the Leader of the Opposition. As I recall it, that further information related to what consultations had taken place between the institute and government pursuant to authority to do so in the statute.

So, I yield to Honourable Senator Macquarrie.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I thank the Honourable Senator Frith for what he has said. He is always fair and I am always informative. So, I agree with his opening sentence. I am also prepared to be even more forthcoming than I was yesterday in admitting that on our little difference of opinion on the question of third reading, he, in fact, was right. I want to remind him that some months ago when we discussed a similar matter in connection with the ICOD meeting it turned out that that was not the case; he stood up the next day and was so kind as to say not that I was right—which would have been better—but that he was wrong.

I want him to know that I am most trepidatious about our third argument, because one each way means that the next is a tie-breaker.

Senator Frith: The rubber match.

Senator Macquarrie: Yesterday, Senator MacEachen said that there was only one continuing question, and I have gone as far as to consult with the very highest authorities to prepare myself with a carefully worded reply. Referring to Senator Hicks' comment of yesterday about the bill not going through because information was not forthcoming, we must remember that a poor, humble senator sponsoring a bill in this place is not in the same position as a minister speaking with the authority of being a member of cabinet and having a host of officials to guide him. While a serious, conscientious sponsoring senator will look carefully at the legislation which he is sponsoring—and I studied very carefully, Senator Hicks, all those parts of the existing statute which were being amended—one would not expect to be asked to ad lib not only on all of the other sections, along with any of them which were under amendment, but also as to the functioning relationship of members of the executive and other people mentioned. So, if I was a few hours late in getting a reply to Senator MacEachen's penetrating question, I must apologize.

He was satisfied with the reply that was given in reference to the committee, although he observed that perhaps it was a double-headed response.

Now, I do not want the Leader of the Opposition to think that it takes two of us over here to reply to any question which he asks, and I do not want to say that I feel at all ashamed for calling to my aid Senator Doyle. In fact, Senator MacEachen, who knows his classics well, will recall that in the days of Rome when there were two consuls, things did not go too badly. But this is not to create a precedent.

● (1440)

I should now refer to the question Senator MacEachen asked and, indeed, on which he pressed me, which was as follows:

Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs sought advice under section 26 of the CIIPS Act on matters relating to international peace and security?

The answer is as follows:

The Government of Canada regularly avails itself of the expertise of the CIIPS in both informal and formal requests for information and advice, at all times consistent with the independence of the Institute. One example of a formal request for information pursuant to Section 26 of the CIIPS Act was that made by Canada's Ambassador for Disarmament, Doug Roche, for the Institute to undertake an analysis of proposals for a comprehensive and a selective freeze. The Institute agreed to undertake this study and provided a preliminary report to the ambassador on June 28 and a final report on October 1, 1985.

Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think the information is not really on the point which I raised. I think the sponsor has begun the process of getting the information. I asked a simple question as to whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs had asked the institute for advice on any matter relating to the question of international peace and security, which is provided for under law. Surely, it is not beyond the competence of the government to say yes or no. The Secretary of State has or has not asked.

Therefore, I think I will ask that debate on the motion for third reading of this bill stand until the government is more forthcoming on that point.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I think that is rather irregular since the opposition has already spoken.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not think there is anything irregular about a senator asking to adjourn a debate.

Senator Flynn: He spoke yesterday.

Senator Frith: I moved the adjournment yesterday.

Senator Flynn: He put the question, and that is the same thing as speaking.

[Senator Macquarrie.]

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, yesterday I pre-faced each intervention by stating that I was asking a question in order to protect myself against the procedural point which the honourable senator is raising.

Senator Flynn: It is exactly the same thing.

Senator MacEachen: If, when a speech is completed, an honourable senator asks a question, that is not to be interpreted as an intervention in the normal course of debate. It has never been interpreted as such.

Senator Flynn: I was merely suggesting that perhaps there was a way out of the trap into which the honourable senator has put himself. If he wants to state that he is trapped, he can do so, and we will let the matter stand for months if it suits him.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, for clarification and for the record of what is taking place at the moment, I should emphasize that my reply began with the following sentence:

The Government of Canada regularly avails itself of the expertise of the CIIPS in both informal and formal requests for information and advice, at all times consistent with the independence of the Institute.

Is this information satisfactory?

Senator MacEachen: No, honourable senators, that is just a put-off. It is just saying that the government regularly makes use of the consultative process.

The question is: Under this provision of the act, which was put there for a particular purpose, did the minister ask for advice? That requires "yes" or "no," please. It is not a question of the government regularly making use—we know that the government would make use of the services of the institute, but did it formally invoke section 26 to ask for advice as is prescribed by the act? And did the minister take that action? That is all I am asking. It is not a very difficult question. The answer should be "yes" or "no." If the answer is "yes," I should like to know how often and on what subjects.

I think it is unreasonable for whoever prepared the answer to garb it in clothing that would obscure the point of the question.

Senator Flynn: We would never have done that.

Senator Macquarrie: On a point of order, I think it is, perhaps, not really fair of Senator MacEachen to say what he has just said. This answer clearly declares that the government regularly avails itself of the expertise of the CIIPS in both informal and formal requests for information and advice, and it seems to me that that is exactly what he has been talking about, that is, asking for advice informally and formally. Has he another category?

Senator Hicks: Yes. Did it occur in this particular instance? That is what your answer does not disclose.

Senator MacEachen: Did the Secretary of State for External Affairs, not the mass of government?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator MacEachen, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that the debate on the motion be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Frith: Do you want a vote or do you want it on division?

Senator Flynn: I do not want to add to your stupidity.

Senator Frith: You are an expert in that from long years of experience.

On motion of Senator MacEachen, debate adjourned, on division.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), for the second reading of the Bill C-71, intituled: "An Act to amend the Customs Tariff".—(Honourable Senator Hicks).

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I refrained from continuing the debate on this motion for second reading of Bill C-71 yesterday because I wanted to study a little more carefully the remarks Senator Kelly made in moving second reading of the bill. I have now done that and I may say that I think he has covered the ground extremely well. I have one objection, to which I shall refer in a moment, but, generally speaking, his exposition of the nature and intent of this legislation satisfies me entirely.

I must admit that I am a little surprised at some of the specific examples he gave about goods that are not made in Canada. I wonder how important the provision of aluminum drop-centre livestock trailers is, but I have no objection to their being exempted from the customs tariff.

I am also surprised that he referred to industrial workers using welders' helmets and face shields, as well as industrial face shields. It will be assured that the cost of such important protective equipment is kept to a minimum through the duty free entry of all these pieces of safety equipment.

All those interested in encouraging safety participation of their sons and daughters on the football field will welcome the proposal to provide duty free entry of football helmets, face masks and shoulder pads. I cannot understand why our Canadian manufacturers have not moved into the field of providing these articles of equipment. With our great expertise in protecting our hockey players, it seems to me it would be a very simple matter for us to move into similar protective equipment for football players. If they are not made in Canada, again, I see no reason why we should object to their coming into Canada duty free.

I note with interest and, I think, with approval that Canadians will now be able to import duty and tax free goods up to $100 any number of times during the year instead of once each quarter of the year, provided they have been out of the country for 48 hours.

I said that I had one reservation about the bill and about Senator Kelly's exposition. I would refer honourable senators to the paragraph on page 1300 of Debates of the Senate which states:

Furthermore, authority previously delegated to the Minister of National Revenue will now be delegated to the deputy minister of that department which will enable him to impose or remove seasonal tariff rates on certain horticultural products as Canadian production comes on line or ceases.

This I most thoroughly disagree with. We should have left this responsibility with the minister and not with the deputy minister.

The minister is accountable to Parliament. If the minister wants to rely very heavily on the advice of his deputy minister, that is his own business and he may do so. But if he has to account for it to Parliament, he cannot then say that he did not participate in the decision but that his deputy minister did. I think that it is a mistake to have devolved that responsibility formally in this legislation on the deputy minister rather than on the minister.

Honourable senators, these are rather minor observations or criticisms, if such they are, of the legislation. I think that it deserves to be supported, although I seriously wanted to record my objections to Parliament's delegating legislative responsibility to a deputy minister rather than to the minister responsible for that department. I propose to vote for the bill nevertheless.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Phillips, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE

GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of Honourable Senator Gigantès calling the attention of the Senate to the Strategic Defense Initiative.—(Honourable Senator Bosa).

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I do not intend to speak on this order today, but if any other senator wishes to do so, I would be pleased to yield the floor.

Order stands.

TRANSPORT

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE TO STUDY POLICY ON CAR RENTAL OUTLETS AT AIRPORTS WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine and report upon the policy of the Department of Transport regarding car rental outlets at airports, more particularly its refusal to open up competition, to increase the number of car rental outlets, the effect of restricting the major share of business to multinational companies, the adverse effect on jobs in Canadian companies and the advantages to the travelling public of greater competition.—(Honourable Senator Argue, P.C.)

Hon. Hazen Argue: If it were convenient for honourable senators, I would be pleased to withdraw this motion.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

THE HONOURABLE RENÉ LÉVESQUE

CONTRIBUTION TO NATIONAL LIFE

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès rose, pursuant to notice of October 1, 1985, that he will call the attention of the Senate to the contribution made by Mr. René Lévesque to the life of the nation.

He said: Honourable senators, one of the most moving moments in the recent history of Canada was the glorious night when the results of the referendum were announced. Suddenly, we saw on the screen a sombre Prime Minister who had the courtesy and the genius to say, "When I see the sorrow of those who lost tonight, my heart isn't in it." I think that Mr. Trudeau gave us all a lesson on how one should behave towards one's opponents, and it is in that spirit that I wish to speak today about the departure of Mr. René Lévesque from the political scene.

● (1500)

[Translation]

Today, my province has a new Premier, Mr. Pierre-Marc Johnson.

Honourable senators, I would like to bring to your attention a few of the contributions made by Mr. René Lévesque to the political life of my province and our country.

He was a great journalist of international calibre and at the same time a great teacher. No one will ever be able to deny that. His extraordinary program "Point de mire", whose imitations never equalled the excellence of the original, either in the United States or in Europe, was a model of its kind.

His grasp of the facts, the clarity of his thinking and his fascinating presentation focussed the attention of an entire generation on the world about them.

When he entered politics as a member of the Liberal Party, he became one of the driving forces of the Quiet Revolution. Quebec had to wake up and Mr. Lévesque was one of the Liberals who sounded the bugle call. The results were extraordinary: the expansion of education, soaring industrial development, the founding of institutions that contributed to the progress and well-being of my province. Those were the achievements of the Quiet Revolution, thanks to the Liberal Government of Quebec of which Mr. Lévesque was a member. These were only a few of his achievements under the Liberal regime in Quebec. Unfortunately, Mr. Lévesque left the Liberal Party, heading towards a future that proved to be a dead end. Paradoxically, the mortal struggle he fought and lost to Mr. Trudeau may have been his most important contribution to this country.

He wanted to make Quebec an independent country, closely associated to Canada.

I was and always will be one of those who were not and who are not in agreement with this ideology. I am glad Mr. Lévesque lost.

However, I cannot help admiring him for adhering to the principles and practice of democracy and decency when he was fighting that mortal struggle.

There were people around him who worshipped him. He was and always will be a formidable adversary and a politician with an almost magical charisma. He could have aroused the enthusiasm of his partisans, and I am referring to the Ancient Greek meaning of enthusiasm which means "feeling possessed by a god", which justifies hate and excess.

Most of the time, however, Mr. Lévesque was possessed by reason. That is why he never approved of violence and never failed to observe the rules of a democratic society. He was our opponent and, as I said before, I am glad he lost. Like all of us, I realized that he could hit hard, and I am glad he was not one of those people who hit below the belt.

He could put crowds under his spell, but he never let their mood degenerate into the fanaticism of an emotional crusade.

He never forgot that the power of a democracy lies with the people. He has always accepted the people's verdict. He never went along with the pernicious dogma that the only real Quebecers were those of ancient French ancestry. He was repelled by racism and xenophobia.

Mr. Robert Bourassa, speaking in defence of the Canadian federation during the referendum debate, said that in other countries, separatists were in prison but here they were in power! That is entirely to Canada's credit. There is not another country as noble and as free as ours anywhere in the world. It is also to Mr. Lévesque's credit. Canada is an enlightened democracy that accepts separatists like Mr. Lévesque. And

Mr. Lévesque has been an enlightened separatist who has always accepted the rules of our Canadian democracy.

And speaking of separatism, Canada has been an example for all the democracies in this world, which cannot be true democracies unless they tolerate heresy. However, democracies cannot tolerate heresy unless it is expressed according to the rules of the democratic game, and Mr. Lévesque has never broken those rules.

One could say it was his duty. Unfortunately, there are many examples in this world of people who do not see it that way.

He did, and I want to thank him for doing so.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, October 8, 1985, at 2 p.m.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

TWENTY-SIXTH MEETING, NIAGARA-ON-THE-LAKE, ONTARIO

MAY 16-20, 1985

REPORT OF THE CANADIAN DELEGATION

The 26th annual meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group was held at Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario. Discussions took place in three Committees:

- Committee I: Economic and Trade Issues
- Committee II: Energy, Defence and Multilateral Issues
- Committee III: Fisheries, Environment and Multilateral Issues

At the conclusion of Committee discussions, the Group met in Plenary session to hear presentations and discuss Canada-United States free trade and to permit 2 delegates on Committee III to make presentations on acid rain. The Canadians who co-chaired the Committee meetings with U.S. counterparts were: for Committee I, Senator Richard Stanbury; for Committee II, Patrick Nowlan, MP; and for Committee III, Fred McCain, MP.

The United States Delegation*The Senate*

- Honourable Ted Stevens, Chairman (Republican-Alaska)
- Honourable Edward Zorinsky, Vice-Chairman (Democrat-Nebraska)
- Honourable Orrin G. Hatch (Republican-Utah)
- Honourable Max Baucus (Democrat-Montana)
- Honourable Howell Heflin (Democrat-Alabama)

The House of Representatives

- Honourable Michael Barnes, Co-Chairman (Democrat-Maryland)
- Honourable Dante B. Fascell (Democrat-Florida)
- Honourable Sam Gibbons (Democrat-Florida)
- Honourable Lee Hamilton (Democrat-Minnesota)
- Honourable James Oberstar (Democrat-Minnesota)
- Honourable John LaFalce (Democrat-New York)
- Honourable Brian Donnelly (Democrat-Massachusetts)
- Honourable Bill Broomfield (Republican-Michigan)
- Honourable Bill Frenzel (Republican-Minnesota)
- Honourable Arlan Stangeland (Republican-Minnesota)
- Honourable David Martin (Republican-New York)
- Honourable John Miller (Republican-Washington)

The Canadian Delegation*The Senate*

- Honourable Richard J. Stanbury, Co-Chairman (Liberal-Ontario)
- Honourable Dan Hays (Liberal-Alberta)
- Honourable Henry D. Hicks (Liberal-Nova Scotia)
- Honourable Lowell Murray (Progressive Conservative-Ontario)
- Honourable Nathan Nurgitz (Progressive Conservative-Manitoba)
- Honourable Peter Stollery (Liberal-Ontario)
- Honourable George C. van Roggen (Liberal-British Columbia)

The House of Commons

- Mr. Pat Nowlan, M.P., Co-Chairman (Progressive Conservative-Nova Scotia)
- Mr. Iain Angus, M.P. (New Democratic Party-Ontario)
- Mr. W.C. Attewell, M.P. (Progressive Conservative-Ontario)
- Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, P.C., M.P. (Liberal-Manitoba)
- Mr. Ross Belsher, M.P. (Progressive Conservative-British Columbia)
- Mr. Jim Caldwell, M.P. (Progressive Conservative-Ontario)
- Mr. Jean Charest, M.P. (Progressive Conservative-Quebec)
- Mr. Stan Darling, M.P. (Progressive Conservative-Ontario)
- Mr. Maurice Foster, M.P. (Liberal-Ontario)
- Mr. Sid Fraleigh, M.P. (Progressive Conservative-Ontario)
- Mr. Jim Hawkes, M.P. (Progressive Conservative-Alberta)
- Mr. Felix Holtmann, M.P. (Progressive Conservative-Manitoba)
- Miss Pauline Jewett, M.P. (New Democratic Party-British Columbia)
- Mr. Fred McCain, M.P. (Progressive Conservative-New Brunswick)
- Mr. Louis Plamondon, M.P. (Progressive Conservative-Quebec)
- Mr. Guy Ricard, M.P. (Progressive Conservative-Quebec)
- Mrs. Barbara Sparrow, M.P. (Progressive Conservative-Alberta)

COMMITTEE I—ECONOMIC AND TRADE QUESTIONS

Agenda

I. The international economic climate

1. The economic outlook in the United States and Canada including budgetary deficits, inflation rates, unemployment levels, the investment climate, trade balances and the value of the U.S. dollar.
2. Multilateral trade developments:
 - (a) trends toward protectionism;
 - (b) competition in export credits.
3. Prospects for a new GATT round of negotiations to liberalize trade in agriculture, resource products, and services, etc.

II. Specific trade irritants

1. Canada's FIRA.
2. U.S. marking regulations for imports of steel pipes and fittings.
3. U.S. investigation of Canadian hog and pork imports.
4. Certain provisions of the U.S. omnibus Trade Act of 1984.
5. Extraterritoriality.
6. Canadian fish product exports.
7. Canadian softwood lumber exports.
8. Tax on tourist literature.
9. Border broadcasting.
10. Canada's subsidized freight rates.
11. Canadian patent law relating to pharmaceuticals.
12. U.S. sugar quota.
13. Trade in beef.

Committee I met in three sessions. The first was devoted to macroeconomic questions relating to the overall performance of the two economies. The second and third sessions focussed on bilateral trade problems, with particular attention devoted to a few issues. Even though bilateral free trade hung over much of the discussion, Committee I members consciously refrained from considering the question, since it was to be taken up in plenary.

I. The International Economic Climate

State of the U.S. and Canadian Economies

An American spokesman commented that growth in the U.S. economy had declined from 7 per cent to 2.4 per cent, with the result that new job creation was only sufficient to look after new entrants and unemployment remained high. There had actually been a decline in jobs in manufacturing, with the service industry and construction taking up the slack. At the same time, inflation remained relatively low and interest rates were continuing to decline. This sluggish growth performance was being called 'growth recession'.

There were differences of opinion as to what to expect from the U.S. economy in 1986 and 1987, ranging from four per cent to zero growth. Whatever the figure, there was agreement that the prospect was unsatisfactory, although there was no consensus on the appropriate policy response.

Not surprisingly the level of the U.S. dollar was a matter of concern. Noting that at the end of the Second World War the Bretton Woods agreement had produced an overvalued U.S. dollar, a U.S. participant mentioned that this situation had been reversed in the 1970s with the unpegging of the dollar, which allowed it to decline. This in turn had generated a ten fold increase in trade. But now the situation was once again reversed and no one knew what to do. Although the dollar was overvalued, the United States had the world's highest real interest rates and it was the safest and most attractive country to invest in.

There were some differences of opinion among U.S. participants as to whether Americans were continuing to invest abroad. Some claimed that foreign investment had not increased and that the reverse flow of investments in the United States resulted from the decision of Americans to invest at home rather than abroad. Others argued that U.S. industrial investment was migrating abroad, while yet another pointed to increased sourcing abroad by U.S. industry, often in facilities built through joint ventures and not requiring large U.S. investments. There was agreement that the U.S. balance-of-payments was heavily negative and that even after taking account of invisible transfers, the deficit on current account amounted to about $120 billion.

Another U.S. participant asserted that the problems of the American economy were greatly aggravated by over expenditure by government. The deficit was in fact larger than was admitted and the last increase of the borrowing ceiling of $225 billion voted in October which was supposed to be sufficient for one year had been used up by the following June. This observation opened up another debate among American participants, with some maintaining that Congress had voted to hold down defence expenditure and to cut the COLA out of social security payments while others insisted this was posturing and that only when Congress finally voted an agreed budget resolution—which had not yet happened—did it mean anything.

A Canadian participant led off with a comment on the state of the Canadian economy, where the recession had bitten more deeply than in the United States. At its lowest point, real business investment had declined by 21 per cent and actual employment had decreased by 5.5 per cent. The federal deficit in Canada was proportionately considerably greater than that of the federal deficit in the United States. The new government had a pro-business stance, had worked out a new oil agreement with the Western provinces and had modified the approach to foreign investment. Nevertheless, hopes for improvement of the economy depended on U.S. action to reduce its domestic deficit. Canada's heavy trade with the United States made it particularly vulnerable to protective action by the United States. From the Canadian perspective all the elements argued in favour of a new economic deal with the United States.

Another Canadian speaker pointed to the combined deficits of the provinces of $20 billion. This situation contrasted with that of the U.S. state governments, many of which were required by law to have balanced budgets. The overall deficit of the two levels of government in Canada were on a per capita basis almost double that of the United States. An American participant commented that the situation of the U.S. states was a little murkier than appeared on the surface, since there were a number of accounting tricks used by U.S. states to conceal deficits.

GATT and Trends toward Protectionism

The opening U.S. speaker on this topic stated that protectionist pressures were stronger than he remembered during his 15 years in Congress. In this period the share of trade of the U.S. GNP had increased from 5 to 12 per cent, making the United States more vulnerable than it had been previously to the effect of an overvalued dollar. He anticipated measures such as a textile quota bill that might violate the multifibre agreement. In his opinion a new GATT agreement would be needed to clear up mistakes which the Congress would make. One of the few healthy developments was Canada's interest in moving from sectoral to full free trade.

Another U.S. Congressman who chairs the sub-committee on Trade of the Ways and Means Committee noted that almost all trade bills now being submitted were protectionist in character and at least one fifth were referred to his sub-committee. He complained that the U.S. Administration had been deficient in investigating injurious subsidies by foreign competitors. Expressing particular concern about two-tier pricing of energy by some foreign countries, which provided competitors abroad in some energy-intensive industries with an unfair advantage, he explained that he had submitted a bill to redefine countervail to include resource input subsidies. Among the resources which he felt needed to be investigated was Canadian lumber which appeared to benefit from low stumpage rates compared with the United States.

There was disagreement among American participants as to whether the U.S. was ready to enter GATT negotiations. According to one view, France had saved the United States from embarrassment, because Congress was not ready to give the President authority to negotiate further tariff and non-tariff reductions. Another American argued that, as in previous negotiations, only after a GATT conference began would Congress delegate to the President the negotiating authority he needed. Therefore he felt that the sooner the next GATT round started, the better. However, he wanted those negotiations to include agricultural trade and trade in services.

Canadian speakers, while supporting the launching of GATT negotiations, also stressed the fact that the process was drawn-out and there was no assurance that the increasingly important non-tariff barriers would be reduced. Since Canada was dependent for one-third of its GNP on trade and three-quarters of that trade was with the United States, priority had to be given to developing that trade relationship.

In this connection an American speaker reminded the meeting that Congress had already given the President authority to negotiate a bilateral free trade agreement with Canada. Asked whether protectionist pressure would jeopardize congressional approval of a free trade arrangement with Canada if one were agreed upon, he doubted that it would.

Export Credits and Trade in Grains

Spokesmen for both sides supported the goal of eliminating export subsidization through the credit mechanism. However, the practice was widespread and the immediate goal had to be international agreement on standards so as to avoid excessive competition.

Discussion quickly turned to the recent decision of the U.S. government to support American grain sales abroad with a special $2 billion subsidy. A U.S. participant representing an agricultural state recognized that this move could destroy the world market for grains, but insisted that the United States had to combat European agricultural subsidies or lose its share of world markets. Canadians regarded the bonus as being especially threatening, since it was to go on top of regular export credit assistance. They wondered whether there was any possibility of working out a new international grains agreement. The U.S. spokesman said that the last attempt to do so made six years ago had failed. In his view the aim of U.S. policy should be to move toward two-tier pricing, so that the consumer rather than the taxpayer would support U.S. agriculture.

Throughout this discussion there was an underlying recognition that the main reason for the trade deficit was the overvalued level of the U.S. dollar. One American participant wondered whether the answer might lie in a return to fixed exchange rates which governments would be committed to defend. This prompted a response from another American that governments could not return to fixed rates, since currency fluctuations were now too strong to resist. Every time the subject of the overvalued dollar came up—which was frequent—it was admitted that this was the underlying cause of the U.S. trade problem, but there was no acceptable solution. As a result the political response was to turn to protectionist measures.

II. Specific Trade Irritants

Steel Pipes

The opening U.S. speaker stated categorically that the inclusion of a requirement that imported steel pipe be indelibly marked was a mistake. Another described it as being an "odious" decision. However, the Ways and Means Committee was holding hearings on a Technical Corrections Act (HR 1800) to modify the labelling requirement and he understood the proposed change was acceptable to Canada. A Canadian acknowledged that the amendment would resolve the problem and both sides agreed that this matter was a classic illustration of how effective cooperation could resolve difficulties.

U.S. investigation of hog and pork imports

The discussion on this topic took place against the background a few days earlier of the action of three U.S. states to ban the import of Canadian hogs on the grounds that producers in Canada used an anti-biotic banned in the United States. The discussion was particularly lively because several Canadian participants had close personal connections with the industry and a detailed knowledge of its problems.

The U.S. side opened the discussion by describing the rapid growth in Canadian exports to the United States—a doubling in 1983 followed by a 169 per cent growth in 1984. This flood of new imports was very disturbing to U.S. producers, who blamed Canadian stabilization programs.

The first Canadian speaker to respond asked the Americans to think back only 13 years earlier when the U.S. had had 25 per cent of the Canadian market. At that time there had been strong pressure within Canada to block imports, which had been resisted, and free trade in hogs and pork had continued. The recent turn-about in this market was a result of three factors: first, the overvalued U.S. dollar; secondly, the superior quality achieved through careful breeding of Canadian hogs, which were sought after by U.S. packers; and thirdly, in relation to major U.S. markets in the north-east, the superior location of south-western Ontario as compared with the American mid-West.

Another Canadian participant observed that the Canadian price is set in Chicago. Canadian producers could not therefore undercut the U.S. price. He also noted that Canadian hog producers indirectly benefited the United States since, for example, 60 per cent of the feed used for hogs in Manitoba was produced in the United States. He acknowledged, however, that some provincial stabilization programs in Canada had encouraged excessive hog production and that this had been a concern to the federal government.

Yet another Canadian participant observed that the domestic price to producers had fallen from 70 cents to 58 cents a pound and many Canadian farmers were suffering. This prompted a U.S. Senator to point to the economic distress in the mid-West where schools were closing, banks were failing and people were moving out. There were even threats of vigilante action. Canadian participants acknowledged that shipments of live hogs were especially provocative and recollected that U.S. shipments to Canada had always been in the form of cuts of meat, which were much less disturbing to competing producers.

Review of Foreign Investment

A U.S. speaker made a brief opening remark to the effect that he did not believe controls on investment were in the interest of Canada or even of the United States and suggested that FIRA had deterred U.S. investment in Canada. The Canadian spokesmen replied that during the last election the new government had sought and received a mandate to reduce the barrier to foreign investment in Canada which FIRA represented. It had given priority to new legislation in this field, and he proceeded to indicate the main provisions of the Investment Canada bill.

Another Canadian speaker representing an opposition party asked Americans if they would be prepared to accept the high levels of foreign ownership which prevailed in Canada. In his opinion some controls were necessary, but he noted that even so $4 billion of foreign investment had been approved in 1984. The main objective for Canada should be to achieve some bargaining leverage with foreign investors.

Another American speaker wondered how transparent the new process would be. He asked how "net benefit" would be determined, remarking that "substantial benefit" as used in the FIRA legislation had been difficult to judge. He questioned whether there would be "national treatment".

Discussion on this item closed with two remarks by Canadians. One noted that the United States had a substantial number of specific limitations on investment by foreigners that taken together represented a substantial barrier. Another spoke of the situation in Quebec when, during the height of the debate on sovereignty-association, there was a consensus among Quebecers that increased U.S. investment was quite compatible with independence.

Export of Canadian Fish Products

A Canadian spoke with concern of the threat of countervail against imports of fresh cod and pollock. Canadians saw this pressure as arising out of a reduction in fish stocks, a build up of the U.S. fishing fleet and the loss of fishing rights on part of the Georges Bank. There was no response on the U.S. side.

Softwood Lumber

This subject aroused such widespread interest that it was discussed in two successive sessions of the committee and attracted visitors from the two other committees. Together participants devoted over two hours to this one topic. The discussion was particularly intense because it involved on the U.S. side two sponsors of major bills relating to imports of softwood lumber from Canada, namely Senator Max Baucus, the author of a bill to place a tariff surcharge on Canadian lumber imports if voluntary restraints were not agreed upon and Congressman Sam Gibbons, the principal author of a bill to enlarge the application of countervail to cover a natural resource subsidy.

The first discussion was opened by Senator Baucus who acknowledged that the lumber industry of both countries was in bad shape. Nevertheless, during the previous decade, he claimed Canada had increased its share of the market for softwood lumber in the United States from 18 per cent in 1974 to 31 per cent in 1984. Since overall demand for lumber had actually fallen, the result for the Pacific north-west had been devastating.

He blamed this Canadian incursion on three factors: the high dollar, lower transportation costs and lower stumpage rates. With regard to stumpage he claimed there was a discrepancy in cost between the two countries in the order of one to forty or fifty. Although the U.S. International Trade Commission had determined two years ago that Canada's system of stumpage charges was not a subsidy, in his opinion the determination was "just wrong". He warned that in this new round on softwood lumber, the U.S. industry was not as divided as it had been last time.

Congressman Sam Gibbons spoke directly about his bill on natural resource subsidies. He asked rhetorically whether anyone could not be against an "injurious subsidy". Contrasting the two systems, he claimed that the U.S. system represented an auction to the highest bidder of the right to cut on public land, whereas Canada offered a licence to cut and some Americans would say this sale "was not at fair market prices". In addition, much American wood was cut on private lands, where the owner had to secure a competitive rate of return for the use of the land. He admitted there was room for honest differences of opinion. In the final analysis what had to be established was the "relative costs of logs when they met the saw blade". He also added that foregoing a payment was itself a form of subsidy.

The Canadian spokesman offered an extensive and comprehensive response, with some differences of emphasis in the two sessions. He too acknowledged that the lumber industry in British Columbia and the U.S. north-west was "bleeding to death", but he claimed that the situation was asymmetrical, in that the relative importance of the lumber industry for British Columbia and for Canada generally was much greater than for the United States. He questioned the figures given relating to the growth in Canada's share of the market, pointing out that B.C.'s share had not grown and that the U.S. north-west had lost out to producers in Eastern Canada and the U.S. South. It was important to recognize, he maintained, that the market for lumber was highly fractured and that greater use of row housing and of concrete as a building material had significantly reduced the overall demand for softwood lumber.

Turning to production costs in the two countries, the Canadian spokesman pointed to the wide range of stumpage prices which U.S. producers had to pay, ranging from $13 to $100 a thousand board feet. He reminded the U.S. participants that toward the end of the 1970s U.S. companies had bid up stumpage prices in the Pacific north-west in the belief that continuing inflation would quickly lower the real costs. But the fall in the demand for lumber combined with the significant decline in the rate of inflation had left the U.S. companies committed to excessive costs and the federal government had later had to agree to reduce the stumpage price. His question to the American participants was whether Canada should be forced to adopt a bad system of stumpage to protect itself against U.S. retaliation.

With regard to the U.S. complaint regarding the lower cost of shipping lumber from Canada to U.S. ports such as those in the southern states, this too was "a self-inflicted" wound. The Jones Act forced American producers to ship their lumber in U.S. bottoms crewed by highly-paid Americans, whereas Canadians could ship on foreign bottoms whose charges were much lower.

The third factor—the high price of the U.S. dollar—was likewise not due to action by Canada. British Columbia's system of stumpage had not changed for two generations, yet it was only during the last few years that the relative growth in Canadian exports as a portion of the U.S. market had occurred. This was for him firm evidence that the problem was not related to the stumpage system, and was related rather to the high price of the dollar.

For Canadians it was disturbing to hear Americans challenging their own quasi-judicial procedures for identifying subsidies. The claim had been made two years ago when the ITC had reviewed the situation that the U.S. system was fair and transparent. It was alarming now to face suggestions that U.S. law should be changed so as to make it possible to secure an adverse ruling against Canada.

The Canadian spokesman reminded Americans that only two decades ago, at a time when the United States government had shown alarm at possible shortages of vital raw materials, the Canadian lumber industry had been asked and had given assurances that Canada would be a dependable source of softwood lumber. The corollary of this earlier request by the United States was an obligation to give fair consideration to Canadian producers.

During the exchanges which followed the principal presentations there were references to several bills before the Congress calling for restrictions on Canadian lumber exports. Congressman Gibbons insisted that bills requiring physical limits were unlikely to pass into law. For this reason, discussion focussed primarily on Gibbons' bill to control resource subsidies.

Two paragraphs in particular were the focus of particular interest. The first (lines 4 and 15-17 on page 2 of H.R. 2451) determines that "a resource input subsidy exists if...a product...is not freely available to United States for purchase...". As the Canadian spokesman pointed out, this clause causes a problem in British Columbia because for a couple of generations the export of logs has been forbidden in order to ensure that processing work was reserved for B.C. workers. British Columbia would not be prepared to change this basic requirement, although in his view it could be shown that the cost of logs at the sawmill in B.C. were comparable to those in the Pacific north-west. Such a demonstration was, however, not easy, since production costs varied considerably, depending on where the wood was cut.

The second paragraph (lines 3 to 6 on page 4) excludes "the cost or value of any activity" undertaken to remove the product. Under a strict interpretation, this clause could eliminate major costs such as road building and reforestation as costs of production. With regard to this latter paragraph, Congressman Gibbons asserted that he had not made up his mind about the language. His aim was to protect the United States from two-tier pricing. He said that he understood that stumpage in Canada represented a royalty and that the producer was obligated to pay the cost of road building and replanting.

The discussion ended with agreement that the two sides should remain in touch on this crucially important subject.

Tax on Tourist Literature

This topic was only very briefly noted. A U.S. participant mentioned that Canada's tax had aroused concern in the United States, but this had been allayed by the undertaking to find a solution given by Prime Minister Mulroney during his March meeting with President Reagan.

Canadian Patent Law relating to Pharmaceuticals

The U.S. side led off this discussion with the assertion that Canada was one of the few countries in the world not to grant patent protection to the discoverers of new pharmaceutical products. Instead Canada had chosen to require compulsory licensing.

A Canadian participant responded by noting that three different reports undertaken over a number of years had come to the same conclusion that Canadian consumers needed some protection. The price reduction achieved through the licensing system introduced in 1969 had been dramatic, as was illustrated by the relative price of Valium: $16 a thousand in the United States, $9 a thousand in Canada under the brand name and $1 a thousand as an identical generic drug. Not only had individual consumers benefited from lower prices, but provincial governments which provided drugs free for patients receiving health care had saved considerable sums of money. Canada was looking for a way to give inventing companies a better deal while still protecting consumers. However, negotiations between the two competing groups of companies had not yet achieved a resolution of their differences.

A second U.S. participant asserted that the purpose of patents was to protect inventiveness. This prompted another Canadian to observe that most industrialized countries used one means or another to hold down the price of drugs to consumers. He also reported that the Commissioner of Patents in Canada regularly asked for information from companies on their costs of producing drugs on which licences were being sought in order to determine an appropriate royalty rate, but such information had never been provided by the companies.

U.S. Sugar Quota

A U.S. spokesman representing a producer perspective led off discussion by pointing out that the United States seeks to produce domestically 50 per cent of the sugar it consumes, and maintains a domestic price of 18 cents a pound. This contrasts with a world price of 3 cents a pound. While the import of raw sugar has been restricted, the combination of low world sugar prices and the high dollar has permitted Canadian food processors rapidly to expand their sales of sugar-containing products into the U.S. market. This was the background to President Reagan's emergency quota which was imposed in January 1985.

The Canadian side expressed concern over the comprehensiveness and severity of the U.S. action. The quota for most products was exhausted within weeks. Canada held domestic sugar production to 10 per cent of demand, in order to provide a market for third world producers, a policy which also benefited consumers. Canada placed hope in the President's undertaking to review the scope of the regulations.

Several participants on the U.S. side who were well informed on trade matters expressed shock at the scope of the emergency order, regarding which they had had no previous information, and asked for copies of the list of products covered. While the quota did not represent a cost to the U.S. Treasury, it did represent a tax on consumers. They presumed that U.S. producers were worried about the renewal of the sugar support arrangement in July of 1985 and expressed the view that the U.S. sugar producer group had gone too far in pressing for this all-embracing quota.

Trade in Beef

The Canadian spokesman reported that Canada protected itself from large quantities of subsidized beef from the European Community with an import quota. This quota had been pro-rated and in the process U.S. sales to Canada had been restricted. Canada recognized that the United States was not at fault and had found a way to exclude U.S. exports to Canada by eliminating high quality beef from the quota. This had resolved the difficulty. However, Canada would welcome advice from the United States on how to handle the flood of European beef being offered in Canada.

Border Broadcasting

The topic of border broadcasting was briefly reviewed in now traditional terms with Canadians reminding Americans of Canada's need with a small exposed market to act so as to protect Canadian culture. American speakers reiterated the concern felt in Congress over the infringement of patent rights by foreign distributors. They noted that the United States had "almost gone to war" with Jamaica over the taping of movies and a comparable dispute had arisen with Brazil. They were interested to know whether the new Canadian government intended to make any policy changes in this field.

Canadian participants indicated that the mirror legislation adopted by the United States had had little impact in Canada, since there was not much broadcasting directed at U.S. audiences. They did not anticipate a change in Canadian law. However, they felt that the rapid development of broadcasting technology constituted a major potential problem between the two countries. If home users could pick up signals directly and inexpensively, it would become difficult for producers to protect their copyright.

Freight Rates

Discussion on this topic was very brief. Canadian speakers reported that the new freight rate system put into effect last year replaced a more generous system which had prevailed for over 100 years. In the long term inflation would reduce the real value of the support offered. In the interval, some brokers had abused the new system and had moved canola and corn meal into the American north-west in substantial and unusual quantities. The Canadian government was attempting to negotiate a voluntary restraint program which should, if agreed to, largely satisfy U.S. millers.

COMMITTEE II—ENERGY, DEFENCE AND MULTILATERAL QUESTIONS

I. Energy

1. Modification in Canadian policy on gas exports and impact on trade with United States.
2. Impact of changes in Canadian oil and gas policies regarding retroactive "back in"; deregulation of oil prices; investment climate; outlook for bilateral energy co-operation.
3. Bilateral electricity trade.
4. Problems of access to U.S. market for uranium.

II. Defence

1. Multilateral
 - (a) Arms control negotiations;
 - (b) The Strategic Defence Initiative (the Star Wars debate).
2. Bilateral
 - (a) Modernization of NORAD;
 - (b) Deployment of AWACS for North American defence;
 - (c) Deployment in Canada of U.S. nuclear weapons;
 - (d) Functioning of the defence production sharing arrangement between Canada and the United States.

III. Multilateral Issues

(in joint session with Committee III)

1. The food crisis in Africa.

I. Energy

During the exchange on energy issues, the Canadian side described the new Canadian energy and investment policies. On the subject of the inefficiencies on energy transportation and distribution systems in North America, the U.S. delegation thought there was unlikely to be any lifting of the U.S. prohibition of crude oil exports.* This led a senior U.S. Senator to revive a proposal he had made a decade earlier for a North American or continental energy policy. During the discussion on bilateral electricity issues, the U.S. side reacted positively to the idea of increased electricity exports from Canada.

* However, on June 14, 1985, the U.S. Administration removed the prohibition on exports of crude oil to Canada from the lower 48 states, retroactive to June 1.

Natural gas and petroleum policies

A Canadian delegate described briefly the impact of the Canadian government's new energy policies including the Western Accord and the replacement for the Foreign Investment Review Agency (FIRA). The Canadian natural gas price has already been deregulated and crude oil prices would be deregulated by June 1, 1985. The Petroleum and Natural Gas Revenue Tax (PGRT) was being phased out and the Petroleum Incentive Program (PIP) grants to Canadian companies were being done away with. Draft legislation was currently under debate to replace FIRA by Investment Canada to ease investment constraints. The Prime Minister and other Ministers have indicated the government intended to make changes in the Crown Share and the retroactive 25 per cent 'back-in' provisions on all Canada Lands production projects. How this policy was to be implemented was being studied. Production in the Canada Lands fields, in the tar-sands and offshore, have high potential but are very high-cost and an assured market was needed before development. As for the deregulated gas price, it would be 'market sensitive' but the export price would not be allowed to fall below the Canadian price.

A Canadian Senator noted that Canada, under a National Energy Board (NEB) requirement, had mandated a 25 year surplus supply of natural gas and at present there was more than enough available. The government needed to develop a new gas-pricing mechanism by December 1, 1985. The present requirement—that the price of exported gas cannot be less than the Toronto city gate price—annoys western producers since this price includes the transportation and gathering costs. This delegate doubted that such a price floor for exports would be adhered to. Under the previous government, when natural gas prices had been set by the federal and Alberta governments, several policies had been put in place to make Canadian gas exports more 'market-sensitive' in the United States and in recent years, higher quantities of gas exports had been authorized than Canada had, in fact, exported.

This delegate said there was some concern in Canada regarding the natural gas transmission facilities to the Atlantic provinces and eastern seaboard. The NEB was suspending its hearings until the U.S. regulatory agency ERA (the Economic Regulatory Agency of the Department of Energy) had approved the pricing for long term gas contracts.

U.S. delegates expressed satisfaction that FIRA was now being replaced by a more open investment regime. However a Canadian delegate noted that there was still a commitment in the new legislation to a certain level of Canadian ownership in this industry where foreign ownership, prior to the NEP, had been at the 85 per cent level. The new procedures would continue to maintain a threshold—$50 million for indirect acquisitions and $5 million for direct—and transactions above this level would continue to be subject to review. This participant noted that even under the existing regulations, $4 billion foreign investment had come in last year. While foreign investment would become easier in Canada, this delegate was concerned that the FIRA review process, which had been used previously to "bargain up" such benefits for Canada as increased employment levels or world product mandates, would no longer be available.

Other Canadian delegates noted that only 20 per cent of the 1983 foreign investment cases would be reviewable under the new legislation, the review process would be quicker and only takeovers, not direct investment, would be dealt with. Ministerial discretion could funnel applications through whereas previously there had been a Cabinet review process. The cultural field was an exception and close watch would be kept in this sector. It was noted that the Canadian economy was severely undercapitalized; with 92 per cent of projected Canadian savings being borrowed because of the deficit. The new budget would encourage increased Canadian investment but the government had done away with mechanisms including the PIP grants which constituted "a loaded deck in favour of Canadians" in the energy field.

A Canadian delegate asked the U.S. side if a change was likely in the U.S. prohibition on crude oil exports, citing a need for rationalization of supplies and the difficulties created for Sarnia producers. It appeared that the U.S. Administration seemed to wish such a change. U.S. delegates had differing reactions. A New England Congressman said he reflected the majority in Congress which did not consider the prohibition should be changed. However, a U.S. Senator from Alaska said he was in favour of permitting such oil exports although he was not optimistic that a change could be achieved. There had been three unsuccessful attempts in the Senate to amend the Export Administration Act in this respect. Some parts of the industry agreed with the prohibition because of the level of reserves which were thought to be too low.

The Senator then commented on the dismal energy picture in Alaska. There had been no new recent oil strikes, production rates were down, there was, as yet, no successful producing well off-shore and the drilling activities there had led to problems with fishermen. In his opinion, U.S. oil reserves were too low. Alaska was retrenching its gas as there were no transmission facilities. The Senator then suggested a North American or continental energy policy, a proposal he said he had been ridiculed for raising in the same forum over a decade earlier. Canada and the United States would be involved and Mexico would be excluded at least initially, he said. The objective would be to put in place continental-wide planning to rationalize energy supplies and reduce transmission costs. He suggested that an allocation board from the private sector, similar to the $1 a year members of the wartime allocation boards, could be established to begin this planning. He admitted new U.S. legislation would be required to clear the way for such a planning group. The initiative would have to come from Canada. The present U.S. energy transportation system was ridiculous, this participant continued. As an example, Alaska oil should be able to come into Puget Sound and use the Trans-Mountain pipeline to get to the mid-west markets. A rationalization of the supply system would also benefit Canada which at present had to compete with Louisiana but with higher transportation costs.

The initial reaction of the Canadian side to the continental energy proposal was a concern that while industry might do the planning there were too many competing power fiefdoms in this sector and governments inevitably would have to be involved. Another Canadian delegate questioned whether Canada would be wise to take such an initiative for a continental energy policy at a time when the U.S. Congress was becoming so protectionist. If Canada freed its resources, what would the Congressional response be to the granting of easy market access for Canada goods in other fields? The Senator replied that now, at a time of surplus energy, was the best time to plan a whole free trade package including energy which would be such a dominant item.

Electricity trade

Generally the U.S. side reacted positively to the idea of increased Canadian electricity exports. Emphasis was placed on the mutual benefits to be derived.

A U.S. delegate from the U.S. Northwest opened the discussion by commenting that in the Northwest, the positive outcome of the Skagit Ross Dam controversy should have led to negotiations for further electricity sales in the United States. However the Bonneville Power Administration, with one nuclear power plant completed and two incomplete, controlled transmission facilities and was presenting a stumbling block to increased Canadian sales.

A New England delegate spoke of the benefits from Hydro Quebec's electricity sales, citing the dangerous overdependence of his area on imported oil. The New England Power Pool (NEPOOL) was very pleased about these sales. The delegate himself had spoken to the Governor of Massachusetts on the subject and his reaction too was very positive, saying that "Massachusetts would like to do even more business" in electricity purchases. A few problems were mentioned, however, namely the concern of U.S. organized labour that the doubling or trebling of Canadian electrical imports would mean a loss of jobs in the older oil-fired labour-intensive plants. There was also opposition from some coal producers. However the New England economy was growing, this delegate said, and as long as Canadian sources can maintain 'market sensitive' prices for electricity exports "we can work together".

Asked by a Canadian delegate whether there could be United States assistance in the capital funding of very costly Canadian hydro-electrical projects, the U.S. participants expressed doubt as to whether this would be possible. It would be politically very difficult because of the vast amount of capital tied up in unfinished nuclear plants in the United States. There were already many bills in Congress dealing with this controversial issue which had become more acute recently. While the U.S. side recognized the problems for Canada in raising the capital for such huge projects, none of the participants judged it would be feasible to ask U.S. consumers to carry these capital financing costs in their utility bills.

Exports of Canadian uranium

A Canadian delegate briefly outlined Canada's concerns related to access to the U.S. market for Canadian uranium exports. In 1983 uranium imports into the United States had been well below the level of 37.5 per cent of the total U.S. domestic uranium. This was the level of imports that, by law, could trigger a U.S. trade investigation and possible trade restrictions. With shutdowns in the U.S. uranium industry, imports this year could be taking a higher percentage of the U.S. domestic market and could be judged as injurious to the domestic industry. Secondly, this participant pointed out that Canada's existing policy required that all uranium exports be in the most advanced processed state possible (i.e., uranium hexafluoride). However U.S. interests had been demanding exceptions to this policy as a condition or market access, a situation that created a serious problem for Canadian refiners who were already working at one-third their capacity. Canada had very high reserves from the Elliot Lake facility and Saskatchewan was opening new mines. The outlook was depressed at least until 1990. This delegate urged the United States to impose as few restrictions as possible on its imports of Canadian uranium.

The American side commented that the attempt in Congress to renew quotas on imports of uranium had been rejected. A Canadian delegate observed that there appeared to have been considerable over-construction in nuclear electricity.

II. Defence

The subject of President Reagan's Strategic Defence Initiative (SDI) almost completely monopolized the discussion time on defence issues. On the U.S. side there were some strong advocates and a conviction that the research phase of SDI was going to go forward. Some uneasiness was expressed over funding and as to the effect of SDI on the ABM Treaty and on SALT II. The views of the Canadian side were more mixed with several delegates expressing the opinion that SDI might be considered more an offensive than a deterrent system and that it might be seen as a destabilizing element in arms negotiations. Discussions on the arms control negotiations underlined the critical role being played by the negotiators at Geneva.

The Strategic Defence Initiative (SDI)

The Canadian side began the discussion on SDI. The first participant pointed out that the Canadian government had not yet decided whether to accept the U.S. invitation to become involved in SDI and had promised public hearings on the question. He himself had strong reservations and there was considerable public apprehension in Canada, he said. First, the initiative was likely to have a destabilizing effect leading to another arms race. Secondly SDI could be interpreted as a change from a deterrent to an offensive policy. Specifically it would be likely to result in a deterioration of the ABM treaty. Even research and development was difficult to do under ABM, this delegate noted. Previously Canada has lived under the U.S. nuclear umbrella, a situation which allowed it to avoid making decisions. SDI brought Canada right into the front line, since a shield system which screened out space missiles would also require an atmospheric shield against air-breathing weapons. This meant an interceptor response system with all that involved. Canada would be involved automatically. Therefore a U.S. shift of policy from deterrence to offence had major implications for Canada. Finally, there were strong economic arguments both for and against Canadian involvement including "lost opportunity costs".

A second Canadian delegate agreed that the SDI program would affect the ABM treaty in that alleged violations would become very contentious. She herself considered the SDI to be a militarization of outer space. The Canadian decision to participate should not be based on the economic spinoffs. She noted that the Canadian Parliament had not debated the subject, nor had any Canadian Minister questioned the proposal as had Sir Geoffrey Howe of the United Kingdom.

A third Canadian participant commented that the Canadian Prime Minister had not been enthusiastic about SDI. He wondered if the Canadian public did not have a hypocritical attitude to defence as they have been able to enjoy the protection of the U.S. nuclear umbrella.

A U.S. Senator, Chairman of the Senate Defence Appropriations Committee, spoke strongly in favour of SDI and called himself "a foremost SDI defender". SDI was not new, he maintained. It had been an ongoing program since the 1960s and its scope had only become publicly known quite recently. Two years ago the United States launched a missile which intercepted another missile. For its part, the Soviet Union had a functioning low orbit anti-satellite system and it had deployed 600 SS-18s recently. The USSR was building strategic missiles "with utter abandon". The United States needed a non-nuclear response to these strategic missiles and SDI was more sensible than building MX missiles.

He noted his pessimism and concern over what he termed "the audacity" of the new type of Soviet leadership personified by Gorbachev. The SDI was the one thing that would keep the USSR leadership at the arms control negotiating table and that was the only way to achieve an agreement. Questioning and doubts of the allies could undermine this positive effect, this spokesman said. In Congress there was bipartisan support for the program although some disagreement had emerged over funding. It was important that the USSR believed funds would be made available. The USSR knew the United States would not fail if it dedicated itself to this project. "SDI is the biggest bargaining chip in the history of arms control."

This delegate denied that SDI was a destabilizing element. After all SDI was non-nuclear he said. "Is it destabilizing not to explode nuclear weapons?" He found it difficult to understand the U.K. and Canadian doubts. The U.S. defence umbrella was leaking and the Minuteman was old. SDI was designed to counter weapons and it was not offensive. Funding had not yet been settled in Congress but $3.2 billion was the level agreed on in the House appropriation bill 'mark-up'. Over the years it could cost $25 billion but the United States would have an effective defence system against SS-18s.

The U.S. delegate from the House Foreign Affairs Committee commented that the Administration and the President personally were very committed to SDI. In the House there was cautious approval of the research program. However there were questions such as was an 80 per cent shield enough when a 20 per cent rate of penetration would have horrifying results? Out of a $300 billion defence budget the cost of SDI research could be absorbed, but the cost of deployment, which would be in the trillions, was not feasible. Among the House Democrats there was concern about SDI's destabilizing effect and what impact it would have on the arms control negotiations. However, there was some hope that it could be the first item of agreement at Geneva and could be the cornerstone of a new treaty.

A Canadian Senator deplored the popular term "Star Wars" to describe the SDI program. He noted that Sir Geoffrey Howe had cautioned that the United States should not go beyond research without gaining the approval of the allies first. He observed that only the research aspect was at present being considered and there was no certainty that it would succeed in resolving some enormous difficulties. In addition, since only an 80 per cent success rate was envisioned, space battles would not leave the earth unscathed. Nevertheless, this delegate maintained that SDI research should go ahead. Man can never turn his back on an opportunity to pursue knowledge, he said. Canada should participate in the research phase not only for the technological spin-off but also because it would like to participate in future decision-making.

The Chairman of the U.S. House Committee on Foreign Affairs stated that the House had supported SDI funding but not as large an amount as the President's initial request. Nor should there be any testing since this would violate the ABM Treaty. A State Department definition was attempting to get around this problem but this spokesman considered this an unwise move. Moreover he found very worrying the comments by officials about "scrapping SALT II" and "dumping the ABM". It was difficult to get a clear version of what SDI was and what it would accomplish, this participant said, but the research phase was clearly "locked in". Both the United States and the USSR were already doing the research, the President had just put it on the table. Another U.S. member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee said that he doubted there would even be 40 votes in Congress against SDI. The United States was definitely going ahead. What was Canada going to do, he queried?

The first Canadian spokesman commented that he did not see why Canada needed to be in lock-step with the United States. He asked why President Reagan needed the allies' involvement. He thought the request could be counterproductive for the bilateral relationship with Canada. Moreover, it could be important for the United States to have an ally for 'conflict resolution', i.e., in NATO, but if Canada became involved in SDI, such a role would be limited. The United States had clearly shifted its policy away from a basic reliance on MAD (Mutual Assured Destruction). As for SDI being the 'biggest bargaining chip', this delegate said MIRV, the hydrogen bomb and other weapons had all, in their time, been touted as a solution to the problem. The USSR was not going to sit idly by. Therefore, SDI was not a panacea and it was not in Canada's interest. The United States should "go it alone". If the United States continued to demand allies' involvement, it could create an anti-Americanism. In response, a U.S. Congressman, who said he had supported SDI in the House vote, commented that if the President had failed to offer SDI participation to the allies he would also have been criticized for that.

Another Canadian agreed the President had to consult the allies but she would like to see the consultation process go even further and include the USSR. Earlier President Reagan had suggested that research on ballistic missiles be shared with the Soviet Union but Mr. Mondale "had shot the idea down". She reiterated the concern of the Canadian public that the SDI reflected a "fighting mentality" based on the assumption of a nuclear exchange rather than a continuation of a deterrence policy.

Some doubt was expressed by a third Canadian member that widespread public concern existed in Canada on this issue. However, he considered that the Canadian government would undoubtedly agree to participate in SDI for a number of reasons: without participating, Canada would drop behind in technological capabilities associated with SDI research; there could be employment spin-offs associated with participation; the government's policy was to increase the Canadian defence commitment; and the government wanted to build a closer relationship with the United States.

In the opinion of another delegate, Canadian participation in SDI should not be based on the expectation of increased technological capabilities or employment. In any case this participant had been informed that only about 400 Canadian jobs could be involved. He asked the U.S. side whether the "bargaining chip at the arms negotiation table" argument was the principal reason for supporting SDI.

The U.S. Senator replied that this was only one argument and not the main one. In his opinion, SDI was the beginning of an important new era of defence, just as the anti-ballistic missile had been. While it was true the USSR at present had superior space shuttle capabilities, their research was compartmentalized and they were not modernizing as quickly as the United States. If an SDI system were successful in stopping the use of strategic missiles, the next steps could involve theatre weapons, then conventional weapons.

Arms Control Negotiations

A U.S. Congressman began the exchange on this topic by noting what a welcome development the recommencement of the Geneva negotiations were despite the fact the two sides were very far apart, even on the subject of the types of weapons. Proposals were being made at present which were inferior to those agreed to at the SALT II negotiations. In 1982 the USSR had halted deployment of medium range missiles, a move criticized as an attempt to solidify a Soviet advantage, but in 1983 when the United States began deploying Pershing and cruise missiles, the Russians resumed deployment of SS-20 missiles. This participant was not optimistic about progress and noted that both sides were advancing with ASAT (anti-satellite) weapons programs that were mutually threatening. At Geneva, the United States was pressing for a cessation of testing of ASATs by either side. Allegations have been made of violations of past arms control agreements, an important one being the Soviet construction of an early-warning radar system at Krasnoyarsk which was probably contravening or eroding the ABM Treaty. Agreement on verification procedures for both strategic and intermediate range weapons has been impossible.

The agenda for arms control negotiations has become enormous, continued this Congressman, and the subject was a most important issue in Congressional committees. As long as the Administration was serious about the negotiations, there would continue to be bipartisan support in Congress even though there was some disagreement on details and the MX missile vote had been close. There was a sense in Congress, this delegate concluded, that at present the Geneva negotiators have the most important job in the world.

In response to a Canadian inquiry as to whether SDI was already on the Geneva negotiating table, the U.S. Senator indicated the Russians were saying "We'll talk INF when we settle SDI". President Reagan has stated that SDI research was not negotiable. The United States, he continued, wanted INF, START and SDI negotiations to go on simultaneously. In his opinion, the two most serious problems currently were: first, the USSR Krasnoyarsk radar installation which is clearly not a peripheral radar system allowable under the ABM Treaty and had an offensive as well as a defensive connotation. Secondly, the problem of encryption, the encoding of telemetry signals from missile tests. The United States had undertaken not to encrypt missile data but the USSR has a "totally hard" encryption system in place, making verification of its tests extremely difficult. What was needed from the Soviet Union now was a confidence-building measure.

Two U.S. House and Senate delegates described at some length the atmosphere, the personalities and the process at the Geneva negotiations. While in Geneva as Congressional delegates, they had been able to sit in with the U.S. negotiators at the pre-briefing and at the de-briefing sessions. Both sides clearly planned every word they were going to say at the meeting. After the formal negotiating sessions, there was invariably a reception where encounters with the Russians were as important as at the formal sessions. Subsequently the U.S. side analyzed minutely every phrase and reaction of the Russians. Both Kampelman and Tower, the two U.S. negotiators, were judged to be extremely capable.

The U.S. Senator then elaborated on an earlier remark he had made concerning the Russian leadership. Mr. Gorbachev, he said, was a very capable but tricky leader, able to manipulate the western press, an able salesman with the mind of Stalin. "Tough, aggressive and audacious" were adjectives he used in describing him, and he said other prominent Congressional figures held a similar view. Nevertheless, he thought that dealing with this tough Soviet leadership could open the way to arms control. The USSR wanted to buy large U.S. construction equipment, yet their economy was slipping and they had severe agricultural problems as well as increasing military costs. The leadership undoubtedly wanted peace through arms control, he said. All the U.S. negotiators thought it was possible to succeed in the negotiations.

Another Congressman, Chairman of an Intelligence Subcommittee in the House, observed that Gorbachev's first priority was consolidation of his personal power which depended on the appointment of his own personnel in key positions. It would be evident by the January plenary whether or not he had gained full control. His second priority was the economy where he might follow the Andropov line of reform. It would only be possible to judge the effect in a couple of years after the marginal economic reforms, which Gorbachev was most likely to make, would almost inevitably be seen not to be working. At that point he would have to challenge the bureaucracy of the Party itself. In arms control, which was his third priority, he was so far following the Party position which was the result of a collective judgment, and he was moving cautiously. He was not yet in a position to challenge these positions. It was still a collective leadership. But it should be noted that Gorbachev had not replaced a defence figure on the Politbureau. Another U.S. delegate commented that his policy on Afghanistan might give some clues as to what the USSR would do on arms control.

Norad

This agenda item was discussed only very briefly. The Canadian side referred to the recently concluded bilateral agreement on the modernization of the North Warning System. NORAD itself was coming up for renewal and there was some feeling that it should be a short-term agreement rather than for the long term, a delegate said.

A Canadian delegate mentioned the unsatisfactory situation revealed by an article in the New York Times concerning deployment of aircraft with nuclear weapons in Canada. The Canadian military did not appear to have the same information as the U.S. military. There was clearly a lack of effective communication and lines of command.

Functioning of the bilateral defence production sharing arrangement

This subject was raised in Plenary Committee by a Canadian delegate who referred to the historical basis for bilateral co-operation in defence production and urged a fresh look at how this system could be improved. Canada was increasing its defence spending and would be re-equipping.

However, a number of Canadian defence industries had gone downhill—although not in aerospace—and there was a significant trade imbalance with the United States in this area. This spokesman noted several impediments to improving the picture for Canadian defence and related industries. First, the U.S. small business set-asides were precisely the kinds of contracts which Canada's relatively smaller industries could successfully secure or fill. Secondly, the current policy of negotiating "offset" production in Canada on large scale purchases from the United States such as the CF-18s, while popular with politicians, had resulted in the Canadian industry becoming merely "pattern producers". Canada needed a stronger base in this sector, he concluded, and urged improved access for the Canadian defence industry.

The Food Crisis in Africa

This subject was dealt with in joint session with Committee III and a digest of the points raised will be found at the end of Committee III's summary below.

COMMITTEE III—FISHERIES, ENVIRONMENT AND MULTILATERAL ISSUES

Introductory Remarks

I. Fisheries and Border Issues

- East Coast Fishery
- West Coast Fishery
- Fishing Issues Between Ontario and Minnesota
- White Pass and Yukon Railroad
- The Raising from Lake Ontario of U.S. Naval Vessels

II. Environment Issues

- The Garrison Diversion
- The Flathead River
- Consumption and Diversion Uses of Water
- Toxic Wastes
- Acid Rain

III. Multilateral Issues: The African Famine

Introductory Remarks

The Canadian co-chairman of Committee III, welcomed the U.S. delegates to the 26th Meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group. He remarked that very little that Canada or the United States did was without some impact on the other country. He suggested that the Inter-Parliamentary Group had made a significant contribution to cooperation between the two countries because its delegates aimed their discussions at finding the common ground.

The American co-chairman of Committee III echoed the view that the Canada-U.S. Group had influenced policy in the two countries. He said that, as a result of these discussions, there had been progress on issues in both the Executive Branch and Congress. "The record of conversation, not conflict, between our two countries is unparalleled anywhere in the world."

The American co-chairman then briefly reviewed some of the major issues discussed by the Group over the years. Great Lakes pollution control programs went back some thirty years and some $10 billion had been expended on them. Considerable progress had been made in the control of nitrates and phosphates and the fishery had made a comeback on the upper lakes. The lamprey eel control program, he suggested, had been one of the great success stories of bilateral co-operation, resulting in a dramatic return of the white fish and lake trout. He warned, however, that there remained "danger signals" in Great Lakes water quality, particularly as the result of toxic wastes. A second area of progress in Canada-U.S. relations was west coast fisheries management. The Congressman suggested that the salmon treaty represented enormous progress considering the bitterness this issue had generated between Canada and the U.S.A. Following the agreement, the main concern on both coasts had now shifted to the high seas interception of salmon. With these introductory remarks the co-chairmen called the first item on the agenda.

I. Fisheries and Border Issues

East Coast Fishery

The American co-chairman, reported that there was intense concern among the U.S. east coast fishing communities about high seas interception of salmon. He reported U.S. estimates that as many as one-half of North Atlantic salmon were being intercepted. He warned that there was bound to be a confrontation over this because U.S. fishermen had built large hatcheries and made major investments. American fishermen believed Canada was not doing enough to solve the problem. He went on to say that there was also American concern about Canada's having acquired a larger share of the take from the Georges Bank and inquired about what Canada was doing with the Gulf of Maine Commission.

The Canadian co-chairman replied that the two countries had an interest in developing a common approach to the east coast fishery. He said that, contrary to the impression of U.S. fishermen, Canada was taking the management of this fishery very seriously and had imposed very strict fishing quotas. It was the Canadian feeling that the U.S. method of control, through local commissions, was of questionable effectiveness. "Local commissions tend to pursue short-sighted, local interests". On the matter of salmon interception, the Canadian delegate made two points: first, that the take off Greenland was limited but it was a high limit based on what was caught last year; second, that there were serious doubts about the effectiveness of Canadian observers on the foreign fleets. "There are suspicions that some observers don't observe too much." Notwithstanding these problems, he said that drastic controls had been put on the salmon take by Canadian fishermen; for example, some 200 licences had been cancelled. "We have no commercial salmon fishery in the Maritimes at the present time." He further remarked that sports fishermen were limited to taking the "grilse" or immature salmon which experience had shown never developed into full, mature salmon. There was also a program to build more hatcheries. He concluded his remarks by saying that if the two countries co-operated in planning their catch it could be expanded substantially in the next 10 to 15 years but, if they did not, there would be major problems with all species.

The U.S. co-chairman said that he appreciated receiving new information on Canadian efforts to manage the fishery. He said that the U.S., like Canada, now had no east coast commercial salmon fishery but was very concerned about high seas interception. There were persistent allegations by U.S. fishermen of a large Russian take but no evidence. The Canadian co-chairman said that while he had no proof either, he was convinced that the Russians were taking substantial numbers of salmon because of two serious weaknesses in salmon interception control: first, the observers did not observe everything on factory ships and second, there was no supervision beyond 200 miles even though Canada's continental shelf extends well beyond that limit. "It was a serious mistake not to have retained the entire shelf in the Law of the Sea". He recommended that Canada and the U.S. co-operate in pushing for international supervision beyond 200 miles.

West Coast Fishery

The discussion was begun by a Senator from Alaska who described the magnitude of high seas catch of salmon. There were now 19 countries with high-water fleets which took some 3 billion pounds of fish a year. "They catch more halibut incidentally than we do intentionally. They are vacuum cleaning the whole area of the North Pacific." The largest of the fleets—the Japanese—can take a whole salmon run at one time though he noted that the Japanese had recently shown some interest in limiting the take because Taiwan had "gotten into the act in a big way". He suggested that the Japanese might offer a cutback in salmon take in return for a "more understanding" policy on whaling. He went on to say that the Russians were also very disturbed by high seas interception of salmon and wanted international talks on the matter.

A Canadian M.P. from British Columbia assured the U.S. delegates that Canada strongly supported controls on high-seas interception of salmon. Turning to the salmon treaty, he suggested that it boded well for the west coast fishery. "The principle that the country which promotes enhancement benefits from it should greatly strengthen enhancement efforts." He reported that Canada had strict quotas on chinook and that, as a result, five years from now there should be far more fish. He then asked whether sports fishing, which played a large part in the B.C. fishery, was of major importance in Alaska.

The U.S. Senator replied that commercial fishing was "a major Alaskan industry" and far more important than sports fishing. He added that there were some hand trawlers in southwest Alaska taking daily catch and many Indians exporting to Seattle. He went on to say that the U.S. was generally satisfied with the salmon treaty and convinced that it would increase enhancement. The one remaining problem on the U.S. side was a jurisdictional dispute between fisheries officials and the U.S. Parks Service which had denied access to streams for enhancement programs. He concluded his remarks by suggesting that Canada and the United States should explore the possibility of transplanting some Alaskan salmon to the East Coast because Alaska had achieved excellent results with the direct implanting of fish rather than the building of hatcheries.

Fishing Issues Between Ontario and Minnesota

A Congressman from Minnesota opened the discussion by describing the "tremendous frustration" felt by Minnesota and particularly its tourist industry at the actions of the Ontario Government. It had reached the point, he said, where the issue had been raised by the Secretary of State and the President at the recent Quebec City Summit. He warned: "There are storm clouds on the horizon and rain is about to fall". The Congressman went on to say that Minnesota is convinced that destruction of its sports fishing industry is the purpose behind the various actions of the Ontario Government. "Everything is being done in pursuit of that policy. We are afraid that Ontario wants a tourist desert on the U.S. side of the border." He reported that there had been a meeting in Washington to discuss these matters and that the U.S. side wanted another meeting, but warned that the $3.00 daily user fee—which applied only to U.S. fishermen and was therefore obviously not a conservation measure—made it impossible to sit down and discuss things rationally. He then remarked: "I've worked hard for Canada on other issues, for example, Buy America legislation. I am now calling in some chips." He said that he had proposed a Border Commission which would serve as a permanent forum for the discussion and resolution of conflicts in the border waters of Minnesota-Ontario.

Another Congressman from Minnesota fully supported these remarks and specifically repeated the point that his colleague and he had been friends of Canada over the years, most recently in resisting a Buy America campaign on cement products. The first U.S. spokesman resumed his remarks by saying that Minnesota had also proved its concern for the fishing stock by buying out its commercial fishing and by taking a number of other steps to protect the fishery. He added that conservation and enhancement efforts had to be done cooperatively with Ontario but that current hard times and hard feelings made that impossible.

A Canadian Member of Parliament from northern Ontario said that the Congressman was right: Ontario policy was motivated by a desire to benefit the tourist industry and, specifically, the outfitters. He went on to say that the proposal for a border commission "makes a lot of sense" because it would enable the two sides to deal on an ongoing basis with issues as they arose. He warned, however, that the results of the recent Ontario election made it unlikely that any government would risk offending people in Northern Ontario. He reported that Minnesota and Canadian outfitters were beginning to talk to each other about a joint package to increase the tourist pie rather than fighting over shares. The U.S. side said that such an approach was precisely what was needed. He pointed out that Minnesota outfitters bought significant amounts of equipment in Ontario, one illustration of mutual interest. He added that the controversy between Ontario and Minnesota was causing U.S. fishermen to avoid the entire area. "We are both losing."

The discussion then turned to the question of whether the issue might be referred to the International Joint Commission. The Canadian M.P. from northern Ontario suggested that the IJC might be the appropriate body because both sides claimed violations of the Boundary Waters Treaty. This view was endorsed by a number of other Canadian and U.S. delegates but questioned quite pointedly by others. A Canadian Senator from Ontario argued that the dispute was a regional and a local issue, not a national one, and therefore the two parties on the scene would have to solve it. A Congressman strongly doubted that the IJC would want to have anything to do with the issue. The Canadian co-chairman of Committee III closed the discussion by assuring the American delegates that, whatever approach was taken, they had strong support for their concerns from the Canada-U.S. Group.

White Pass and Yukon Railroad

A Senator from Alaska described this issue as a very difficult one. The railroad had tremendous historic interest because it ran along the beautiful 'trail of 98', but had gradually lost its economic base of carrying ore to Skagway and was finally closed. The Senator had proposed that Alaska subsidize the railroad but the closing of the Cyprus-Anvil mine caused Alaska to back away from any such proposal. It was now being proposed to use the Carcross-Skagway highway to carry the ore, if and when the mine reopens, but the tourist industry was strongly opposed. The Senator argued that with heavy traffic the road would have to be rebuilt every year, making the railroad "cost effective in the long run." He conceded that the future of the railroad hinged on the future of the mine though subsidized transport would help make the mine viable. A Canadian M.P. from British Columbia said there was little chance of discussing the transportation issue until the mine reopened. He pointed out that it was a high cost mine faced with a very competitive world market. The U.S. Senator acknowledged that "we have a hell of a lot of lead and zinc" and that the prospects for reopening the railroad were not all that bright.

The Raising from Lake Ontario of U.S. Naval Vessels

A Congressman from New York said that he had been responsible for putting this matter on the agenda. It concerned two U.S. ships sunk in Canadian waters during "the recent conflict between Britain and the U.S." (The War of 1812). He informed delegates that the vessels were in good shape and that in 1979 the custody and title of the vessels had been transferred to the Royal Ontario Museum with provision that any bodies recovered would be returned to the U.S. The Congressman explained that the U.S. side "wants in the worst way" to raise the vessels and to display one of them. He said that the U.S. was willing to raise the vessels, cover the costs and give one of them to Canada but that Ontario had refused on the grounds that the vessels belonged to the province. He concluded his brief remarks by thanking delegates for this opportunity to bring the matter to their attention.

II. Environment Issues

The Garrison Diversion

A Canadian Senator from Manitoba opened the discussion by saying the two countries had "come a long, long way" in resolving the Garrison issue and that discussions in the Canada-U.S. Group had been very helpful. A Congressman from Minnesota agreed and said that, while he was a supporter of Garrison, he was satisfied with the recommendations of the Garrison Commission which had been established in July 1984. He remarked that Senator Andrews of North Dakota had asked for the Commission in the knowledge that, without some kind of compromise, the project would have died in Congress. The Democratic Congressman from Minnesota agreed that establishment of the Commission was a good compromise and that the Commission's recommendations had guaranteed that the entire project would be kept on the U.S. side. He said that both Canadian and American environmental groups had been satisfied with this approach. The Canadian Senator who had opened the discussion now closed it by saying that apart from an update at next year's meeting, delegates might look forward to Garrison being dropped from the Canada-U.S. agenda.

The Flathead River

A U.S. participant remarked that the Flathead issue was "the flipside of Garrison". The U.S. was concerned that a proposed British Columbia coal mine development on Cabin Creek near its confluence with the Flathead River would have harmful effects on the air and water quality of Glacier National Park and inhibit the migration of wildlife. He noted that in February, Canada and the U.S. had jointly referred the matter to the IJC and that as long as it was being studied "we don't need to do more here". He said that the IJC report might be issued before the next Canada-U.S. Group meeting.

A Canadian M.P. from British Columbia assured the U.S. delegates that Canada would maintain normal water standards but expressed the hope that the U.S. would not insist on such high water quality standards as to make economic development impossible. An American delegate interjected that the Canadian argument was a lot like the one used by the Dakotas to justify the Garrison project. A Canadian M.P. acknowledged the point, but said that if both countries insisted on pristine standards there would be no development anywhere on boundary waters. He suggested that it was necessary to come up with "tolerant" water standards. The U.S. co-chairman of Committee III warned that environmentalists would be adamantly opposed to any deterioration of water standards on the Flathead. He then drew the discussion to a close by saying he was confident the IJC would help resolve this issue.

Consumption and Diversion Uses of Water

The U.S. co-chairman of Committee III began the discussion of this issue by saying the problem of consumptive uses of Great Lakes water was not now a serious problem but that it would become more acute as population grew. He pointed out that the aquifers and water tables of North America, particularly in the southwestern United States, were continuing to drop and that, as a result, the demand for water diversion schemes would grow. The Great Lakes, he said, were a great attraction because they contained roughly 20 per cent of the world's fresh water. "We must manage this resource very carefully." A Canadian M.P. from northern Ontario agreed that the pressures in the short term were not severe and that it was possible to argue successfully against diversions but he felt the day might come when we would have to consider diversions. "We may not be able to say no forever." He then asked what reception Robert Bourassa's proposals for hydro sales and water diversion received during Bourassa's recent trip to Washington. The American co-chairman informed Canadian delegates that Mr. Bourassa had met with a group of Congressmen but that they had discussed only electricity sales and not water diversion. The Congressman's own view was that there should continue to be a strong presumption against diversions.

Toxic Wastes

The discussion began with a brief exchange on the subject of PCBs. A U.S. delegate observed that the United States was having a terrible problem with PCBs, in part because organized crime had entered the picture. He reported, for example, that the mob was mixing PCBs with oil and selling the product as low price fuel oil. Another example of utterly careless disposal had been the practise of power companies giving PCB saturated materials to counties for dust control on gravel roads. These and other examples merely illustrated how important it was that legal and effective means of disposal be found. A Canadian Senator said that Canadian controls were every bit as slack as those in the U.S., witness the recent PCB spill on the Trans Canada highway in northern Ontario. There then followed a brief discussion of some recent advances in "mobile" disposal technology, such as PCB factory trucks and mobile burn units. By moving from place to place, this method of disposal avoided much of the violent public opposition to the location of dumps in particular communities.

The discussion had just turned to the problem of toxic wastes along the Niagara River when it was suggested that instead of just talking about the problem delegates should go and see the toxic dump sites, including Love Canal, just a few miles away. This suggestion was enthusiastically supported by all delegates and a visit to a number of sites in Niagara Falls, New York was quickly arranged by the Congressman for the district, John LaFalce.

The three hour trip began with Congressman LaFalce explaining the history of the Love Canal issue. In 1977 residents in the area began to complain of smells in their basements and dying plants in their backyards. The Environmental Protection Agency and the New York Department of Environmental Conservation commenced investigations but at that time there was little media interest and no legal framework or money to deal with the problem. By 1978, however, the magnitude of the problem was beginning to be recognized and a "health emergency" was declared. In December 1980, the first cleanup "superfund" was established by Congress despite some strident opposition that Love Canal was not a federal responsibility. During the next year the U.S. Government first recommended that pregnant women and children move out of the area and, following a public uproar, decided to buy out anyone who wished to move. To this day there are major law-suits claiming that health and other damages have been suffered over the years by residents of the area. The great problem remains—What to do with the toxic wastes?

The first stop on the tour was at the Love Canal office of the New York State Department of Environmental Conservation where the group was joined by Mr. Peter Buechi, an engineer with the Department. He described the Love Canal toxic dump site as containing some 21,000 tons of waste from Hooker Chemical Company operations in the 1930s and 40s. The site had been shut down in the early 1950s and subsequently purchased by the city of Niagara Falls. Despite warnings by Hooker Chemical, the City allowed schools and houses to be built immediately next to the dump.

The dump site itself was completely unremarkable; a 16 acre grassy plain surrounded by chain-link fencing. The remedial measures taken to seal the dump—expanding a clay cap, installing a leaching collection basin around the perimeter of the site and the cleaning of adjacent sewer systems—were all invisible to the eye. What delegates did see were nearby neighbourhoods—about 1000 homes, as well as schools, churches and businesses—largely deserted. The tour bus slowly made its way through modest, middle-class streets, lined with shade trees, on which there were no people, no children playing. Perhaps strangest of all was the occasional occupied house which the people had chosen not to leave. The entire scene was empty and dismal.

The next step on the tour was "S" site, an 8 acre toxic waste site immediately next to the Niagara Falls, New York Water Treatment Plant. Congressman LaFalce remarked that this site was more worrying than any other and intense debate raged about remedial measures. It was his own view that while removal and destruction of material was the ideal solution, there were circumstances in which it was just not practical. In the case of "S" site there was so much, highly dangerous material that attempts to excavate and transport it might be very hazardous. The only solution in such cases, he suggested, was to contain the problem on site. He added that recent court decisions had supported on-site treatment over the objections of U.S. environmentalists and the government of Ontario. In his opinion Ontario was weakening its credibility by insisting on nothing less than excavation and incineration. He hastened to add, however, that Canadian concerns had generally been very positive and had greatly strengthened the position of Americans fighting for remedial action.

The next stop was at the Water Treatment Plant, one of eight in the U.S. using granular carbon to remove toxic chemicals. The history of the plant had been very rocky: the first units had failed quickly and only after extensive redesign and repair was the plant coming back into operation. The Plant Manager, whose fortunes had also fluctuated, reported that Canada had been "up in arms" about the delays in plant operation because it was the largest toxic producer on the Niagara River. "Canada wants the plant to work better and faster." He went on to say that, though serious problems remained, there had been tremendous progress in water treatment in the past 15 years. He could recall a time when toxic fumes were so concentrated in the old water treatment plants that employees had to be evacuated periodically.

The final stop on the tour was at the Niagara River gorge to examine several places in the rockface from which toxic-laced water seeped down into the Niagara River. Delegates were immediately struck by the sight and smell of slimy water running from the limestone cliffs. Mr. Buecki said that the porous nature of the limestone in the area made the danger of leakage especially acute. This, in turn, explained Canadian concerns about continued pollution of the river and lack of confidence about present remedial measures.

Prior to resuming the Committee III agenda on Saturday morning, delegates briefly exchanged impressions of the toxic waste tour. A Canadian M.P. said that it had been the sight of a thousand homes boarded up that most impressed him and made him realize that "our American neighbours are concerned". The Democratic Congressmen from Minnesota reminded Canadian delegates that they had seen only "the tip of the toxic waste iceberg" in the U.S. He said that there were hundreds of sites across the country being fed by a flood of chemicals that came onto the market each year. It was for this reason that the Superfund had been created in 1980, with funds collected from the 600 main producers of toxic wastes in the U.S. Consideration was now being given to increasing fees so that more of the dangerous sites could be contained. A Canadian M.P. from British Columbia said that he and other delegates had been impressed by some of the U.S. efforts but disturbed by the fact that the least monitoring and clean up was being done at sites right on the Niagara River. An American delegate explained that those sites were privately owned and further legal action would be required to compel clean up. He observed that corrective action was sometimes delayed by lack of agreement on the best means of remedying the problem.

Acid Rain

The discussion of acid rain was begun by a Canadian M.P. who stressed the seriousness of the problem and that Canada was being hard hit by acid rain which originated mainly with sulphur emissions in the United States. He remarked that everytime Canada complained to the U.S. "we are criticized for not doing enough in our own country". He said that, while it may have been fair criticism at one time, Canada was now making progress on a number of fronts; a federal-provincial commitment to reduce sulphur emissions by 50 per cent in the next decade, stricter automobile emission standards by 1988, $150 million dollar expenditure on reduced smelter emission, $25 million expenditure on R&D and a plan to make cleaner, more efficient use of coal. He also noted that the Parliamentary Committee on Acid Rain had been re-established. The Member went on to say that these and other steps were necessary because the problem was growing worse. "We are in danger of losing thousands of our lakes and we cannot afford to." He said that he hoped to get this message across to political colleagues in the U.S. because action had to happen in Congress. Finally, he drew to the delegates' attention several aspects of acid rain damage that are generally ignored—damage to the forests, human health and historic buildings. He concluded his statement by remarking: "I know the American people want action. Now its up to you fellows".

A Congressman from Massachusetts responded that acid rain was also a major issue in his state. He said that he generally agreed with what had just been said and expressed the wish that some of his mid-West colleagues had been present to hear the statement. He was pleased that Canada was moving on the issue "because it takes away one of the other guy's arguments". He pointed out that New England was also moving ahead with remedial action though the region was the source of only 12 per cent of its acid rain. He agreed that the U.S. public was becoming much more aware of the problem and that those adversely affected were willing to pay for cleanup measures. He doubted, however, that the people in the mid-West were willing to bear a large part of the costs. He warned that the problem might actually grow worse as many U.S. electric generating plants were converted from oil to coal.

The Congressman went on to say it was clear that there would be little progress on acid rain until and unless the U.S. had a stringent national program. In this regard he drew particular attention to the Congressional debate over re-authorization of the Clean Air Act which had expired last year. He informed Canadian delegates of proposals to include acid rain provisions in a new Clean Air Act, but noted strong opposition from the mid-West. A U.S. Senator joined the discussion at the point. He remarked that his region of the country used low sulphur coal and had installed scrubbers on its power plants. "We feel that we have paid our dues." He went on to say that cleanup funds should be raised through a mine-head tax on West Virginia coal since it was politicians of that state who had kept high sulphur coal in use.

A Canadian participant observed that acid rain cleanup obviously faced major political obstacles in the U.S., but wanted to know what practical steps might be taken in the next 5 years. The U.S. side answered that in addition to an extended and expanded Clean air Act, which Canada should actively support, the Clean Water Act could also be used to support cleanup activities. A Congressman added that he would advise Mr. Davis, Canada's Acid Rain Envoy, to seek agreement on specific goals for acid rain reduction. He warned that the appointment of the envoys had been supported by the Reagan administration "as a dodge" but said that Canada should press "to make their mandate meaningful". The U.S. co-chairman of Committee III said that he would remind members of an observation made by the Canadian delegate in his opening statement, namely that the people of the U.S. were ahead of the politicians on acid rain. He said that evidence continued to accumulate that acid rain represented a serious threat to the environment and natural resources. Sweden, for example, now reported 10 thousand dead lakes. It was also apparent, however, that economically depressed areas like West Virginia could not pay the full or even the major costs of cleanup. He strongly urged Canada to "keep the pressure on".

There was also a brief discussion of acid rain in the Plenary Session. A Canadian Member of Parliament opened the discussion by saying that acid rain was a far more immediate problem in Canada-U.S. relations than many of the other issues on the agenda. He went on to say that he had seen a tremendous growth in public awareness over the past five years, but that awareness was not enough. Action, and particularly action at the political level, was required. He repeated the account he had given in Committee III of the recent steps taken or planned by Canadian governments and said that the hope in Canada was that the U.S. would now work cooperatively to solve the problem. He concluded by saying that we should all be grateful that there were only two jurisdictions in North America which had to agree on acid rain. The U.S. side responded by saying that he strongly endorsed the preceding remarks. Despite the differences in regional interests and attitudes regarding acid rain, there had to be an overriding awareness that the two countries shared a continent and that the devastation being wrought by acid rain would adversely affect all North Americans. He alluded, as he had in Committee III, to the damage done to Sweden's lakes by acid rain originating in the pollution of the Ruhr Valley. He argued that it was essential for Canada and the U.S. to work together. "We may not all be in the same boat but we are all in the same waters".

III. Multilateral Issues—the African Famine (In joint session with Committee II)

The discussion of the African famine was begun by a Canadian M.P. who said that the world had been warned about an impending crisis some time ago, but had not responded until the media brought it to the public's attention. The Member went on to describe the drought and resulting famine as affecting about one-half of Africa. The Canadian response had been three-fold: first, an enormous public outpouring of concern and donations; second, the matching of private contributions by the Canadian government; and, third the appointment of a Canadian Emergency Coordinator/African Famine supported by all 3 political parties. Altogether it was estimated that the Canadian financial response to the immediate crisis was on the order of $100 million. The Canadian delegate went on to say that while a great deal was being spent on the immediate crisis, very little effort was being devoted to the long-term problem. She argued that there was no point in apportioning blame for the crisis because "there is plenty of blame to go around." Instead, the world had to get on with the massive effort of development to guarantee that the crisis would not endlessly repeat itself in the future, "Nothing less than an effort on the scale of the Marshall Plan will do".

A U.S. Congressman responded for the U.S. delegation by describing the African famine as a "global issue". He agreed that the scale of suffering and its coverage by television had focussed attention to an unusual degree, but that the famine was not really a new phenomenon. He pointed out that up to 40 million people a year died of starvation and related illnesses. "Only now are we recognizing the reality of this in Africa." He reported that whereas Ethiopia had been hard hit in the past few years, the most acute problem now appeared to be the Sudan. The Congressman went on to say how pleased he was that both Canada and the U.S. had responded generously in a non-partisan way, a notable accomplishment considering the budgetary problems of both countries. He estimated that the total U.S. contribution had been an extra $1.2 billion, with U.S. direct food aid exceeding donations from the rest of the world combined. He remarked that, regardless of party, the Reagan Administration deserved to be commended for its response. But, like the opening Canadian speaker, the Congressman went on to express deep concern about the long-term problem, "beyond just keeping people alive". He argued that long-term international planning was called for. He cited the work of UNICEF in trying to galvanize public commitment over the long haul by arranging for U.S. communities to "adopt" communities in Africa. He noted that officials from the Maryland municipality in which he lived had visited Africa and, on their return, had raised $1/2 million for an area in Rwanda. He concluded his remarks by saying that emergency assistance had to be continued while long-term solutions were sought.

A Canadian M.P. spoke of how the African famine had touched and mobilized entirely new groups in Canada. Young people, for example, had been aroused by the involvement of rock stars in famine fund raising. He mentioned the exciting initiative of the Steel Workers of Canada to have 1 cent an hour deducted from their pay and contributed to famine relief. "We have to find new ways of solving these problems because we know the methods of the past did not work." A Congressman cautioned that, important as outside support was, it was crucial to have the involvement of the people and governments of Africa. He noted that the root of the problem in Africa was long-term habitat destruction as a result of tremendous population pressures. He warned that unless problems such as deforestation were solved, massive international efforts would be to no avail. A second Congressman added that government policies, in particular Marxist agricultural policies, were a major contributing factor to the African famine.

A Canadian Senator raised a note of scepticism at this point in the discussion. He said that the conversation reflected a "colonial" way of thinking about Africa, as if the western industrialized countries would analyse the problem and impose the solution. He warned that the Marshall Plan was a misleading comparison because while it had enjoyed the strong support of European governments, "African governments cannot agree on the cause of the famine or the solution". He further warned that there might be no development solution for some areas of Africa because the drying up of the region had been going on for hundreds of years. In any case, he concluded, "charity is no answer to poverty". The Canadian M.P. who had opened the discussion denied that there was any suggestion of a charity approach. She pointed to the self-help orientation of African non-governmental organizations and the growing activity and effectiveness of the Organization of African Unity. "I think there is a strong indigenous movement in Africa." A Canadian M.P. agreed that it was essential to get local people involved and pointed to India as an example of what was possible when people, their governments and the international community worked together. "Ten years ago they said India was a basket case. Now it exports food. No one should give up on Africa."

PLENARY

The bilateral trade relationship

The momentum in Canada for a comprehensive trade agreement with the United States has never been stronger, a Canadian Senator stated in beginning this discussion. It was only a decade ago that the Trudeau government had launched the Third Option in an effort to diversify Canadian trade. But before it left office, the former government had issued a report which recognized the priority of the U.S. market for Canada. In a world of large trading blocs, Canada was almost alone among industrialized states in lacking guaranteed access to a large market. With the country having just come through the worst depression since the 1930s, and facing protectionist thrusts on every side, the Trudeau government committed itself to explore the prospects for a series of sectoral free trade arrangements with the United States.

The new government gave increased momentum to this policy thrust, issuing a discussion paper last November which laid out a range of options for the trading relationship with the United States, including sectoral free trade. The Minister of International Trade subsequently undertook extensive cross-country consultations. The first results of these consultations were made public in a speech given in early May in which he rejected the sectoral free trade approach on the grounds that it was impossibly complicated to work out trade-offs acceptable to both sides. He likewise rejected the status quo because protectionist pressures in the United States would subject the existing trade arrangements to continuous erosion.

The Mulroney-Reagan trade declaration of March of this year represented another important development. The leaders decided to assign the "highest priority" to reducing bilateral trade barriers and charged their respective trade ministers to report within six months on steps to achieve this goal.

Support for a bilateral free trade agreement was growing steadily. The speaker mentioned as evidence the report of the Canadian Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, statements made by participants in the government's March economic conference, the joint declaration agreed to by premiers of the four western provinces, and the position taken by both political parties in Quebec. Ontario, with a minority government, was the most cautious province and if there were determined Ontario opposition, this could complicate federal moves. However, there has been considerable evolution of opinion amongst the Ontario business community in favour of bilateral free trade. The polls too showed growing public support.

The importance of the bilateral trade relationship was evident from the figures: a two-way trade in 1984 totalled $113 billion; and Canada was the largest market for U.S. goods, taking 21 per cent of all U.S. exports, of which 85 per cent were manufactured items. This meant twice as many U.S. exports go to Canada as to Japan. Even more U.S. exports go to Ontario alone than to Japan.

Twice before in this century, this spokesman continued, the two countries almost concluded a free trade agreement. Now there was more maturity and self-confidence in Canada, but it would be difficult to sustain support for such an initiative if protectionist measures continued to increase. In conclusion, this delegate stated that Canada supported the GATT multilateral trade negotiations but the conviction was growing that the GATT was not enough, and that a new bilateral arrangement with the United States was necessary. Many Canadians now felt that Canada could "take the bold steps that economics and geography demand", although in the process a national debate would be opened up going beyond economics to include the question of political independence and sovereignty.

The first U.S. response was made by a senior Congressman, chairman of the Sub-committee on Trade of the House Ways and Means Committee, who drew attention to the constitutional powers which prevailed in the field of trade. Congress had the power to control trade, although for practical purposes it had delegated authority as needed to the President to negotiate specific agreements. At this stage, the only delegated authority which the President had from Congress was to negotiate a two-way trade agreement with Canada. The "fast track system" would allow the President to sign an agreement which Congress had either to accept in its entirety or reject within 60 days.

He expressed the opinion that the United States was genuinely interested in exploring the prospects for a trade agreement with Canada, but he doubted whether it was feasible to do so on a sector-by-sector basis. However, the United States would leave Canada to take the initiative.

The experience of negotiating a free trade arrangement with Israel suggested that it should be possible to do so with Canada and to secure Congressional approval. Israel's barriers in every case—tariffs, quotas and subsidies—were higher and therefore more difficult to resolve. Previous United States' experience with Canada had also been favourable. The auto pact was a model and without it the automobile industry of both countries would have been worse off.

The next Canadian speaker stated that the new government was aware that economic problems such as high unemployment and a rapidly growing deficit had contributed to the change of government. The government was looking to expanded trade to help resolve economic problems, and giving particular attention to trade with the United States. It believed that Canadians wanted a special trading relationship with the United States. What did Americans want, this Canadian delegate asked, when U.S. legislation made no distinction between, for example, Canada and Japan. Timing was critical, since the new government had four years to prove itself, and he wondered whether the United States would respond quickly.

The second American to speak was a Senator from a mid-West farming state who approached the questions just put from the perspective of his constituents. He feared that with depressed conditions on U.S. farms, the timing was bad. Rural communities in particular were suffering; people were out of work and local banks and businesses were failing. The sharp growth of Canadian farm exports such as hogs had upset U.S. producers. As a result, Canada was "caught in a time war" and "the pendulum was swinging in the wrong direction". He expected the mood would change and that free trade with Canada would be acceptable in future, but he thought that that moment was some years away.

The final Canadian speaker, a Senator, said that ultimately a national debate would be precipitated on this issue and he hoped it would be non-partisan. There was a need for public education in Canada, since there was insufficient understanding of different concepts and approaches. To illustrate his point, he noted that agricultural trade had been deliberately excluded from free trade arrangements made by individual non-EC European countries with the European Community. He recommended that agricultural trade should be left out of a North American agreement, since climatic differences were significant and the two countries had quite different marketing arrangements. With agriculture excluded, he suggested that concerns raised by the previous speaker about timing could be set aside.

This delegate drew attention to the fact that de facto free trade already existed between the two countries. However, an agreement was needed so as to have a mechanism for dealing with non-tariff barriers and to exempt Canada when it was the innocent victim of measures taken by the United States to protect itself from third countries.

The most important economic benefit of free trade for Canada would be the rationalization of Canadian industry which it would make possible. It was important in both countries that it be well understood that a free trade arrangement did not open the borders to imports from third countries; each country would be free to maintain its existing tariff structure. It was also possible to reach agreement on domestically important exceptions. For example, the United States might want to preserve a system of set asides for minorities, while Canada might wish to maintain a support arrangement for regional development.

In the discussion which followed, a Canadian participant, noting that the meeting was taking place in an old cannery which had been closed down because of food imports, agreed that agricultural trade might best be excluded. Another Canadian noted that there was not yet a common market in Canada. He expressed particular concern about the future of the textile industry and asked what kind of transitional arrangements were envisaged. One of the earlier spokesmen responded that free trade agreements in Europe had been phased in over 10 years and there had been transitional funding arrangements for industries which faced problems. However, the textile industry would not face increased third world imports which would be damaging, and it could be argued that access to the U.S. market could give Canadian textile manufacturers a significant opportunity to rationalize and to expand production.

An American participant reminded the meeting that what was being considered was an ongoing process, involving years of consultation and adjustment. It was not just two leaders taking a decision.

Addressing the question of independence, a Quebec delegate observed that during the height of the separatist debate, Quebecers had nevertheless found it possible to face up to their North American identity. Public opinion polls showed that 72 per cent of Quebecers favoured free trade with the United States. With regard to the textile industry, which was concentrated in Quebec, he suggested that considerable consolidation had taken place in recent years and the industry was now quite competitive.

The discussion concluded with a recognition that, even without a commitment to free trade, economic forces were leading to increasing interdependence between the two countries. It was generally agreed that discussion of this important question had been stimulating and enlightening.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, October 8, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Martial Asselin, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS BILATERAL TRADE—ITEMS FOR NEGOTIATION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators may have heard a report on today's 7 a.m. CBC news to the effect that the Minister for International Trade has said that items on the table for negotiation in trade discussions with the United States will be kept secret. I do not ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to comment on that report. However, I do ask him if the Canadian government will provide us with the list of items or the sectors that are on the table for discussion during the trade negotiations.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am afraid I am unable to give a positive answer to that question at the present time because our negotiating stance has yet to be worked out. I rather doubt, though, that it would be practical for us to disclose our trading hand, as my honourable friend would appear to wish, while negotiations are taking place any more than it would be in any negotiation in which two sides are trying to reach agreement. I rather think it would be counter-productive to do that in advance of the actual negotiations.

I should point out, however, that that does not mean there will not be substantial consultation and, indeed, sharing of information between the federal government and the governments of the provinces. The minister is meeting with the provinces later this month on that very point; and the whole subject will be reviewed again at the federal-provincial conference which is planned for later this fall.

At the same time, talks are going on with all the industries and sectors affected by this.

In due course, our position will be hammered out, but I think we will have to wait until we see how matters develop before I can give a definite answer as to what information will be on the table at what time.

Senator Marsden: As a supplementary question, I point out that the same report indicated that the Americans were taking exactly the opposite position, that is, that they would be declaring what their position was. Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate comment on that?

Senator Roblin: I think the position of the Canadian government, in all particulars, will be on the table, but the point I am making is that I am not at liberty to say at the moment at what stage of the negotiations that will happen.

Senator Marsden: I have an additional supplementary question for clarification.

Is the Leader of the Government telling us that Canadian business people and workers in any given sector may be having their future determined in these trade negotiations without being aware of it?

Senator Roblin: The answer is no.

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate on the same issue—that is, the current trade talks with the United States.

The Right Honourable Joe Clark, Secretary of State for External Affairs, was reported on the weekend to have said in Toronto at a meeting of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs, that an advisory committee on the cultural industries would be assembled in order to advise the government with respect to that aspect of the forthcoming negotiations.

Does this mean that the government has now decided that the cultural industries would, indeed, be put on the negotiating table?

Senator Roblin: I have not seen my colleague's statement, so I am by no means able to verify the accuracy of what he said. However, assuming that my friend has the general thrust of it, I think the position on cultural affairs is well known, that is, that we intend to defend the cultural integrity of this country in all respects. That, however, does not prohibit us from talking to the people in the industry about these things.

Senator Grafstein: I try to understand the government's position on this, and it seems to me to increase the uncertainty. We are told, on one hand, that the government is protecting the cultural industries and, on the other, that it is not prepared to say that those industries do not constitute one of the exceptions to those open for negotiation. The position taken by the special joint committee on this question was that cultural industries were to be excepted from the trade discussions.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate give us further clarification because there is now uncertainty developing in the cultural industries as to whether or not they should mobilize to lobby the government not to deal with this question? Indeed, a tremendous amount of uncertainty is being felt in the cultural industries across the country concerning the government's position. Rather than stimulating Canadians to mount an extensive lobby against the government, would it not be preferable for the government to state clearly at this moment, as most Canadians would agree, that this matter is just not negotiable?

Senator Roblin: I must admit that I do not know what my colleague had in mind when he made the statement that has been attributed to him, but it seems to me that meeting with the cultural industry would be the best way to deal with any question of uncertainty. I think such a course would be a wise one to follow and I would certainly support it.

BANKING

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—MEMORANDUM OF INTENT— REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question, again, that is perhaps made even more timely by the fact that we have now passed the motion referring the subject matter of Bill C-79 to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. It refers to the information I asked for some time ago in preparation for that very event. The timing of that event has now been narrowed to tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock, I believe. I think that time still stands. Again I urge my honourable friend to provide me with at least as much of the documentary information as he can. A good part of my request had to do with certain documents or a statement as to whether something had or had not been done. I encourage him to try to get all of the information but, if he cannot, to get as much of it as he can.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend has been encouraging me regularly over the last few days and I want to tell him that his efforts are not without fruit, as far as I am concerned, because I have certainly conveyed his views to the minister in charge of this information. I will do the same again, but some time after 8 o'clock Wednesday night my honourable friend will be able to talk directly to the minister concerned, if, by any chance, I do not have what he wants by that time.

Senator Frith: When I do so, I will be able to introduce my request by saying that my colleague, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, has been asking for this information.

Senator Roblin: When my honourable friend speaks to the minister on Wednesday evening, will he be sure to make it clear that my request for information was in response to his request for information? Otherwise, she might get the wrong impression.

Senator Frith: Yes.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

SALE OF CANNED TUNA UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION— REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, while I am on the subject of unanswered questions, I notice that my name seldom figures in the list of those senators to whom answers are provided, but I have no personal resentment about that.

Senator Doody: I can't believe it.

Senator Frith: What good does it do? On the subject of unanswered questions, if I may refer to what is rapidly becoming a four-letter word—tuna—I remind the Leader of the Government that I have not received any answers to the questions I have asked. This subject still does seem to be alive—if that is not an inappropriate word to use—and there was some rather basic information I wanted on it. I ask my honourable friend whether he will ask his assistants to answer those questions as soon as possible.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Respecting tuna, it is dead but it won't lie down, as they say.

Senator Thériault: It's dead, but does it smell?

Senator Gigantès: Not if it's boiled immediately.

Senator Roblin: I will not follow on in that line of discussion; it would be inappropriate, I think, to do so at this time. I will try to get that information.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE—ITEMS NOT FOR NEGOTIATION

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, my question is addressed to the Leader of the Government and it follows upon the question that was put by Senator Marsden. In this morning's radio program "Morningside", as is usual on Tuesdays, Mr. Dalton Camp, Mr. David Barrett and Professor Eric Kierans debated the issue of free trade. Professor Kierans reminded all those who were listening that free trade's intellectual father, Ricardo, said that the benefits of free trade really flow under conditions where all of the partners experience full employment, where there is an international agent of exchange that is not manipulated—i.e., gold—where there is no intervention whatsoever in the economy of any of the partners and where each partner will be ready to divest itself of those portions of its economy which some other partner might better be able to perform. This is the sort of thing that makes some of us wary about what an unsophisticated free trader is willing to sell or to give away compared with one who is not.

Could we be assured by the government that there is a list of things which we will not sell or give away—a list based on factors more specific than, simply, “sovereignty” or “the interests of Canada”?

● (1410)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be quite frank with my honourable friend. I did not listen to the radio this morning because I had other things to do. I also have to say that David Ricardo, undoubtedly a highly respected economist, penned his most famous works about 1820, and it would not surprise me if a thing or two has changed in the great wide world since then. So I am not entirely sure that I should accept from the implication of my honourable friend's question that we should fashion our policy on the theories of Mr. Ricardo. There are other well authenticated economists who have other opinions. As a matter of fact, if you get any group of economists together, you often have the same number of opinions as you have economists. So I will have to allow my honourable friend's question to go over my head.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I regret that the Leader of the Government would allow my question to go over his head. I wish, while he is about it, he would consider also the economic god of his party, the famous Adam Smith, to whom all Conservatives genuflect. The only thing we know about him is his invisible hand, which we do not see but perceive only when it gives us a shot in the mouth. Will this shot in the mouth result in our losing large segments of our economy to competitors from the United States, who have unused capacity and who, therefore, when our barriers come down completely, can harm large segments of our economy?

Senator Roblin: I shall add my honourable friend's name to the list of distinguished economists whom I shall consult in the course of these negotiations.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—1983 STABILIZATION PAYMENT— REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he has any news on the sugar-beet front. Can he tell me whether or not he has learned, through his colleagues, if there has been any decision to make a 1983 crop stabilization payment?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give my honourable friend good marks for persistence. She does ask me frequently about this point. I am able to tell her today that government policy is in the process of formulation and I expect that it will go before cabinet in the rather near future, in which case I hope to make an announcement to her and others who are interested.

[Senator Gigantès]

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

NOVA SCOTIA—CAPE BRETON ADVISORY COMMITTEE REPORT— GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether the government has decided on how it will deal with the report of the Cape Breton Advisory Committee. The committee was announced in the budget of May and reported a short time ago. How will the government deal with this report and has it gone before the cabinet? Or is the minister preparing a memorandum? Can the Leader of the Government throw any light on how it will be handled?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend is right. The report has been received and is now being studied by the various departments concerned. No decision will be reached until that study has been completed. It is proceeding with all diligent speed, but it is not ready at the moment.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, the report points out that the unemployment rate in Cape Breton will probably reach 30 per cent of the labour force in the forthcoming winter, and recommends as an immediate measure to alleviate current unemployment the implementation of a capital works program in the amount of up to $600 million.

The committee states that there are available projects in that amount and recommends that the government take an immediate decision with respect to that particular phase of its report—because it is not long-term, it is short-term—and particularly to replace the 750 jobs that have been lost in Cape Breton as a result of the unjustified closure of the heavy water plant.

Can the Leader of the Government give us any hope that this particular aspect of the recommendation, which is immediate and urgent, will be dealt with as quickly as the sugar-beet matter, which we are told will be before cabinet very shortly?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend was doing very well until he came to the bit about the “unjustified” closing of this plant. He must know that there is a very great difference of opinion between him and me as to the accuracy of that adjective. With respect to the sugar-beet issue, I have to admit that my honourable friend has been after me on that topic since last June. However, we will probably be able to provide an answer in the case raised by my honourable friend quicker than we have been able to so far with respect to the sugar-beet issue.

Senator MacEachen: I am sure that the Leader of the Government does not intend by his answer to imply that the people of Cape Breton will have to wait for several months for a decision on this matter by the government. Can he give us some indication that a decision will be forthcoming, so that a program of works can be implemented in a timely way in order to meet this very serious unemployment situation? Because of the urgency of this situation, I would really like to know whether we can expect an early decision, in October or November—which, indeed, would be rather late.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, the urgency of the situation is not lost on the government. It is a serious situation. The report includes recommendations for interim measures, and the government is aware of them and is giving consideration to what it can do. However, I do not have a date for my honourable friend to when he may expect further information, but it will come as soon as we can manage it.

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

SEIZURE OF ITALIAN CRUISE SHIP—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, has the Leader of the Government in the Senate any news concerning an act of piracy that took place in the Mediterranean Sea, where an Italian ship with some 400 tourists aboard was taken over by pirates?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I can give my honourable friend the latest information on the subject. According to the record, five Canadians were on the cruise ship at one time. We have been in touch with four of them and we know that they are safe. We think the fifth person is also safe, but we have not been able to contact him as yet.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. William M. Kelly moved the third reading of Bill C-71, to amend the Customs Tariff.

He said: Honourable senators, I would like to make just two comments of clarification in response to Senator Hicks' statement in connection with Bill C-71. He expressed some question about the importance of the provision relating to aluminium drop-centre livestock trailers and at the same time indicated that he had no objection to it. That particular initiative received very strong support from a number of organizations—to mention a few, the Canadian Trucking Association, the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, the Ontario Trucking Association, the Treasurer of the Province of Alberta, and a number of MPs. It has some significance in the industry which it serves.

I will comment further on the concern expressed by the honourable senator over the assignment of responsibility to the Deputy Minister of National Revenue in connection with the imposition and removal of seasonal tariff rates. The concern of the senator, I believe, is based on the fact that while the minister is accountable to Parliament, the suggestion is that the deputy minister is not. I would argue that when the deputy minister is acting in the capacity that follows from this new delegation, his actions would need to be explained by and responsibility for those actions would be taken by the minister who made such a delegation. I think, therefore, that the concern is unfounded.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved the second reading of Bill C-77, to amend the Criminal Code (pari-mutuel betting).

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-77 basically provides a series of amendments to the Criminal Code of Canada and more specifically to section 188 which deals with pari-mutuel betting on horse racing. The bill contains many technical amendments that relate to the pari-mutuel wagering. While I do not want to go into the technical amendments but rather deal with the major thrust of the bill with respect to what it permits that is so different from what we now have, I would like to mention that, in the housekeeping portions of the bill, there are such things as the cleaning up of definitions of associations. I am not certain that under the former legislation it was so very clear just who could or could not operate a race track.

Another provision grants legislative authority for the use of video cameras and video tape as opposed to film, and is introduced by reason of modern technology.

However, the major thrust of the bill is to allow Canadians to bet legally on popular and prestigious races held in foreign countries. In all of the material that I have read, including the statements made by the Minister of Agriculture and the various speeches made by members of all three parties in the House of Commons—where, I should mention, there was agreement—nowhere was it mentioned that Canadians may, in the past, have been betting on these races. However, the purpose of this bill is to indicate that, when this legislation is proclaimed, Canadians may then go to any one of the 100 racetracks which are authorized to accept pari-mutuel betting and place a wager on a whole range of very popular and well advertised foreign races.

Honourable senators, with most bills which come before this house, there is an indication that we will be receiving some regulations in the future. In this instance, the regulation is ready, so we are able to see it.

Without mentioning all of the 50 or 60 horse races this legislation will enable Canadians to bet on, some of the more exotic ones are the Breeders' Cup, the Kentucky Derby, the Preakness and the Belmont Stakes. Those are races that receive widespread media attention.

There is provision, by the way, to add to the list of races included in the regulation. I should also mention that this legislation will cover not only thoroughbred racing but also harness racing. However, it will not cover dog races.

Needless to say, the betting will take place in accordance with Canadian regulations. The profit that will be made from this kind of wagering will remain in Canada and will be to the benefit of the Canadian horse racing industry. This particular legislation comes about as a result of a request of the industry, which sees this measure as a means of promoting growth in the industry—that is, if people see a great deal of advertising for the Kentucky Derby, then on the particular afternoon that it is run they may go to their local race track and wager not only on the Derby, but also on the races actually taking place at that track. So, in no way is it suggested that this will interfere with live racing.

Going to the race track is a major source of recreation for the Canadian public. Attendance in 1983 amounted to approximately 13.5 million, while if one were to add the attendance figures for professional football, professional hockey and professional baseball in Canada, one would come to barely 10 million people.

Senator Frith: Put pari-mutuel betting in place for those other sports and there will be higher attendance.

Senator Nurgitz: In any event, horse racing is a major source of recreation in this country. The amount wagered in 1983 was in excess of $1.7 billion, which is, by the way, an interesting figure because the total number of dollars spent on lotteries is approximately the same. The interesting feature of the horse racing industry is that 80 per cent of the take goes back to the players, while for lotteries roughly 40 per cent of the take goes back to the ticket purchasers.

Over 84,000 Canadians look to the horse racing industry for some level of income, of which over 42,000 are permanently employed. That is an interesting statistic because there are slightly more people employed in the horse racing industry than there are in the automotive industry. In addition to that, there are 30-odd thousand who are temporarily employed in the industry. Approximately $340 million is spent annually on wages and salaries for persons directly employed in the horse-racing industry, and it is estimated that approximately $200 million is spent annually on feed and supplies. The industry feeds part of the economy of this country.

Senator Frith: And that ain't hay!

Senator Nurgitz: As Senator Frith has said, "And that ain't hay!" On that high note, I will leave this matter and urge honourable senators to support passage of this bill.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX ACT TAX COURT OF CANADA ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved the second reading of Bill C-72, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to make a related amendment to the Tax Court of Canada Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-72 proposes certain amendments to the Income Tax Act and a related amendment to the Tax Court of Canada Act. This bill contains measures proposed in two notices of Ways and Means motions tabled in the House of Commons earlier this year, one relating to the payment of taxes in dispute, tabled on January 30 of this year, and the other dealing with certain technical amendments to the Income Tax Act, tabled on May 9 of this year.

First, I propose to deal with the technical amendments. These measures were proposed in the May 9, 1985, Ways and Means motion and are amendments that remove uncertainty, involve relatively uncomplicated legislation, have little revenue impact, and address what I suggest to you are real problems. There are also a fairly large number of amendments that make technical improvements to the French version of the Income Tax Act.

The motion tabled on May 9 was referred to the House of Commons Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs after it was tabled and, overall, the report of the committee was very positive. The committee was also very receptive to the concept of a separate bill to deal with technical and administrative tax matters, leaving only substantive policy matters to be dealt with in the context of a budgetary bill. As well, the committee expressed its support for the numerous changes that are proposed to improve the French version of the Income Tax Act.

In the course of its hearings in early June, the committee identified seven clauses in respect of which it suggested further review by the government. One change has been made to the bill as a result of the comments made by the committee. The proposed amendment adding new section 162(2.1), which related to the late filing of tax returns because of a foreign tax adjustment, has not been included in the bill. The comments on the other six clauses did not represent criticisms of the specific technical amendments proposed but, instead, dealt with broader policy and administrative issues that were not within the ambit of the specific amendments. Accordingly, these matters have not been resolved in the proposed amendments, but are being considered for future tax changes in the context of the budgetary process.

The technical amendments also reflect a number of suggestions for changes that have been received from interested members of the public both before and since the original motion was tabled in the House of Commons on May 9, 1985. All of these are of a minor technical nature.

The technical amendments being proposed are varied and numerous and I should like to mention a few of them. Taxpayers will be allowed to carry forward charitable deductions which were deductible but not claimed in a year. Where an employee has a benefit from employment as a result of a share acquisition by a related person, the benefit will be added to the related person's cost of the share. A totally and permanently disabled person will be allowed to convert a life insurance policy into an annuity contract on a tax-free basis—I assume that that then extends out the interest, making it a longer period.

Senator Bosa: What is the condition at the present time?

Senator Nurgitz: It did not permit that.

The six-year limit that applies for treating as a capital loss any expenses incurred pursuant to a warranty obligation assumed on a sale of capital property will be removed. Resource exploration and development expenses will be flowed through on certain amalgamations and windings-up without the application of the successor corporation rules. A rule will ensure that the recovery by a taxpayer of the cost of a stripped bond coupon will be excluded in computing income from the bond. Allowable business investment losses that expire before they can be deducted will be converted into net capital losses so as to obtain tax recognition over a longer period. The rules restricting the terminal loss on the disposal of a building where there is a gain on underlying land will be tightened so they cannot be avoided by transferring the land to a corporation before disposal of the building. The requirement that an election for annual accrual be filed with the issuer of a debt obligation is being dropped and instead taxpayers will be allowed to make the election in their tax returns.

Another loophole to be plugged is that a corporation which is treated under a tax convention between Canada and another country as a resident of that other country but would otherwise be a resident of Canada will be treated as though it is not resident in Canada.

Senator Frith: So the other country gets the tax?

Senator Nurgitz: No, the tax is still payable.

Senator Frith: But the other country gets the tax.

Senator Nurgitz: I am not sure of that.

I turn now to the amendments dealing with the amounts in dispute. These measures implement one of the recommendations contained in the Progressive Conservative Task Force Report on Revenue Canada which was released in April 1984. The purpose of these amendments is to ensure that a taxpayer will not be required to pay disputed taxes, interest or penalties until after he has had the opportunity to have his objections to the amounts assessed heard by an independent tribunal. The legislation also allows for the repayment of any amount previously paid to the extent that the amount is in controversy. The amendments will have three principal elements: first, restrictions on collection proceedings; second, repayments of taxes in controversy; and, third, safeguards against abuse.

The amendments which deal with the restrictions on collection proceedings provide that while amounts assessed by Revenue Canada under the act will be payable by a taxpayer forthwith upon assessment, no formal collection proceedings may be instituted by Revenue Canada during the 90-day period immediately following the assessment.

As under existing law, interest on all amounts ultimately determined to be payable by the taxpayer will run from the date the amounts were originally payable.

As well, where the taxpayer files a notice of objection to an assessment, formal collection proceedings in respect of the amount in controversy will be further delayed throughout the period during which the taxpayer may institute an appeal from Revenue Canada's decision on the objection to either the Tax Court of Canada or the Federal Court. If the taxpayer chooses to exercise his rights of appeal, formal collection proceedings with respect to the amount in controversy will also be delayed until after the first court decision has been rendered dealing with the issues raised by the taxpayer.

Only if the taxpayer loses his first appeal to the courts will he be required to pay the amount in controversy or post security for such amount with Revenue Canada.

Senator Bosa: Plus interest?

Senator Nurgitz: I have no idea. I did not look to see whether it does include interest.

Senator Frith: One of the things he said in answer to that question earlier was that interest was payable from the time of the debt being paid but not until it is settled.

Senator Nurgitz: There is no question that the legislation states that when interest is payable, it is payable from the date of the first assessment.

Senator Frith: But that is not due until that later assessment is confirmed.

Senator Nurgitz: Senator Bosa is raising the question of when one is posting security as opposed to money whether you would also have to include the interest, and I will undertake to ascertain that.

As I have indicated, in the event of a taxpayer being unsuccessful, he will then either lodge the amount of money or security for that money and then be permitted to proceed with his appeal to the next level of court.

● (1440)

The bill also contains amendments which will permit a taxpayer to obtain the repayment of any amount in controversy or the surrender of security where he has lodged an appeal to the courts and he has already paid the amount to the Crown or posted the security.

Honourable senators, I am not absolutely certain of this, but, when I was reviewing the matter as to whether the taxpayer need not post the funds or security in making an application for an appeal, I came to the conclusion that, in the event that both are done, the taxpayer is entitled to a refund of one, so there is only one lodging of security or one payment of tax.

To ensure against taxpayers abusing their newly-acquired rights, the bill also contains certain safeguards. Revenue Canada will continue to have the authority to collect amounts in dispute where it may reasonably be considered that the eventual collection of such amounts may be jeopardized by the delay which would otherwise result from the application of the new collection provisions. Taxpayers will have the right to a judicial review of Revenue Canada's determination that the eventual collection of tax would be so jeopardized.

In other words, I would assume that it is not different from years ago—what were called the “absconding debtors provisions”—when, in advance of proving the amount you were collecting, you could establish that there was reason to believe that there would not be assets to take at a later date. However, that is subject to judicial review so that Revenue Canada would have to make a court application to prove that they would be in jeopardy of collecting at a later date.

The legislation also gives the courts the authority to impose a penalty of an amount not exceeding 10 per cent of the amount in controversy where it determines that a taxpayer's appeal is groundless. One of the main purposes for instituting this was to get away from frivolous appeals that would be filed merely for the purpose of delaying payment.

Honourable senators, the incorporation of these measures relating to the payment of taxes in dispute into the Income Tax Act answers one of the major concerns frequently expressed in the past that taxpayers are not dealt with fairly under our present tax collection system. These measures will ensure that taxpayers are not forced to pay taxes which they do not consider to be owing until such time as they have had an opportunity to have their case heard by an independent judicial body. It is an important step in achieving the government's goal of a fair tax collection system for all Canadians.

Honourable senators, early consideration and passage of this bill is desirable so that the department can proceed with the preparation of the necessary forms which would result from the passage of this bill.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I wonder if the sponsor would agree to answer a question with respect to this bill.

Recently, as most people are aware, the Reichman interests in Toronto acquired the assets of Gulf Canada using a tax device involving a partnership and, thereby, avoided paying millions of dollars in tax which would otherwise have become payable. Has this matter been dealt with at all in the bill before us?

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I cannot comment on the question, nor do I have an answer. I am not satisfied that this particular bill, Bill C-72, really addresses that question. This bill represents what some consider to be a clean-up of the system of collecting taxes. I think there will be other legislation which will deal with the Income Tax Act generally.

On motion of Senator Barrow, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE
AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE AND REPORT ON FILM ENTITLED:
"THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the activities of the National Film Board with respect to the production and distribution of the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss".—(Honourable Senator Doody).

[Senator Nurgitz.]

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Molson.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Molson speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on this motion.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I very much appreciate the tremendous support from colleagues in the chamber in my efforts to have this film referred to the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

So much has been said already, and so very well said, that I am sure honourable senators are just as anxious as I am to have this matter dealt with as soon as possible. I do not think I can add anything further and, therefore, suggest that the motion be now adopted.

Motion agreed to, on division.

Hon. Jack Marshall: I wish to inform honourable senators who have not received a notice that the film will be shown in Room 356-S at 8 o'clock tomorrow evening.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE PIERRE ELLIOTT TRUDEAU, P.C.

RECORD OF ADMINISTRATION—INQUIRY STANDS

On Inquiries:

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, with leave, I should like this inquiry to stand until October 17, the eve of Mr. Trudeau's birthday.

Inquiry stands.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

TWENTY-SIXTH MEETING

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, May 28, 1985:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-Sixth meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group, held at Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario, from 16th to 20th May, 1985.

He said: Honourable senators, the annual conference of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group took place at Niagara-on-the-Lake in mid May. Because of the importance of the meeting and because of the increasing importance that the Prime Minister and the government have been putting on the Canada-U.S. relationship, I had hoped to speak about some of these matters before the summer recess. However, house time did not permit that and I now have the advantage of making available the report of the Twenty-Sixth Meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group in both English and French, which was printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of Thursday last, October 3, 1985, at page 1332.

Because we have a number of new senators, most of whom will take a particular interest in our parliamentary relationship with the United States, I should explain that the Canada-U.S. Inter-Parliamentary Group, in the Parliament of Canada, usually exceeds 200 members and meets annually to hear reports and to elect officers. The 1986 general meeting will be held early in November, and I hope that all honourable senators who are interested will make a point of being present.

It may be that all honourable senators have not had the opportunity of visiting Upper Canada's first capital at Niagara-on-the-Lake, but those who have will know that it is a beautiful town made spectacular by the cherry, peach and apple blossoms of May. The tourist accommodation and attractions are incomparable and the conference facilities were ideal for our purposes.

The sessions of the conference are attended by members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States and by members of the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada. The purpose of the conference is to deal with as many as possible of the matters which the parliamentary representatives regard as worthy of close discussion during the few days they are together. The Canadian team goes through several weeks of intense briefings. The individual delegates take responsibility for specific subjects and do a lot of homework to prepare themselves for the discussions with knowledgeable and articulate American congressmen.

The report which I have tabled covers some 35 pages. I highly recommend that honourable senators read it with some care. I hope that when they have done so, they will take the opportunity of using this chamber as a forum for discussion of some of the pertinent issues dealt with in that report. At this time I will simply sketch briefly what those issues were, in an attempt to titillate their curiosity and inspire their participation in the debate.

The conference is organized into three committees and delegates are assigned to each. Traditionally, Committee I deals with economic and trade questions. In the opening discussions dealing with the state of the U.S. and Canadian economies, the Americans were quite pessimistic. Unemployment remained high with an actual decline in jobs in manufacturing. Growth threatened to continue at a low pace. The U.S. dollar was too high, as were real interest rates. There was disagreement as to why Americans were not investing as much abroad and great concern about the size of the balance of payments deficit. Of course, the government's growing deficit was particularly topical at the moment because Congress was in the final throes of trying to deal with the President's budget requirements.

Canadian delegates commented on the depth of the recession in Canada and the very large deficits, not only of the national government but of the provincial governments as well.

We emphasized the extent to which recovery depended upon American action and the importance of finding some new trade arrangements with the United States to allow Canadians to avoid the impact of protectionist sentiment in the United States Congress. As honourable senators can imagine, the discussions on the possibility of a new round of multilateral trade negotiations and the apparent movement of the Canadian government from a sectoral approach to a comprehensive approach regarding the possibility of bilateral free trade were subjects which engaged the attention of the delegates for some time. There was agreement that a new multilateral agreement could not be implemented until early in the twenty-first century, even if the process began tomorrow, and the foot-dragging of France and the unreadiness of the United States would ensure that the process would not get under way for some time yet. That fact, together with the growing threat of protectionism in the United States Congress, seemed to militate in favour of some new bilateral deal between Canada and the United States.

The discussion went on into specific matters such as the Americans' subsidization of their grain exports, their requirement that imported steel pipe be indelibly marked as to source, the artificial barriers they have been putting up against Canadian hog and pork imports and American "harassment" of the Canadian fishing industry; the insistence of Americans that our softwood lumber industry is subsidized by our stumpage system, in spite of the fact that their own International Trade Commission has determined to the contrary, our patent law relating to pharmaceuticals, President Reagan's emergency quota regulations which essentially ban imports from Canada of any products containing sugar, our mutual concerns about European beef, that old chestnut of border broadcasting and what the Americans believe is a subsidization of our freight rates by the Government of Canada.

I have run over the whole list of irritants quickly but the most disturbing theme which ran through all of the discussions was the matter of the 400 protectionist bills which are now at some stage of the congressional process and which are symptomatic of the deep anger and concern among those special interest groups who are hardest hit by America's huge trade deficit.

Canadian delegates felt fortunate that among the American delegates was Congressman Sam Gibbons of Tampa, Florida, who is the Chairman of the Trade Sub-Committee of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives. Congressman Gibbons has a good deal of control over which of the protectionist pieces of legislation ever reaches the floor of the House. He is a friend of Canada and a self-proclaimed free trader. However, in response to the monumental pressures which are heaped on him every day, he has developed a bill of his own which may be as damaging to many Canadian interests as any of the other bills could be. Although there are internationally accepted definitions of unfair trade practices, such as dumping, unfair subsidies, and so forth, Congressman Gibbons' bill proposes to develop special American definitions of those terms. In particular, even though the ITC has determined that Canadian stumpage practices are not a damaging subsidy in the international sense, they would be if Congressman Gibbons' bill were ever to be allowed to pass. The "level playing field," which the Americans espouse so warmly, is in danger of developing some lumps built by the American Congress.

Committee No. II is devoted to questions of energy, defence and multilateral questions.

There was a discussion of the changes in the National Energy Policy, of problems of energy transportation and distribution in North America and a favourable reaction to the idea of increased electricity exports from Canada. The possibility of a continental energy policy was mooted, the suggestion being that such a policy would resolve the prohibition on crude oil exports from the United States, provide a rationalization of the natural gas supply system, and overcome some of the problems of export of Canadian electricity and the restrictions on the export of Canadian uranium. One congressman expressed the opinion that now, at a time of a Canadian energy surplus, was the best time to plan a free trade package including energy, which he believed would be a dominant item of discussion.

The committee went on to discuss defence. Most of the time was taken on President Reagan's Strategic Defense Initiative, or SDI, as it has become known. There was general support for the program among the congressmen, but doubts were expressed over the problem of funding and over the effect of SDI on the ABM Treaty and on SALT II. The views on the Canadian side were more mixed, with several delegates expressing the opinion that SDI should be considered more an offensive than a deterrent system, and that it would be seen as a destabilizing element in arms negotiations. Discussions on the arms control negotiations underlined the critical role being played by the negotiators at Geneva.

A limited amount of time was spent on the renewal of NORAD and the need to improve communications and lines of command.

● (1500)

There were Canadian complaints that the defence production sharing arrangement was being inhibited by the American preference for giving small contracts, which might be ideal for Canadian producers, to small business in the United States, and the fact that Canadian "offset" production makes Canadian industry into "pattern producers".

Committee No. III dealt with fisheries, environment and multilateral issues.

The delegates congratulated each other on the impact that the Canada-U.S. Inter-Parliamentary Group had had on resolving a number of issues in these fields. Some progress had been made in improving the quality of the water in the Great Lakes, although there were now danger signals as a result of the proliferation of toxic wastes. The group had finally managed to get together all the players related to the west coast salmon fisheries management and reached agreement.

However, it was agreed that there were still important issues. The Americans were unhappy with Canadian management of the east coast fishery and all members of the committee were concerned about the high seas interception of fish by Russian and other foreign trawlers. The same concern about the Russians and the high water fleets of some 15 other countries "vacuum cleaning" the whole area of the north Pacific also found common ground among the delegates.

There was a claim that sport fishing in Minnesota had been ruined by the policies of the Ontario government and it was agreed that the International Joint Commission should be asked to intervene.

Other areas of discussion included the White Pass and Yukon Railroad, the raising from the floor of Lake Ontario of U.S. naval vessels, the Garrison diversion, the Flathead River and a warning that while the consumption of Great Lakes water was not now a problem, it was likely to become one over the next few years. That brought forth a tough discussion on toxic wastes in the Great Lakes and the committee adjourned to Niagara Falls, N.Y., to view the Love Canal to see what is being done to repair the damage. The final stop on the tour was at the Niagara River Gorge to examine several places on the rock face from which toxic-laced water seeps down into the Niagara River. Delegates were immediately struck by the sight and smell of slimy water running from the limestone cliffs. Canadians expressed their concern about the continued pollution of the rivers and their lack of confidence about present remedial measures. It was agreed that the delegates had seen only "the tip of the toxic waste iceberg" in the United States. There are hundreds of sites across the country being fed by a flood of chemicals that come on to the market each year.

Acid rain was a natural sequel to those discussions. The congressmen insisted that the issue was also an important one for them, but they were not at all confident that either the people of the midwest or the federal government in Washington was prepared to pay the enormous cost of cleanup. In fact, they anticipated that the problem might grow worse as many United States electric generating plants were converted from oil to coal. It was agreed that the two countries had to seek agreement on specific goals for acid rain reduction and the hope was that the two envoys named by the President and the Prime Minister would do something to make their mandate meaningful.

The only multilateral issue which was reached during discussions was the African famine. The Canadians called for a "Marshall Plan" to deal with the long-term problem and it was agreed that massive help was required in the short term while long-term solutions were sought. Self-help rescued India. One delegate said "Ten years ago they said India was a basket case. Now it exports food. No one should give up on Africa."

The plenary session which wound up the discussions was centred on the bilateral trade relationship between Canada and the United States.

No one doubted the importance of the issue. The free trade arrangement between the U.S.A. and Israel and the Canada-U.S. Auto Pact were cited as examples which had greatly benefited the participants. One American senator from the midwest was concerned that the timing was bad to commence free trade discussions. The depressed conditions on U.S. farms and the general protectionist attitudes would militate against success. He thought that the right "time window" would be in about five years but that in the meantime there would be too much American resistance. Most of the Canadian reaction was positive, but there were those who expressed skepticism on behalf of agriculture and such industries as textiles. It was agreed that whatever was done, it would have to proceed over a long period to prevent the impact on specific industries from being too severe.

Honourable senators, I confess that I have recited a long catalogue of issues this afternoon. When recited in such a rapid-fire and bare-bones way, you may even regard it as boring. But I assure you that the weekend conference was in no way boring. Delegates on both sides were extremely well prepared. The debates were vital and frequently spirited, and the opportunities for social intercourse and private chats turned the whole event into both a learning and human relations occasion which could not but help send each delegate home having gained new friends and new insights into the issues which were discussed. The people of Canada and the United States are the ultimate beneficiaries of these Canada-U.S. inter-parliamentary conferences and the continuing links which are forged among the delegates.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Would the honourable senator entertain a question?

Senator Stanbury: Yes.

Senator Molgat: The honourable senator mentioned discussion of the Garrison diversion. Was that done strictly in the context of the Garrison or was it done in the much broader context of the movement of water between the two countries?

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, unfortunately I was not present at those discussions. I am not sure whether any other honourable senator was present at those discussions and can provide the answer. So far as that particular committee's discussions are concerned, I have to rely on the report itself. Perhaps the honourable senator could look at the report of that committee to get an explanation of the extent of the discussion—unless, of course, there is a senator present today who actually attended the committee's discussions.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

1985 UNITED WAY CAMPAIGN

ANNOUNCEMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to make an announcement on behalf of the organizers of the United Way campaign. A small fashion show and party will be held today in room 256-S at 5 p.m., presumably to model the new gowns for the clerks at the Table! In any event, in order to raise money for this very worthy cause, the staff of the Senate have been encouraged to attend. I would also like to invite all honourable senators to attend. There will be a raffle, which should attract a lot of people from this side; and also free coffee, which should attract all of our friends from the other side. It will be a very pleasant time, and I would certainly like everyone to attend, if possible.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, October 9, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Martial Asselin, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.

Prayers.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

FREE TRADE—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I give notice that, on Tuesday next, October 15, 1985, I will call the attention of the Senate to free trade with the United States.

INDUSTRY

FOOTWEAR—IMPORTATION QUOTAS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am aware that the footwear industry in various parts of Canada has been making representations to the government concerning the policy the government will implement with respect to the level of importation of footwear into Canada from other countries.

Could the Leader of the Government tell us what the present situation is?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Yes, I can, honourable senators. The government has received a report from the special committee that was established to advise on the question of the footwear industry. That report is now under consideration. No decision has yet been reached as to what the government will be recommending with respect to it.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I should like to ask some further questions covering two points.

On the first point, can we take it for granted that, whatever the result of the deliberations is with respect to time or quantities, the government will continue a policy of quotas with respect to the Canadian shoe industry? Is there, indeed, some doubt as to whether the government will abandon the policy altogether? Can the Leader of the Government enlighten us or clear up that point which is quite apart from the level of market share accorded to importers and the duration?

On the second point, since pressure is mounting for some clarification, can the Leader of the Government give us some idea as to when the government might be able to reach a decision?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is really asking me to anticipate what the government's policy is going to be, and that, of course, I cannot do.

The decision of the government will be announced when the discussions have matured within the departments concerned.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I think the Leader of the Government has left a possible inference that the government may, indeed, abandon quotas altogether. Is that a possibility?

Senator Roblin: I am not leaving any inference whatsoever. I am simply allowing my honourable friend to make whatever inferences he wants to make. When the government policy has been decided upon, it will be announced, and I am sure he will be among those who will take note of it.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, during the current session I have asked this question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate: When can we look forward to government action being taken on the conditions brought about because of the severe drought on the prairies? I will not try to quote him because I may be inaccurate, but Senator Roblin gave some indication that a decision in this regard might be taken fairly soon. I believe that at one point he said that would happen by the end of the month, which would have been September. In any event, those people out there are really hurting; they need cash; they have been asking for it for a couple of months now. Can the government leader give us a clearer indication as to when a decision might be forthcoming?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Yes, honourable senators, the answer is: Soon.

Senator Argue: I suppose that that makes it a couple of weeks sooner, but how soon is "soon"? Might that be within a week, within a month, next year or within a matter of days?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend can make whatever assumptions he likes about "soon". I cannot enlarge upon that statement.

Senator Argue: People have been patient out there; they have been waiting for a long time. People are going bankrupt daily.

Senator Flynn: Oh, gee whiz!

Senator Argue: You can say, "Oh, Jesus!" or anything else.

Senator Flynn: I didn't say that.

Senator Argue: I don't know what I heard you say. If you are the Canadian Commercial Bank you don't go bankrupt, but if you are a farmer they say, "We will get you some help soon."

Senator Flynn: On a point of order, I did not say "Jesus"; I said, "Gee whiz!"

Senator Argue: That is what I heard, too. It was my error.

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

SEIZURE OF ITALIAN CRUISE SHIP—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, concerning the act of piracy that has taken place in the Mediterranean, has the Leader of the Government in the Senate any news that he could share with his colleagues in this chamber?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I can report that since we mentioned that matter yesterday, two other persons have been identified as Canadians and they are both safe.

[Later:]

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, as a supplementary to Senator Bosa's earlier question, is the government leader not aware that not only the Canadian hostages but all the hostages are safe? The terrorist incident in the Mediterranean is over.

Senator Roblin: Oh, that is excellent news. I thank my honourable friend for bringing it to the attention of the house. I might add that it is news to me, too.

ENERGY

EAST COAST EXPLORATION—REPLACEMENT OF PETROLEUM INCENTIVE GRANTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I will try once more today with the Leader of the Government to see whether we can get a bite at all. We have failed so far, so perhaps I will just put another lure into the water.

The government leader may have noticed in the press a day or two ago a very long article about the virtual standstill in exploration off the east coast of Canada. The number of rigs has declined and still others are proposing to leave. This is not entirely but is in good part due to the termination of the petroleum incentive grants. Because the assistance to the exploration programs has been terminated, the exploration companies have not provided for further exploration along the east coast.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government can tell us whether it is the intention of the government to replace the petroleum incentive grants by an alternative form of encouragement of exploration on the east coast.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I can tell my honourable friend, although I am sure he also knows this, that those people who are interested in the exportation of natural gas from the Sable Island fields are continuing with their applications before the National Energy Board. While there may be some slowdown in the industry at the present time, I think that there is still room for considerable optimism.

With respect to the question that he asked, I can tell him that the minister is in the process of developing the policy with respect to Canada Lands or offshore incentives to replace the late lamented PIP arrangements.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

PRODUCT INSPECTION STANDARDS

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I am sure that all members of the government party have heard all they wish to hear about tuna in my home province and, frankly, I too have heard all that I want to hear about it. However, in light of the damage that has been done to the fishing industry at large in the marketing of its product, and more particularly the danger in which a substantial number of jobs in New Brunswick have been placed, may I ask the Leader of the Government to exert his influence upon the Acting Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to give as much publicity as possible throughout Canada at this point in time to the fact that fisheries inspection of this type of product has now been stepped up—improved, if you will—and, in any event, is now at a level where the Canadian public can again fully trust the product that they buy off the shelves in our retail markets. It is very important to the industry in New Brunswick and tremendously important to the many families who are dependent upon employment at this particular plant.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is a very helpful suggestion and I will see that it is passed on to my colleague.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Thursday, October 10, 1985, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit at 3.30 o'clock in the afternoon on Tuesday next, October 15, 1985, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

CANADIAN INSTITUTE FOR INTERNATIONAL PEACE AND SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the third reading of the Bill C-69, intituled: "An Act to amend the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security Act and certain other Acts in relation thereto".—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might try to find a way out of what appears to be a small impasse in connection with the third reading of Bill C-69. Some time ago Senator MacEachen asked a question, and the sponsor of the bill had some difficulty in supplying the answer, the reason being that the minister responsible was somewhat reluctant to give details of his relationship with the institute. He was anxious—as, indeed, were his predecessors—to keep the appearance of arm's length relationship with the institute intact. He had no desire—nor do any of us have any desire—to embroil the institute in a partisan political controversy. With that in mind, he was reluctant to give direct answers to some questions.

However, he has now agreed to supply my honourable friend opposite with the answer he requested. The information, I am told, is that the minister did seek the advice of the institute directly on one occasion when he called on it to undertake a study on the implications for Canada of the NORAD agreement over the past ten years. That study is under way. That is the information I have concerning that particular question.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I thank the Deputy Leader of the Government for his co-operation. I am grateful, if that is the question—

Senator Flynn: You are grateful for his advice.

Senator MacEachen: No, nothing like that—Senator Frith: Just when things were going well, Jacques. You just can't stand it.

To see some nice, friendly relations between the two sides triggers him right away.

Senator MacEachen: The cardinal sin of a minister in the House of Commons was to filibuster his own estimates, and that is precisely what Senator Flynn does frequently in the Senate.

Senator Flynn: I have become as useless as you.

Senator Argue: So unkind!

Senator MacEachen: He is the chief obstructionist to the passage of government legislation. I guess that Senator Flynn is annoyed that—Senator Flynn: No, I am just having fun.

Senator MacEachen: —the leadership on the government side is showing a co-operative attitude and is not adopting the obstructionist attitude that has characterized his interventions.

Senator Frith: That must be it. I think you are on to something.

Senator MacEachen: I give full marks to the deputy leader—

Senator Doody: No, no! I've got enough over here!

Senator MacEachen: —and the minister for providing the answer.

Senator Argue: Only after one year.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

QUESTION PERIOD

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

TIME LIMIT FOR GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO REPORTS OF SENATE COMMITTEES—REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION BY COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to revert to Question Period:

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Chairman of the Standing Rules and Orders Committee, who was not here earlier. Standing order 70(16) of the Standing Orders of the House of Commons—which was a recommendation of the Lefebvre committee—provides that:

Within 120 days of the presentation of a committee report, the government shall, upon the request of the Committee, table a comprehensive response.

No such rule has been adopted by the Senate.

This new standing order came into force on December 22, 1982. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has thus far made five reports in which it has requested that the government table a response pursuant to standing order 70(16). In each instance that request has been deleted from the copy of the report tabled in the Senate. When this was first done in 1983, François Bernier, counsel to the committee, wrote to the then director of the Senate's Committees and Private Legislation Branch to question this practice on the grounds that: first, officers of the Senate have no authority to modify a report adopted by members of both houses; second, it denies to senators the information that a response is forthcoming by the government. At the time, Mr. Bernier was told that while his arguments were sensible, the decision in question had been made by a group of Senate officers and would stand.

The whole situation would be avoided for joint committees if the Senate also adopted a rule to the effect that any of its committees may request that the government table a response to a report within 120 days. I must say that this makes sense. Why should the government not also be required to respond to reports of Senate committees within the same time period, 120 days?

My question to Senator Molgat is: Would he put this question before the rules committee? Even though our system generally seems to work pretty well, if it would work better as a result of adopting this rule, would he please have his committee take it under consideration?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, might I say that Senator Godfrey has proposed to the committee a number of changes to our rules, and we have looked at them very openly.

I might point out that the joint committee that was studying the reform of the Senate, at the request of the members from the House of Commons used this particular rule in the house—that is, that the government should respond within a certain time—and I think it was a useful vehicle. At the moment, the Senate does not have such a rule but I would assume that my colleagues on the committee would be prepared to look at the matter in the same way as they have looked at the other worthwhile suggestions of Senator Godfrey.

Senator Godfrey: With more favourable results, I trust.

Senator Molgat: If I recall correctly, Senator Godfrey proposed four changes and one of those changes was adopted. One out of four is not a bad record.

Senator Godfrey: I like to bat over 300.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the second reading of the Bill C-77, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code (pari-mutuel betting)".—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, at the risk of incurring the wrath of Senator Flynn, I would like to start by saying that I support this bill. I hope that will not cause any negative response from Senator Flynn.

Honourable senators, I think it is important for us to know what this bill does not deal with. We are not here to review the whole question of whether it is a good thing from the point of view of public morality to have the state involved in gambling. It is, of course, with regard to pari-mutuel betting and as it is with regard to lotteries. That is a debate that I do not think has ever been settled. There might be some senators who have some reservations as to whether or not it is moral for the state to be involved in gambling, especially when we see what has happened with regard to lotteries. There is widespread advertising everywhere, encouraging people, in effect, to gamble. I suppose it depends on whether or not one thinks gambling is a vice. However, I am asking honourable senators to leave aside that question and not to assume that when I support this bill I am speaking in support of the state being involved in gambling.

What we do have here, honourable senators, is a question as to whether or not we should solve a problem for the Canadian race tracks and, indeed, for this industry, as it exists in Canada. The amendment to the Criminal Code that is before us, I understand, originated with an organization called the Race Tracks of Canada Incorporated, a Toronto organization that represents 95 per cent of all Canadian horse raceways, thoroughbred and standardbred. They found that attendance at Canadian events was down notably on those days when a major U.S. race was aired on Canadian television. They found or suspected that what took place was that people would stay home or would find ways to bet on these races. A bettor on a race, of course, usually wishes to have some information about the race as it takes place. Perhaps this is part of the excitement for a gambler. By permitting betting on U.S. races at Canadian facilities, the Race Tracks of Canada Incorporated tell us that attendance would improve generally, and especially on those days when U.S. races are aired in Canada.

The total amount of current Canadian betting on U.S. races is not available, for understandable reasons. If this legislation is passed, of course, we will have such figures in the future. One example that was given of the amount of money at stake is about Canadians who apparently ventured across the B.C. border to wager approximately $157,000 on the most recent Kentucky Derby at Washington State Raceway.

I have some information on the taxes involved. These, of course, vary from province to province but essentially for every dollar that is bet, 80 cents is returned as winnings to the bettors; then .122 per cent goes to the tracks and the horse owners, in trust for the horses—and they take their winnings in oats and hay—.07 per cent goes to the provincial governments and .008 per cent goes to the federal government.

So, the intention of this legislation, as Senator Nurgitz has pointed out, is to enable Canadians to bet in Canada on horse races run outside of Canada. The representations made are that, leaving aside the question of whether any gambling is legitimate, that betting should be done through the pari-mutuel system instead of going through bookmakers or going outside the country. The result is that the moneys will stay in Canada, will be to the benefit of the Canadian horse racing industry, and the Canadian taxpayer, insofar as the Canadian taxpayer does share in the amount that is wagered.

That principle of the legislation—again having accepted the fact that we are not here to debate whether pari-mutuel betting or public involvement in gambling is desirable or not—is worthy and ought to be supported.

Because I do not want to spend any time talking about some aspects of the legislation that might bear some scrutiny, both as to effectiveness and as to statistical background, I believe the bill should be referred for routine study to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I suggest that that is the proper committee because the legislation does amend the Criminal Code of Canada. Some might suggest that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry because the Department of Agriculture supervises track betting in Canada.

My suggestion, honourable senators, is that we support the principle of this bill on second reading and refer the legislation to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for study and report.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, in agreeing with Senator Frith's suggestion, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

INCOME TAX ACT TAX COURT OF CANADA ACT BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, for the second reading of the Bill C-72, intituled: "An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to make a related amendment to the Tax Court of Canada Act".—(Honourable Senator Barrow).

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Nurgitz for his clear and able presentation of Bill C-72. Although the bill itself is voluminous, consisting of some 239 pages, the amendments are, as he has stated, mainly concerned with making changes to clarify wording and are of a simplifying and relieving nature. Others correct some inaccuracies. Indeed, the bill devotes some 60 pages to making the terminology in both official languages consistent.

One of the most important changes concerns the provision relating to relieving the taxpayer from paying the extra tax levied upon reassessment until the time for appeal has either elapsed or the taxpayer has appealed and the case has been settled, thus eliminating a hardship on some taxpayers when reassessments have been proven to be wrong.

There are other changes affecting non-residents, administration, loss-carry-overs, deemed disposition of capital property on the death of a taxpayer, bad debts, depreciable property, interest, death benefits, moving expenses, life insurance loans, donations, medical expenses, dependents and the elimination of trusts set up to double the principal residence exemption. Many of the changes are as a result of complaints by taxpayers, and the government is to be commended for the action it has taken. However, it might be advisable to have officials from the Department of National Revenue or from the government give an explanation. Therefore, if the mover of the bill should agree to refer it to committee, I would be pleased to support his motion.

• (1430)

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

SUPPORT AND GOVERNMENT POLICY—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marsden calling the attention of the Senate to the importance of research and development in every province and territory and the need for caution and sensitivity in the realignments of support, and of policy by government, which relates to research and development.—(Honourable Senator Marsden).

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, when we launched this inquiry last April before the federal budget came down, I argued that the issues of research and development in this country were among the most important of the day and that they required a sense of direction and purpose on the part of any national government. We have had the budget and a number of moves and initiatives by the honourable gentleman in the other place who is referred to in the research community, unfortunately, as the thirty-ninth minister. We still have no sense of direction as to where the government is going in terms of research and development. Yet, we are facing an even more uncertain and revised future now, because of the new initiatives in terms of trade agreements, than we were even last April. Our country has one foot in the modern world and the other foot firmly rooted in the past in terms of research and development.

I should like to say how much I appreciate the comments made by Senator Doody on this subject of research and development, and I am going to comment on the two major issues that he raised when he spoke after the budget had been launched. He argued that the attitude of this government toward privatization, or the importance of developing research in the private sector, was a crucial aspect of government initiative. Of course, it is an important aspect, but the role of the private sector in the development of research, basic and applied, in this country is not, historically, well substantiated, albeit with some exceptions. When and where have Canadian firms done basic research and applied that research in our country? Our strategy and our tradition has been to import technology and ideas and to apply those ideas, a strategy which Harold Innis expounded upon at great length. It seems to me that means that the role of the central government is absolutely crucial and needs to be more important in terms of development of basic research.

Our notable successes in this country, which have been significant in agriculture, in medicine—in the development of insulin, for example—in transportation, which has been crucial, and in communications, have been characteristically joint developments with universities and federal departments such as the Department of Agriculture and through the impetus provided by funding through the basic research councils of this country which have been such an important part of our past and our tradition and are still so today.

I argue that we need more, not less, support for joint developments and joint initiatives in this area. And, of course, Canada is not unique in that regard. In the United States, for example, it is really the military development that provides the lead in the spin-offs which come to the private sector of that country in terms of the development of research and technology. It organizes; it demands; it spurs initiatives.

We—and, in my opinion, very wisely so—do not have that particular impetus for research; but we do have other areas in which we can have the same kind of consequences which are important in the private sector, areas of initial joint ventures, if you like—and I mean that in the sense of ideas and not in the strict business sense—as between the public and private sectors.

Hence, I would argue that this government is wrong in placing so much emphasis on the private sector, and very wrong, indeed, in relying on it.

Mr. Diefenbaker, whose Avro Arrow experience should be a lesson to us all, is an example in this regard. It was pointed out in a recent article by Mr. W.A. Wilson that the development of the Arrow airframe and the Orenda engine was a “tremendous learning experience for Canadian industry, scientists and engineers, resulting in the acquisition of masses of new technologies.”

The article went on to say:

Diefenbaker never appreciated that and the present prime minister has little understanding that standing aside from research does not help a modern country remain competitive.

I agree with the comments of Mr. Wilson.

The second argument made by Senator Doody concerned the measures in the most recent budget to spur and lead on research and development—and I think, indeed, he made some very good and telling points in that regard. But there are two major problems, as analysts have been pointing out. First, the tax incentives for R&D in the most recent budget for hi-tech companies really are not, in the minds of most of those people who are directly involved, providing any effective help in small and medium-sized high technology companies; and a more recent survey carried out indicates that these companies are not hiring the graduates in those areas from our universities. In fact, that initiative does not seem to be, at least to this point in time, paying off.

And second, even though the government in this past budget got rid of the very controversial scientific research tax credit, it has not come up with a replacement incentive to attract private capital for R&D to these technology companies about which we are all so concerned.

So, while I think the intentions were good, the impact is very minor indeed. We need much more.

In addition to those measures, it seems to me that what is being badly neglected is the area of help for human resources. Capital to fund projects is of course important, and no firm can proceed without it; but no firm can proceed, either, without brain power.

When we talk about the need for research and development, that research and development is not only in the high technology area. We know there is a demand in this country, for example, for people working in electronics, in certain highly specialized areas. This government will need to pay far more attention in the Established Programs Financing, which is coming up for renegotiation, to the capacity of our universities and centres of learning to supply the labour demanded in order to create the kind of economic growth we are talking about. But it is not only in the area of high technology and the very advanced frontier areas of science that research and development needs to be carried out. When one in five Canadians cannot read and write to a sufficient level to permit them to work in our labour market, as the Special Senate Committee on Youth has been hearing in testimony, the education and training of our labour force is obviously an area that requires attention. We need research and development to resolve those problems of our labour force which are not in the areas of high technological advancement but rather in those areas of how we maintain an economy when a large part of our labour force can no longer participate in the kind of economy we are trying to build. That is a major issue for research and development in education, in labour market adjustment, and in related areas.

Those people who work in the implementation of new technology, whether on the shop floor, in offices, in hospitals or wherever, know that they cannot just throw new ideas, new machines and new technology at people. They know they have to redesign human organizations.

The Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada has launched initiatives to help schools of administrative studies examine the issues, but we still need to pay far more attention, in terms of research and development, to the structure of our organizations and the modernization of the work that humans do in all parts of this country, not just in the big cities and in the universities, but in the small towns and places where people are having to adjust to new ways of mining, fishing and organizing farming.

I should like to conclude by arguing that, although we have had a debate in this chamber and there is a debate in the country, there is no really significant priority placed upon what, to the minds of many of us, is the most crucial issue of the day. We need far more than analysis; we need a government viewpoint sensitive to this issue.

I was intrigued to see that Prime Minister Palme in Sweden, in constructing his new cabinet this week, has placed his highest priority on research and development. In Sweden, they have something called the "minister of the future"—a ministry that only a socialist government could imagine would have any kind of fixed content. Much more importantly, Prime Minister Palme has placed his Deputy Prime Minister, the number two person in his cabinet, in charge of research and development. It seems to me that that is a most appropriate priority and explains one of the significant differences between their country and ours—their economy with its low rate of unemployment, its low rate of inflation and its very high penetration of some new markets, export markets, and high-technology markets.

When Professor Gordon Laxer wrote his Ph.D. thesis at the University of Toronto on the question of why Canada did not become a fully-independent manufacturing country in 1913, along with Sweden, Germany and Japan, he put his finger on a classic dilemma of our country. The explanation of that, of course, was complex, but one part of it is the very low level of understanding and sophistication in the minds of people in this country about the importance of research and development, not as a highly specialized, esoteric area, but as a matter of concern for every employer, every student, every educator and everyone in the country. It continues to be a problem. The problem is a classic Canadian one.

In concluding this debate, I will continue to argue that it is necessary to mobilize the ideas of Canadians about this issue. We cannot shed this responsibility to an ill-defined interest in the private sector. We need priority to be given to the areas of research and development. We need talent to be focused upon this issue. We need brains to be on this agenda rather than banks.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate in the debate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY CONSULTATION PAPER ON TRAINING AND DOCUMENT ENTITLED "EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES: PREPARING CANADIANS FOR A BETTER FUTURE"—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cotteau:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to study and report upon the Consultation Paper on Training, issued by the Department of Employment and Immigration, tabled in the Senate on 11th December, 1984, and the document entitled "Employment Opportunities: Preparing Canadians for a Better Future", tabled at the First Ministers' Conference held in Regina, Saskatchewan, on 14th and 15th February, 1985; and

[Senator Marsden.]

That the Committee be empowered to engage the services of such professional, clerical and technical personnel as may be required for the purpose of the said examination.—(Honourable Senator Phillips).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, some of my colleagues have asked me about this order which deals with a motion that the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to study and report on the Consultation Paper on Training and a document entitled "Employment Opportunities: Preparing Canadians for a Better Future."

I have been told that this order has not been dealt with since May 8 last.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): It is not the only item.

Senator Frith: No, it is not, but many items have been dealt with since our return. I know that members on the opposite side have tried to do so, and so have we.

I should like now to flag it for attention in the hope that we can deal with it.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Senator Phillips is absent and will be for the next several days. I am sure he will be prepared to go ahead with it shortly after he returns. He has no great preoccupation with secrecy, so I am sure he will get on with it.

Senator Frith: We will get on with that subject, as you know, next week.

Senator Roblin: Can you say the same about the other one? Order stands.

CENSORSHIP

NATURE AND DANGER

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, October 3, 1985:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the nature of censorship and the danger it represents.

He said: Honourable senators, mankind has progressed in inverse proportion to the degree of prevailing censorship. The brightest lights of democratic thought through the ages have opposed censorship. The great British parliamentarian, Edmund Burke, in paraphrasing Voltaire, said that he despised what one of his opponents was saying, but he would defend to the death the right of that opponent to say it.

The point of such remarks is that we should protect, especially, those with whom we disagree, indeed, those who are most wrong or most at variance with the generally-held view.

John Stuart Mill, writing On Liberty, said that censorship is as noxious, or more noxious, when exerted in accordance with public opinion, than when in opposition to it. If all mankind minus one were of one opinion, and only one person were of the contrary opinion, mankind would be no more justified in silencing that one person, than he, if he had the power, would be justified in silencing mankind.

Honourable senators, I have another quotation by John Stuart Mill in which he said:

The peculiar evil of silencing the expression of an opinion is, that it is robbing the human race; posterity as well as the existing generation; those who dissent from the opinion, still more than those who hold it. If the opinion is right, they are deprived of the opportunity of exchanging error for truth: if wrong, they lose, what is almost as great a benefit, the clearer perception and livelier impression of truth, produced by its collision with error.

John Stuart Mill also said:

To refuse a hearing to an opinion, because they are sure that it is false, is to assume that their certainty is the same thing as absolute certainty. All silencing of discussion is an assumption of infallibility. Its condemnation may be allowed to rest on this common argument, not the worse for being common.

Yet again, I would quote the same author when he said:

—though the silenced opinion be an error, it may, and very commonly does, contain a portion of truth; and since the general or prevailing opinion on any subject is rarely or never the whole truth, it is only by the collision of adverse opinions that the remainder of the truth has any chance of being supplied.

● (1450)

He continues:

The worst offence of this kind which can be committed by a polemic is to stigmatise those who hold the contrary opinion as bad and immoral men. To calumny of this sort, those who hold any unpopular opinion are peculiarly exposed.

It is not just to call them bad or immoral, it is to call them defamatory; it is to call them irresponsible. We heard in the other place the Deputy Prime Minister accuse someone with whom he disagreed of being a racist. Mr. Nielsen had the good grace to retract, though not completely. We heard the Prime Minister, on Pierre Nadeau's show of September 4, make the same allusion, and I regret that he did not retract it.

Senator Flynn: Are you censoring them?

Senator Gigantès: I will paraphrase Voltaire and say—

Senator Flynn: You just said exactly the contrary.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Flynn, I lump you together with the Deputy Prime Minister and the Prime Minister and say that, if you disagree with me, I despise your view but defend to the death your right to proclaim it.

Senator Flynn: Ha, ha, ha.

Senator Gigantès: I will continue with John Stuart Mill.

Senator Flynn: Yes; resume.

Senator Gigantès: I shall. Thank you, senator. It is always extremely pleasant to have interruptions which cut the tedium of any presentation—

Senator Flynn: Yes, especially yours.

Senator Gigantès: —and bring discourse down to the level of Senator Flynn.

The disposition of mankind . . .

said John Stuart Mill,

. . . whether as rulers or as fellow-citizens, to impose their own opinions and inclinations as a rule of conduct on others, is so energetically supported by some of the best and by some of the worst feelings incident to human nature, that it is hardly kept under restraint by anything but want of power; and as the power is not declining, but growing, unless a strong barrier of moral conviction can be raised against the mischief, we must expect, in the present circumstance of the world, to see it increase.

I do not think that things have changed much since John Stuart Mill wrote. When we of the Senate disagree officially with an expression of opinion and decide to investigate it through one of our committees, it is no light matter. It is one part of the Parliament of Canada carrying out such an investigation. This sort of investigation is intimidating, and I would like to quote one of my ancestors. Sophocles, in Antigone, has Haemon, the son of Kreon, say:

The dread of thy frown forbids the citizen to speak such words as would offend thine ear.

Honourable senators, we should be particularly careful of the way in which we exercise any censorship through criticism of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the National Film Board. We have developed something very precious in this country. It may be a solution to a longstanding dilemma on the ownership of means of communication. Private ownership often has not worked very well. Sometimes it has, but sometimes it has not. It has given us such dreadful examples of yellow journalism as Midnight Express and a whole collection of papers in Britain. State ownership has been as bad, if not worse, because it has even been dull. Pravda is one of the world's dullest newspapers. Ownership by trade unions has produced dull lectures on the virtues of trade unionism and scurrilous front pages with half dressed women.

The problem of the ownership of the means of communication, especially in a small country, is a difficult one. We have gone a long way towards solving this problem happily in this country. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation systematically criticized the previous government, but it was allowed to continue. Oh, certainly, people complained, but it was allowed to continue. It is a remarkable achievement of restraint on the part of Canadian society that a group of its people on public salary may criticize the opinions of the majority, or at least of those in power. The National Film Board has done the same sort of thing. We must be very careful. This is a delicate sprout, this freedom of the press under government ownership. It is unique to Canada and to Great Britain. I reiterate that it is a great achievement which other countries do not have, and I believe that we should be very careful of it. As for the defamation of any of our national heroes—and here I refer to Billy Bishop—their reputations stand like giant statues. The criticism of one particular film is no more than a few pigeon droppings on such a reputation. I regret that we have decided to go into this matter further and I will say so in committee.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, under the pretext of drawing our attention to the dangers of censorship, Senator Gigantès has just given us a lecture concerning a Senate decision, and that is totally improper and unacceptable. In any event, it contradicts what he has just said. We are used to that kind of lecture. We are prepared to listen to his editorial comments practically every day. We admire his culture, but to be honest his lectures get very boring after a while.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I want to thank Senator Flynn for his extreme kindness and his politeness. He is always telling me how I should behave. I appreciate that. I have really missed my father ever since he died. He would be about the same age as Senator Flynn if he were still alive. He would be a great asset for my culture and behaviour if he were here. Fortunately I have Senator Flynn, and I thank him from the bottom of my heart. I have a very filial attachment to you. Thank you.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I would draw the senator's attention to the dangers inherent in giving lectures to others, not so much to the dangers of censorship.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Senator Marshall has asked me to inform honourable senators that the film on Billy Bishop entitled "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss" will be shown at 7 o'clock this evening, rather than at 8 o'clock, in Room 356-S.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, October 10, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Martial Asselin, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.

Prayers.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE WITHDRAWN

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I ask leave of the Senate to withdraw the motion standing in my name, of which I gave notice yesterday, that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit at 3.30 next Tuesday afternoon. It was represented to me that that hour was inconvenient for quite a number of our colleagues. Therefore, with the co-operation of the witness, Governor Bouey of the Bank of Canada, we have rescheduled the meeting for 11 a.m., Tuesday, October 15, 1985.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Sinclair: Is the chairman of the committee a fan of the Blue Jays? Is that the problem?

Senator Murray: The problem, as the Honourable Senator Sinclair probably knows, is that the Liberal caucus meets on Tuesday afternoons at 3.30—perhaps to watch the baseball game.

If I may, I will take a moment of the time of the Senate to say a word about the schedule of meetings of the committee next week. As I mentioned, at 11 o'clock on Tuesday morning we will hear from Mr. Bouey, the Governor of the Bank of Canada. On Wednesday afternoon at our usual time, 3.30 p.m., we will continue with our study of the green paper on the regulation of Canadian financial institutions. We will be hearing from the Trust Companies Association and from Royal Trust. At 8 o'clock Wednesday evening, we will resume the pre-study of the Canadian Commercial Bank Bill, C-79, and our witness will be Mr. Allan Taylor, the President of the Royal Bank. I would also ask members of the committee to be available for 9.30 a.m. Thursday morning against the possibility that we will have before us another witness to testify in respect of Bill C-79.

Motion withdrawn.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, October 15, 1985, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, could I make a suggestion to our friends opposite? Since Monday is a holiday, those of us who do not go home until Friday may find it rather inconvenient to return for 2 o'clock in the afternoon next Tuesday. I have a speaking engagement in Toronto, so I will not get home until Friday. I will have no services in my office in Halifax on Monday. It would be a great convenience if on this occasion the Senate could resume on Tuesday evening instead of Tuesday afternoon because I could then have the whole of Tuesday in my office. By that date it will have been eight days that I have not been in my office.

Senator Doody: I appreciate very much the honourable senator's concern and his problem, but if we get to a point where we have to try to accommodate individual senators and their office hours and the times that they are available to answer telephones and so on, we are going to have a very disorganized operation here. I certainly sympathize with the honourable gentleman and I understand exactly what he is saying, but at this point I do not think we can change the rules for the schedule of sitting at such short notice for an individual senator, no matter how deeply esteemed and dear to our collective hearts he is.

Motion agreed to.

THE HONOURABLE AZELLUS DENIS, P.C.

TRIBUTES ON FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF ELECTION TO PARLIAMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before Question Period, I would like to draw the attention of the Senate to an event that took place on October 14, 1935.

On that date, one of our colleagues, Senator Denis, was elected to Parliament for the first time. Next Monday, October 14, 1985, marks the fiftieth anniversary of his election as a Member of Parliament, and I could not let this occasion pass without mentioning it here.

As we all know, some short notes on his career published in the Canadian Parliamentary Guide mention that he served in the army as a major in the Second Reserve Battalion, Chateaugay Regiment.

He was elected to the House of Commons for the first time in the general election of 1935 and represented Canada at a number of international Commonwealth conferences. He was re-elected in 1940, 1945, 1949, 1953, 1957, 1958, 1962 and 1963.

He is truly invincible. He was sworn in as a Member of the Privy Council and appointed Postmaster General on April 22, 1963. He was appointed to the Senate on February 3, 1964. His political affiliation . . . is known, and, in concluding, as I said before, I would not want to let this occasion pass without saying a few words, and I wish to offer him our sincere congratulations.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, like all my colleagues, I am very happy to extend our cordial congratulations to our distinguished colleague, Senator Denis, on this happy occasion that crowns an unparalleled parliamentary career.

[English]

I am happy indeed to join with my honourable friend opposite as I know all members of the Senate are in this expression of congratulation to our colleague, Senator Denis, on this extraordinary occasion. Fifty years—good gracious—as a parliamentarian and politician certainly is a record that very few of us will be able to match although there might be some of us around here who will reach that significant anniversary.

It is a pleasure to recognize Senator Denis' distinguished contribution to public life and I know that all members of this chamber look forward to being his colleague for many, many years to come. I hope that on his sixtieth anniversary I may be here to congratulate him.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Later:]

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I was not present when honourable senators spoke kindly of me regarding my 50 years in public life. Unless I say a word, people might think I am dead. Honourable senators are lucky in that had I known they were going to comment on my years in parliamentary life, I would have prepared a one-hour speech to thank them for their kind remarks.

Being in public life for 50 years might seem like a long time, but having good friends on both sides of the chamber, as well as in the House of Commons, has made those years fly by. It has not been that long, after all. I thank you for thinking about me. I have spent many wonderful years with all of you.

It is nice to know that I have made friends from all over Canada. I did not know that a person who was born in the small parish of St.-Norbert, comté Berthier, in Quebec, could make friends with people from Newfoundland, Vancouver and even Ontario. It is good to think about that. It is a good souvenir that I will remember for all time.

At the same time, during those 50 years of public life I lost many good friends, either because they were defeated, or because they did not wish to run again, or because of some unpleasant circumstance. I lost Conservative as well as Liberal friends. I remember Grattan O'Leary and also Mr. Holowach, a member of the Social Credit Party in the other place. I am sorry about that but, after all, there are still many good friends who make life worth living.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

BANKING

CONFIDENCE IN SYSTEM

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It relates to a very important issue of which we are all aware, the stability of our banks. I would think that we in the Senate have certainly not attempted to create an atmosphere of panic.

I want to give the Leader of the Government in the Senate an opportunity to comment eventually on the remarks made by Mr. Claude Lanthier, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, during a radio interview earlier today.

Here is one question concerning the situation of the banking system in Canada: "Things are going very badly in the Canadian banking system, no?"

The answer was: "No, things are not that bad. It is the consequence of the citizens' new awareness of their banking institutions."

The next question was: "What do you mean?" And Mr. Lanthier replied: "Well, in the old days people used to say 'solid as a bank'. But they have come to realize that banks can collapse like other financial institutions. So the people recover and ponder over the situation. All the banks will tell you the same thing. All major banks, our large and solid banks had to answer questions from their clients. I think there is something sound about this awareness on the part of the people. People will realize that there are risks in everything, perhaps smaller risks in some institutions, but there are risks everywhere."

I point out to the Leader of the Government that I want to give him an opportunity to comment on this, because it will probably be reported in today's newspapers. But first perhaps you might take this opportunity to make a government statement about this atmosphere of risk and uncertainty.

• (1410)

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think that members of the Senate will appreciate as much as any group in the country, that confidence is of the essence in anything relating to financial institutions of any sort anywhere, and I am happy to say that over the years the Canadian banking system has received, indeed, has deserved to receive, the confidence of the people who have entrusted their money to those banks. That is not to say, as we already know only too well, that there are not problems and that certain banks under certain circumstances run into problems, because we have two such instances in front of us and there is no sense in ignoring that fact. I have no hesitation in expressing my sincere conviction that the Canadian banking system is a sound banking system, that it deserves the confidence that people place in it when they put their money in the banks, and I hope that that atmosphere of confidence will be reinforced by the steps that are being taken now to deal with the problems in the system.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators I have no further comment to make on the declaration made and the position taken by the Leader of the Government which, of course, we encourage in the hope that the situation that is presently before us regarding two of our banks is the end of the problem, although that problem itself needs substantial investigation. It is on that subject, the Leader of the Government will recall, that last night the Minister of State (Finance) and her advisers indicated that they would be giving me an answer to the questions I had asked in order to prepare ourselves for questioning her and others at our committee hearings on the pre-study.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK AND NORTHLAND BANK—
AVAILABILITY OF NAMES OF UNINSURED DEPOSITORS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): The Leader of the Government will also recall that I asked the Minister of State (Finance) about the question of the identification of the depositors. She was most forthright on the subject and said, as I recall it, that, when balancing the tradition of confidentiality against the right of the taxpayers to know to whom payments were being made, she felt that the tradition was more important. I ask the Leader of the Government if he will urge her to reconsider that question and try to persuade his colleagues that, before the Senate is asked to approve a payment by the taxpayers of amounts beyond the insured amounts, which is the purpose of this bill, the persons to whom the ex gratia payments are going to be made should be identified. We should not have to tell the taxpayers that we recommended the spending of up to $1 billion, and perhaps even more of their dollars, on repayments to what would amount to masked depositors whose names we do not know, saying that we only know their categories. Would he urge the Minister of State (Finance) to change that policy so that, when we actually have to pass this bill, we can explain to the taxpayers to whom the ex gratia payments were made?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my friend has put his finger on a very difficult and sensitive question. It is perfectly true, in my opinion, that there is room for differences of opinion as to what the right course to follow ought to be. The tradition in Canada has been to preserve this confidentiality and, although I am not a legal expert and may be incorrect in this, I think the Bank Act implies, at least, that this confidentiality exists.

This is a unique situation which was probably not contemplated when the Bank Act was written, and that is the reason I think there is room for a legitimate difference of opinion as to the course that ought to be followed.

I believe the minister made it clear last night that she was willing to give the committee a considerable amount of information as to who was involved by means of breaking it down, not only in terms of the nature of the organizations which are being covered, but also in terms of their geographic location. So, there would be some information. Even the geographic location aspect of the matter will require interpretation, I suspect, because, while an organization might be located outside the country, for example, its investment in Canada might be for Canadian purposes. It is obvious that there are a number of complications here.

The minister's conclusion last night was that, on balance, with all things considered, she would be inclined to hold her ground on that position. However, I should observe that the matter is before an inquiry which will be held by Mr. Justice Estey, and it may very well be that he will have a different view of the matter, in which case the situation will have to be reviewed in light of those circumstances.

I do not think I can go beyond the minister's statement at the present time.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—BAD LOANS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on the same general subject, the Hitchman report has now become a public document, as the minister described it last night in her evidence before the committee. That report has a great deal to say about the CCB loans and describes many of them as worthless, or very bad loans.

I ask the Leader of the Government if there is any hope that we will get a list of those bad loans.

• (1420)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): This, too, is a matter which is before the Estey commission. I would expect that the question as to publication of the loans will be adjudicated on by Mr. Justice Estey. I have no information at the present time as to whether or not there is any real bar to disclosing those names, but I would not like to comment on that because I am not ready to deal with it.

I think that all of those matters, since they are being inquired into by the Estey commission, will be covered in an authoritative statement by Mr. Justice Estey.

Senator Frith: The Leader of the Government will, I am sure, recognize—I hope he does—that his answers regarding the Estey commission would be quite relevant and apropos if we had any hope that the commission would report before we are asked to pass the legislation involving the spending of the taxpayers' money. But Mr. Justice Estey, of course, does not have to do that.

If we can have the Estey report before we are asked to pass this bill, then I think the answers are quite satisfactory.

Senator Roblin: I remind my honourable friend that we have a committee of the Senate which has been meeting to discuss these matters. If he wants to debate the issues, that is a good forum in which to do so.

Senator Frith: That does not really answer my concerns, because I asked for that information at a meeting of that committee and was told that the Estey commission has it. When I asked about the loans, I was told that the Estey commission has that information also. Those are good answers, if we are not going to be asked to pass the bill until we receive that information.

If we are not going to receive answers from the Estey commission before we pass the legislation, then we should get them in the committee. I agree with that, but the trouble is that when that information is asked for at a meeting of the committee, we are told to wait for the Estey commission.

Senator Roblin: The government intends to proceed with Bill C-79—which I think we are starting to debate now, and I do not wish to do that—as fast as it can. What the Senate does with the bill when it receives it is its own business.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK AND NORTHLAND BANK— REPLIES TO QUESTIONS

Hon. H. A. Olson: I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. There is a troubling aspect to the replies that have been given by the Leader. It seems to me that he has been attempting to put the qualifications of the Estey commission above the capability of the Senate to ask for certain information. I certainly hope he is not implying that somehow the Estey commission can get that information, but the Senate must wait until the commission receives it and that we cannot ask for that information directly.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I hope that my honourable friend does not have that view of my position. My position is that the committee of this house can do as it darn well pleases in respect of this matter, regardless of what is going on in the Estey commission.

Senator Frith: Will the government co-operate?

Senator Olson: I agree, but why do the answers to the questions asked previously depend on whether or not the Estey commission receives a certain document or certain information that is relevant to the reference made to the committee?

Senator Roblin: I agree that the committee can do what it likes about this matter. The Estey commission is the third ring in the circus and is quite independent of the Senate, just as the Senate is quite independent of it, in a sense.

PAYMENTS TO UNINSURED DEPOSITORS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question to those asked by Senator Frith. Can the Leader of the Government say whether the payments to the many uninsured depositors of the two banks that failed recently in western Canada is a precedent for payments to other uninsured depositors should any other Canadian banks go bankrupt?

[Senator Roblin.]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the minister dealt with that question in her appearance before the committee last night.

Senator Haidasz: I have a further supplementary question. Has the federal government decided that the ex gratia payments to the uninsured depositors of those failed banks will be a taxable item for income tax purposes?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, if my honourable friend wishes to get answers to those questions, if he attends the committee we will be glad to furnish them.

Senator Haidasz: As a further supplementary question, will the Canadian taxpayers, who will be footing the bill for uninsured depositors, be able to deduct such amounts as they are required to pay as a loss, for income tax purposes, because of the huge amounts that we are giving to the uninsured depositors?

Senator Frith: Or as a charitable donation.

Senator Roblin: I think the Canadian taxpayer in this respect will be on all fours with his position with respect to Canadair and the $1.2 billion that was provided to support that company.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—EFFECT ON HARVEST OF ADVERSE CLIMATIC CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to pose a question to the Leader of the Government arising out of the serious, severe and deteriorating condition of the harvest in western Canada, because of snow storms and other climatic conditions that obviously have delayed that harvest, perhaps, in some cases, until the spring.

The other day he agreed—and I appreciate the fact that he did—that he would resubmit the question concerning the assistance program that the federal government will be bringing forward. Certainly the reply indicated that it was dependent on the harvest being completed before an assessment could be made of the situation. Since then the harvest has deteriorated further because of the snow storms. The Leader of the Government may not have the details today, but can he give us any information about the assistance program that will be put into effect? Can he give us a date on or before which the government intends to make the announcement? I sincerely hope that he can do that today. After all, today is October 10 and it will be October 15 before we come back to Parliament after the weekend. Some of those people would like to know if there is to be a program of any substance or not.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): This question was raised with his usual force and eloquence by Honourable Senator Argue yesterday and I must give the same answer that I gave him: I expect that an announcement will be made soon.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, may I do what opposition members usually do, and ask for an interpretation of "soon"?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend, Senator Argue, got an interpretation of "soon" yesterday. I commend you to my friend.

UNESCO

GENERAL CONFERENCE, SOFIA, BULGARIA—COMPOSITION OF CANADIAN DELEGATION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, my question, of course, is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I hold in my hand a communiqué from the Canadian Commission for UNESCO dated October 8, 1985, and if I may I will very briefly quote from that communiqué:

The newly appointed Canadian delegation to the UNESCO General Conference, to be held this year in Sofia, Bulgaria, October 8 to November 12, will face the greatest challenge of any Canadian delegation in the 40-year history of the world body, according to Dr. James M. Harrison of Ottawa, president of the Canadian Commission for UNESCO.

Honourable senators, when I turn to page 2, I notice that, out of the 21-member delegation, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has appointed four members of the House of Commons, namely Gabriel Desjardins, Louis Plamondon, Benno Friesen and Jean-Luc Joncas. I have, of course, no objection to the appointment of members of the other place to such a delegation. However, why is it that this is very much a one-party group of members of Parliament? Also, why is it that the names of no senators, male or female, appear on this list? I would like to know whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs has considered naming at least one member of the Senate to participate in that conference. I do not really care whether that senator is Tory or Liberal, but I think it is important to have a member of this house at that conference in order that he can report back to us, because the very future of UNESCO is involved. The government has pledged to make known publicly its decision with respect to UNESCO before December 31 of this year.

I draw this matter to the attention of the government leader and, indeed, to all members of the Senate because I think that, in a certain way, this house has been slighted by the manner in which the delegation has been chosen.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am sure there has been no intention to slight the Senate. It is true that the delegation will be going to Sofia for several days later on this year and that a good deal depends on the reforms that will be approved or announced at that time. However, I will take my friend's question as notice.

THE SENATE

COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP OF CABINET MINISTERS IN THE SENATE

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, as was my question yesterday, my question today is directed to the chairman of the Standing Rules and Orders Committee. It is inspired by the adoption yesterday of new rules in the House of Commons which emphasize the independence of committees in that house. I will be a little lengthy in my preamble but, as I will be quoting with approval certain speeches of Senator Flynn and Senator Roblin, I am sure that senators on the other side of the house will bear with me. I promise that there will be a question at the end.

This question concerns the matter of cabinet ministers serving on committees. Back in 1980, the government proposed that Senator Argue and Mr. Roberts, both cabinet ministers, serve as members on the Joint Committee on the Constitution. At that time there was the following exchange in the Senate:

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, is there any precedent for a cabinet minister sitting on a committee like this?

Senator Frith: I believe, honourable senators, there are many precedents, and I would be glad to table a list of precedents for the presence of cabinet ministers on committees.

I might say that two years later I brought this question up in connection with Senator Austin's continuing membership of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, and at that time an opinion was obtained from Mr. du Plessis, the Parliamentary Law Clerk, which pointed out that under our rules there was nothing wrong with cabinet ministers being members of a committee, and appended to that opinion was a list of cabinet ministers who had actually been members of Senate committees. The latest one was Senator McCutcheon, back in 1962 and 1963; before that was Senator MacKinnon, in 1949-1950; and prior to that, Senator Meighen, from 1932 to 1935.

Insofar as the House of Commons is concerned, there has been no cabinet minister on a committee since Mr. King's day in 1948.

Going back to the proceedings in 1980, Senator Flynn intervened with the following remark:

Honourable senators, I would join with Senator Godfrey's remarks regarding Senator Argue's being on the committee. He is a minister of the Crown and, as such, he is bound by cabinet solidarity. He is in no position to voice any independent opinion. I am appalled at the suggestion that he be a member of the committee.

And he made the same statement again. Senator Perrault was asked about this when he was government leader in the Senate, and he said:

Honourable senators, all of the Senate members who participate in those committee activities will be operating according to conscience.

And that brought forth a speech from Senator Roblin in which he said:

I am completely at a loss to understand the explanation of the leader of the house that that honourable gentleman will operate according to his conscience.

I am sorry to say that that is not the rule in connection with members of the cabinet. I am sure they have consciences. I have been a member of cabinet on occasion and I guess I had a conscience, but I knew perfectly well that cabinet solidarity came first, because, if at any time my conscience could not stand what the rest of the cabinet proposed to do, I had an easy remedy, and that was to resign.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I think your preamble has gone on much too long. You should be ready to put your question.

Senator Godfrey: I could speak to this matter by way of a notice of motion. To do so in this fashion I thought to be a demonstration of the flexibility of the rules of the Senate. I will not be much longer.

Getting back to Senator Roblin's remarks, he went on to say:

But until such time as resignation took place, I was bound by convention and by all the traditions of Parliament to observe the principle of cabinet solidarity.

And I will not go on.

Senator Roblin, as the Leader of the Government in the Senate, is a member of the cabinet, and I must say that he has behaved impeccably, as far as I am concerned. He has not intervened in any committees. Certainly he may attend a committee meeting in person, as he did last night. At the committee last evening he sat and listened to the proceedings and then, at 10.25 p.m., made one of the most valuable suggestions of the evening, that being that we adjourn at that point.

However, the principle remains. Former Leaders of the Government in the Senate—and I am referring specifically to my friend Senator Olson—had a different concept. Senator Olson felt that, as a cabinet minister and Leader of the Government in the Senate, it was his duty to attend committee meetings for the purpose of putting the position of the government to the committee, and even to try to persuade the committee not to go into certain matters.

As well, I am thinking of the future in raising this matter.

I now come to my question. Finally, my question!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Godfrey: My question to Senator Molgat is: Would you have your committee look into the question of whether or not senators who are cabinet ministers, including the Leader of the Government in the Senate, should be members of Senate committees?

Senator Marshall: A short answer: Yes or no.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: I would be delighted to put the matter before the committee. The answer is: Yes.

[Senator Godfrey.]

BANKING

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK AND NORTHLAND BANK— DELAY IN INSTITUTING INQUIRY

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

On March 14 last, the Canadian Commercial Bank approached the government, telling the government that it was in trouble. On March 25, 1985, a bailout was arranged. On May 22, two months later, the Honourable Barbara McDougall, Minister of State (Finance), met with Mr. Hitchman, whose report made the headlines today, and asked if he would become a CCB director. He refused, saying that he did not know enough about the bank's operations or assets. It was not until a month later, on June 22, that the Honourable Minister of State (Finance) asked Mr. Hitchman to look into those assets and to make a report.

● (1440)

Could the Leader of the Government tell us the reason for this delay from March to June? Why, after a bank informs the government that it is in trouble, does it take three months to appoint someone to look at the real situation?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am pleased that my honourable friend is taking an interest in this fascinating topic. I suggest that, if he attends the meetings of the committee, he may pose his questions and get the answers he seeks.

[Later:]

Senator Gigantès: I beg the indulgence of honourable senators. As they are aware, I am still new in this venerable chamber, where others have been sitting much longer than I. Am I to understand, from the answer I received earlier from the Leader of the Government, that when an issue is before a committee of the Senate, questions on that issue are foreclosed on the floor of the Senate?

Senator Roblin: I do not think that any matter is foreclosed on the floor of the Senate. I am merely trying to be helpful to my honourable friend by telling him where he can get the best answers.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—EFFECT ON HARVEST OF ADVERSE CLIMATIC CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, a few moments ago the Leader of the Government said that I could rely on the same interpretation of "soon" as Senator Argue did yesterday. I checked the Hansard of yesterday and I see that Senator Roblin said:

My honourable friend can make whatever assumptions he likes about "soon".

There is no interpretation to be taken from that, I suppose, so I ask the government leader—and I ask this very seriously—if he can tell us when these people, who are desperately in need of knowing what the government will do, can expect that information. Perhaps he could be a little more specific than simply saying "soon".

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): This question has arisen on a number of occasions. From the very beginning, I have undertaken to urge my colleagues to come to as speedy a determination of this matter as is possible. My honourable friend will probably be aware that the report of the special committee that has been looking into this problem has been rendered to the government in the last day or so. I expect that he will have an answer—again I have to say "soon". It is quite impossible for me to specify it more closely than that.

MULTICULTURALISM

MINISTER'S COMMUNIQUÉ—DISPARITY BETWEEN FRENCH AND ENGLISH VERSIONS

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have here a communiqué dated October 4, 1985, released under the authority of the Minister of State for Multiculturalism with the following heading:

M. Jelinek félicite le président et le vice-président du comité mixte pour le multiculturalisme.

The expressions "comité mixte" and "comité parlementaire mixte pour le multiculturalisme" appear in three different paragraphs throughout this communiqué.

First, I wondered what sort of animal this could be. Had the Senate agreed with the House of Commons to set up a joint committee? Had we been asked by the House of Commons to participate in such a committee? Then I compared the French version to the English text, and I realized that the latter mentioned not a joint committee on multiculturalism, but the "Standing Committee on Multiculturalism".

It is not really a serious matter, but somebody here is taking the Senate for a ride. Is the Senate involved in a joint committee or not? The right hand should know what the left hand is doing so that they both agree on sending out the same message to the press, in order to avoid any confusion.

I make this comment by way of a question to the government leader, that he may ask the responsible minister to make sure from now on that the message of both versions is the same. That such a joint committee might be set up eventually, it is all right with me, but for the time being, it just does not exist, as far as I know.

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): In response to the question posed by my honourable friend, may I say I agree with him.

JUSTICE

CANADA COMMISSION OF INQUIRY ON WAR CRIMINALS— DESTROYED FILES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the startling revelation yesterday at the Deschênes Commission of Inquiry that files of the Department of Employment and Immigration were destroyed in 1982, at a time when the federal government was beginning its investigation into the possibility that Nazi criminals are residing in Canada, can the Leader of the Government tell us whether the present Minister of Justice or the Solicitor General of this government have begun any action to find out why these files were destroyed?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice.

BANKING

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—COMMITTEE STUDY— REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, the Minister of State for Finance appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce last evening, October 9, 1985. On that occasion, I put to her a question as to how much capital would have been required to inject into the Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank in order to make the two financial institutions viable as opposed to liquidating them. She took the question as notice. Because we do not know when the minister might next appear before the committee, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate undertake to provide that answer on the floor of the house?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I really do not think that I should undertake to do this. The committee is seized of the matter. I think that, as a matter of courtesy, I ought to allow the committee to proceed with its business. After that committee has finished its inquiry and has reported, if there is to be further discussion of the matter, let it take place then.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. Joan Neiman, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, October 10, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

FOURTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-77: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code (pari-mutuel betting)", has, in obedience to the order of reference of

Wednesday, October 9, 1985, examined the said Bill and now reports the same with the following amendment:

Page 3, Subclause 1(7): Strike out lines 26 to 32 and substitute the following:

"(c) prescribing the maximum percentage that may be deducted and retained pursuant to subsection (6) by or on behalf of a person or association operating a pari-mutuel system of betting in respect of a horse race in accordance with this section and providing for the determination of the percentage that each such person or association may deduct and retain; and"

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN B. NEIMAN
Chairman

● (1450)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Neiman: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, thank you for agreeing to consider the report now. You will recall that Bill C-77 was given second reading yesterday afternoon, the motion for second reading being moved by Senator Nurgitz. As he pointed out in his brief speech, it received speedy consideration in the other place and was sent to us immediately because there appears to be considerable pressure to have the bill receive Royal Assent within a reasonably short period of time for reasons that are apparent in the bill.

The bill amends the Criminal Code to permit betting at Canadian race tracks on certain stipulated races at what we might call foreign tracks. Although certain matters dealt with in the bill are under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture, because it is responsible for administering race tracks, the bill itself actually contains amendments to the Criminal Code. We had little problem approving the general thrust of the bill. Certainly everybody in the racing fraternity is anxious to have this amendment made.

When we considered the bill this morning in committee I had one problem with it. That was because in clause 1, paragraph 1, it permits the Minister of Agriculture or a person designated by him to determine the foreign race tracks on which there will be separate pool betting. The particular aspect of that which was of some concern to me was that, although we were shown a draft schedule to the Criminal Code that contains the proposed regulations following from these clauses that are in the bill, what I consider a substantive provision was the permission which is given to the Minister of Agriculture and which apparently can be delegated by him to someone in his department to determine the actual number of foreign races on which bets can be placed. In other words, although it is specified in these regulations, as it would seem they will now be passed, that the maximum number of races which can be bet on within any one association is 40, the minister or his delegated official will have the opportunity to vary this number and perhaps increase it indefinitely if he so desires. That is because this number is set out only in the regulations. There are very practical reasons why this probably will never happen, but I was somewhat concerned that this was the kind of delegated authority which should be circumscribed to some extent or set out a little more clearly within the body of the Criminal Code and not simply left to regulations.

However, it is probably a question that the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments can examine at a future date.

The amendment is really a housekeeping one that was overlooked in the other place. They had intended to make the amendment as the bill was being considered there, but it went through with such dispatch that they forgot about it. We have been good enough to agree to making the amendment here. The amendment was proposed by Senator Nurgitz in committee this morning and it really changes the wording of only one subclause to insert a couple of words for greater certainty and to make it conform to the regulations that now pertain to this particular kind of activity.

I am satisfied with the bill as amended, and I would recommend its passage.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill, as amended, be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, October 15, 1985, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, October 15, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Martial Asselin, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.

Prayers.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—CONCURRENCE BY COMMONS IN SENATE AMENDMENT

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that they had agreed to the amendment made by the Senate to Bill C-77, to amend the Criminal Code (pari-mutuel betting).

CONDOMINIUM ORDINANCE VALIDATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-73, to validate certain ordinances of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

BANKING

MERCANTILE BANK—POSSIBILITY OF MERGER—GOVERNMENT INVOLVEMENT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we have been told over the weekend by the senior officials of the Mercantile Bank that an effort is being made to bring about a merger. I wonder if the Leader of the Government is in a position to give us any information on whether the Inspector General of Banks, or officials of the Department of Finance, or the ministers of finance have been involved in these discussions recently.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is true that there have been newspaper reports on this subject. However, I think it would be unwise for me to comment on the reports or to try to enlarge on the area of discussion until the situation is a little clearer.

Senator MacEachen: Can the Leader of the Government tell us whether Citibank has sought authority or co-operation from the Government of Canada to conclude a merger with the Mercantile Bank?

Senator Roblin: I can report to my honourable friend that, in the committee this morning, the Governor of the Bank of Canada gave a very strong assurance that the Mercantile Bank was a solid bank and that there is no problem of that kind in connection with it.

As I said on another famous occasion, I hope that information is correct, but as far as the inquiry that my honourable friend has made is concerned, I think that is a matter on which I should not comment at the present time.

Senator MacEachen: I will leave it to the Leader of the Government in the Senate to decide what he thinks it is possible to let us know about the matter. However, at some point we will be asking him to tell us whether Citibank has made a request and has sought the co-operation of the Government of Canada to merge with the Mercantile Bank; whether the Government of Canada has offered its co-operation or whether it has withheld that co-operation and, if so, for what reasons.

Senator Roblin: I understand my honourable friend's question and I am glad that he has given me a little leeway before I have to give him the information that he seeks.

STATUS OF WOMEN

ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL—RESTRICTION OF SPOUSES' ACTIVITIES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could enlighten us on a matter which is not new. A letter was written by the Minister of National Defence on March 28, 1985, concerning the activity of a group of women on armed forces bases in Alberta. In that letter the minister denied a group of military wives the right to meet to discuss such things as the placing of a traffic light, a dental care plan and other social issues. In that letter, the minister referred, apparently, to the Queen's Regulations and Orders Article 19.44. I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could explain the position of the government and of the Minister of National Defence on this matter.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend is right. This matter has been the subject of some comment, both in public and in Parliament. I can tell my honourable friend that the Minister of National Defence is reviewing the situation to see what his recommendations should be. I do not believe his consideration has been completed as yet.

Senator Marsden: Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate would comment on the extent of the authority of this regulation. For example, if husbands of members of the armed forces were meeting to discuss similar matters, would that regulation also apply to them?

Senator Roblin: I think I can make my honourable friend happy by telling her that those are precisely the considerations before the minister now.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—EFFECT ON HARVEST OF ADVERSE CLIMATIC CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I can ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate essentially the same question I asked last week and the week before, that is whether the government has decided on a program of assistance, first, to those farmers in western Canada who have been struck by the drought, and now, perhaps, to some others who are in an equally difficult position because of the effect on harvesting of adverse weather conditions.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I can tell my honourable friend that there are indeed two problems now. One has to do with the drought and the other has to do with the recent unseasonable snowfall in western Canada. There may, in fact, be others as well.

The Minister of Agriculture dealt with this question in the other place the other day and I am glad to tell my honourable friend that, as I reported to him last week, the matter is receiving urgent consideration. I expect an answer within a few days.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I take it, then, that the government has changed its thinking on the time element. In other words, they are no longer awaiting the completion of the harvest before taking a decision on the action to be taken. Is it now their intention to go ahead and announce a program before the harvest is completed?

Senator Roblin: I am sure you see the difficulty the government is in. If it had produced a plan before the snowfall of last week, such a plan would probably have been quite different from that which the government must now produce because events have changed.

My honourable friend also knows that in connection with crop insurance, at least in my province, we do not go out to assess these matters and deal with them until November 15, so the time element must be considered in connection with this matter.

I think the government stand will be that we will bring forth our proposal at the earliest possible practical moment.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Olson: I understand and appreciate my honourable friend's position, but I must remind him that a few days ago he said that the announcement of the government's program would need to await the completion of the harvest. I am asking him now—and he answered the question in part, but not altogether: Will they now proceed with the development and, perhaps, the announcement of the program even in advance of the completion of the harvest?

Senator Roblin: This point, obviously, interests my friend. When I made my statement, I was talking about the drought, in which case it was applicable. But now, of course, the situation has changed in that we have this additional problem of snow on the crop and we know perfectly well that some of it may not be harvested until next spring. Therefore, it is, obviously, no longer appropriate to stick to that timetable. We have to be pragmatic and respond to changing situations, and that is precisely what we are going to do.

Senator Olson: I have to remind my honourable friend that the appropriateness of the announcement at the time it was made was in question, as far as I was concerned, because, in case he, the Minister of Agriculture or the officials have not yet noticed, a large number of farmers in western Canada have crop insurance coming. There is no question about that, but some small amounts of harvesting are left to be done, and if the rules are going to be such that they cannot complete the assessment so that a payment can be made under the Crop Insurance Program until the very last bit of harvesting is done—knowing full well that it is under a snow drift now—I think that is extremely unfair. I am trying to get the minister to tell us that they are going to go ahead with that, but he continues to try to set up artificial barriers to completing the assessment. I know, if you take an unqualified position that you are not going to pay any crop insurance until the harvesting is done, several thousand farmers are going to have to wait until next spring; yet, the amounts involved are insignificant.

That is really all I am trying to get from the minister. I do not understand why he does not give me a straightforward answer on that question.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I thought I had done so. I thought I had told my honourable friend that an announcement would be made in a very few days, which is obviously going to be before the harvest is completed. He cannot take yes for an answer.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend is having a little difficulty wriggling out of a situation he got himself into.

Senator Walker: Nonsense.

Senator Olson: What I want to have cleared up has to do with the fact that the instructions going out from the crop insurance people are to the effect that farmers should complete those assessments even in the areas where drought was a problem so that some of those farmers can get the money to which they are fully entitled after having paid for their crop insurance—notwithstanding a technicality that they could hang on and that harvesting has to be completed which, in some cases, will not be until next spring.

Senator Roblin: Now we are talking about another subject. We are talking about crop insurance.

Crop insurance, in my province, is administered by the Province of Manitoba, and it sets the timetable for examination of crops. At the present time, the date is November 15. That is out of my control.

With respect to these other matters, which are not in the crop control area, I have given my answer to my friend four times this afternoon. I do not mind doing it a fifth time, but it will be the last time.

Senator Olson: I take it that the honourable Leader of the Government is saying that there is going to be an announcement of the federal government's program to deal with these difficulties before harvesting of the crop is completed.

Senator Roblin: At last, the message got across.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Could the Leader of the Government tell us whether this announcement will deal exclusively with current conditions, or whether the announcement will also cover possible disasters of a similar nature in years to come?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has been a minister of the Crown and he knows perfectly well that it is not to be expected that he will get a partial answer to a question on which the government is going to give its definitive answer in due course. My friend will have to wait.

Senator Olson: The farmers have to wait, and that is not our fault.

CULTURAL HERITAGE AND NATIONAL IDENTITY

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, approximately three weeks ago I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate about the possible resurrection of the so-called Canadian edition of Time magazine. Comac Communications' proposal to purchase 75 per cent of Time Canada meets both the letter and the spirit of that part of the law. However, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate now confirm that Comac Communications' proposal simply does not meet the other legal requirement of 80 per cent Canadian content?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not aware that any proposal whatsoever in this field has been made to the government. However, in order to satisfy my honourable friend, I will make special inquiries to make sure I am right.

Senator Davey: I have a supplementary question. Three weeks ago the leader said that he knew that I would pursue this matter to the bitter end, and I intend to do just that. I am also sure that the leader will recall that on that occasion both of us spoke favourably of the then Minister of Communications and his commitment to Canadian cultural integrity. My question is: Who is now in charge, and what is that person's commitment to Canadian cultural integrity in general, and to the Canadian magazine industry in particular?

Senator Roblin: The Secretary of State is discharging those responsibilities now, and the policy of the government has not changed.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

SALE OF CANNED TUNA UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION— RESPONSIBILITY OF PROCESSOR'S PARENT COMPANY— GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. There have been two newspaper reports relating to the Star-Kist tuna affair, one in the Ottawa Citizen and the other in today's edition of the Globe and Mail.

To give honourable senators some background, the article in the Ottawa Citizen appears to praise the parent company of Star-Kist, the H. J. Heinz Company, for its dead silence on the question and its refusal to make any comment on the whole question of rotten tuna being foisted on the people of Canada, and says that was a good public relations policy because it stopped bad publicity leaking into the United States.

The second article appeared in this morning's edition of the Globe and Mail, and pointed out that one government inspector had finally broken the silence and said that there was evidence that the Star-Kist company, when the inspectors were coming, had switched lots of canned tuna so that they were inspecting good tuna when the lots for which they were substituted, in fact, contained bad tuna. If that is true, that was certainly an immoral, and, I am sure, an illegal act.

My question for the Leader of the Government is: Is the government prepared to take on the parent H. J. Heinz Company for this very blatant dereliction of its duty as a goods corporate citizen of Canada, and for this effort by an American company to—and I can put it no other way—pull the wool over the eyes of Canadians and to stonewall on what has happened and for its refusing to face up to its responsibility to do something about this serious situation?

Is the government prepared to pursue this matter and take on this large international corporation which, as appears from the press reports to which I have referred, seems not to be facing up to its responsibilities as a Canadian corporate citizen?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sure that any company wishing to do business in Canada will have to face up to its responsibilities as a good corporate citizen of Canada, regardless of where its foreign origin may be. That is a "given" between my honourable friend and me, I am sure.

The inspector whose name was referred to in the article this morning was not a government inspector, as I understand it, but an internal inspector of the company who was engaged in this process.

The answer to my honourable friend's question is quite clear: The minister who is now in charge of fisheries has instituted an investigation into the whole of the inspection process, both within the department and within the company, and when that investigation is concluded, we may have more information.

Senator Steuart: I have a supplementary question. If, in fact, the inspector is a company inspector, that makes the situation even worse.

Senator Roblin: Exactly.

Senator Steuart: Senator Roblin has just agreed by saying "exactly." It is a dereliction of duty on the part of this company by obviously pushing a bad product on to the Canadian market, and then on the part of a minister of the Crown for letting it happen. I think the first responsibility has to be borne by the company that allowed this questionable product on to the shelves. We now hear that the parent company, the Heinz company, is evidently prepared to let this company go down the drain and let Canada suffer the consequences because it accounts for such a small share of their cashflow and their corporate assets. In addition, it has put the whole tuna industry from coast to coast in jeopardy. My question is: Is the government prepared to make these people pay in any way for what has happened? I am sure there are all kinds of ways that they could accomplish that.

Senator Roblin: I believe that the first duty of the government is to establish what the facts are. While the newspaper report may be perfectly correct, it may also be inaccurate, so we do not know that. The government is trying to establish the facts. When those facts have been established, if there has been any infraction of Canadian laws or if people have behaved as a corporate structure in a way that cannot be condoned, it will be the subject of government review.

Senator Steuart: I have a further supplementary question. The minister referred to, and I quote him, "establishing the facts." Can we expect that the government will face the facts in a more honest manner than they have faced the facts in this whole mess so far? Will they really face the facts—

Senator Flynn: It would be easier to do that than to do what you do.

Senator Steuart: —or will there be a cover-up? You are not involved, Senator Flynn, in the cover-up, but you would do a good job if you had a chance.

Senator Flynn: You are speaking of honesty.

Senator Steuart: Will they face the facts better than they have done in the past? If your conscience bothers you, Senator Flynn, I do not blame you because if I were a Tory I would be wiggling too.

Senator Flynn: It is not a question of being a Tory, but a question of being honest.

Senator Steuart: Honest? You can't spell the word.

Senator Flynn: I certainly can. I can't see it on the other side where you are.

[Senator Roblin.]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order!

Senator Roblin: I have a hunch that my honourable friend, who is a man of experience with a temperate frame of mind, will really not wish to be recorded as one who has described the actions of the ministry as dishonest. He may think they are mistaken; he may think they are misguided; he may think they are ignorant. Those are all legitimate adjectives, but to say dishonest, I do not think so. The government will operate in the way that it does and always has done in an effort to be as candid and forthcoming on these issues as it possibly can be. It will continue to do that.

Senator Doody: Hear, hear. Good answer!

SALE AS PET FOOD OF CANNED TUNA UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a temperate question of a minister of the cabinet who is also the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Can he assure this house that the tainted tuna removed from the shelves of our grocery stores will not be approved by the Department of National Health and Welfare for sale to Canadians as pet food?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): It is not being recycled for human consumption. What is happening to it apart from that, I am not in a position to say, but I have no hesitation in saying that I will find out and let my honourable friend know.

SALE OF CANNED TUNA UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION—ALLEGED WRONGDOING IN INSPECTION PROCESS—SUGGESTED PROSECUTION

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate has said that the tuna is not being recycled. How can he reconcile that with the statement of Mr. Dugas who was a quality control officer of the company and who resigned because, according to his statement, he could not professionally tolerate the actions of the company? According to him, the company would substitute quality product for a lot that had been ordered held back until further inspection took place, and would then reverse the substitution and on the second inspection that lot would pass. If that procedure was adopted by a responsible Canadian firm, whatever the origin of the parent company, can the minister assure us that prosecution will take place as provided for under the present regulations?

● (1420)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think that the inspector in question will make a very good witness if the case comes to court.

SALE OF CANNED TUNA UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION—LABOUR UNION ACTION AT PROCESSING PLANT

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question which I direct to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In New Brunswick it has become common knowledge that some employees, of their own volition or otherwise, have appealed to the Labour Relations Board regarding the union that operates and has been operating in that plant. The Acting Minister of Fisheries has been talking about an inquiry into the entire question of the inspection of Canadian goods. That could be a very broad inquiry which could take a long time. Could the acting minister at this time assure the people of New Brunswick and of Canada that the first part of any such inquiry will be directed toward the subject matter to which I referred, so that the whole story can come out and so that some of the goings-on that have been reported from that plant can be made public?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I hope that I understand my honourable friend correctly. He wants us to get on with the question of looking into the inspection and the fisheries side of this thing as quickly as possible. If that is what he is asking us to do, I will certainly tell him that we will do our best.

Respecting the labour issue, it is quite a separate matter. I think my friend will find that that comes under the jurisdiction of the Government of New Brunswick rather than the federal government.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I am not aware that the application for decertification is a provincial matter. That whole subject matter seems to centre around the fact that the employees who have spearheaded the movement for decertification are part and parcel of the problem that existed at that plant. If one follows what has been reported as happening at that plant over the past year, one will find, as stated in the press reports by Mr. Dugas, at least, that all the employees who were members of that union and who depended on it to protect their jobs found that those jobs were in jeopardy when they refused the foreman's instructions to can and process bad fish. Therefore, while it is true that, technically or legally speaking, the Leader of the Government is right, I am saying that, if the inquiry is properly conducted and if it is carried out at once, it could reveal a lot of other things that happened at that plant. I feel that the people have a right to know.

Senator Roblin: I do not disagree with my honourable friend. I think that that is what I said.

THANKSGIVING

CROSS-CANADA AID TO DISTRESSED SASKATCHEWAN FARMERS

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, before proceeding to Orders of the Day, I wonder if I might have the indulgence of the Senate to refer to the red Delicious apple that I have in my hand.

Senator Roblin: Where is it from?

Senator Argue: It is from Osoyoos, British Columbia.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Argue: It is from a semi-trailer load of apples which was donated by the generous citizens of Osoyoos to the farmers and their families who are living in the drought area. This semi-trailer arrived at our little hamlet of Ormiston yesterday morning with 924 boxes, each weighing 44 pounds, of red Delicious apples. It was a very generous and welcome gesture.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Argue: My wife, Jean, has put together a farm women's action group. I thought that I was worked hard when I was in the cabinet, but she is working much harder than I have ever done. She is working almost day and night co-ordinating this group activity. When the huge semi-trailerload of apples arrived yesterday, about 30 people with half-tonne trucks picked them up to take them to some ten depots for distribution. Just about an hour after that semi-load was unloaded, driven as it was by a driver who had donated his time—his name is Larry Shippett—a half-tonne truck arrived, pulling a livestock trailer also loaded with vegetables. That was brought by Mr. and Mrs. Ed Wyonsyck of Buchanan, Saskatchewan. It was the second time that this good couple from Buchanan, Saskatchewan, some 300 miles away, have brought in a load of vegetables.

Clothing is also coming, and there have been calls, offers and donations from all over Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba and, yes, even as far away as Ontario and its capital. In my view, this sharing by those who have vegetables and fruit with those in the drought area who have no gardens, is a wonderful indication of the generous and humanitarian instincts of Canadians all across this country; and because of their action there has been a much better Thanksgiving for many farm families in that area of Saskatchewan. I want to acknowledge publicly the great help that has been forthcoming from many areas.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

CENTRE BLOCK—REMOVAL OF PHOTOGRAPHS OF BRITISH PRIME MINISTERS

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, for many years there has been a series of photographs of the Prime Ministers of Great Britain hung in the corridor on the sixth floor leading to the Parliamentary Restaurant. They are no longer there. Can the Leader of the Government tell me why they have been removed, whether they have been removed permanently or simply for the duration of redecoration, and whether they will be restored?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, those pictures of distinguished men have improved my education and whiled away the hours of waiting many times; so I know what my honourable friend is talking about. I am not sure whether this comes under the jurisdiction of the Speaker of the House of Commons, who is in charge of the fabric of the building, or the Minister of Public Works, but I will ask about it.

Senator Flynn: It could be joint services.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

SALE OF CANNED TUNA UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION— SUGGESTED PUBLIC INQUIRY

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, earlier the Leader of the Government again and again made reference to an inquiry into the matter of the spoiled tuna. I am sure that the government will want to get to the bottom of this matter for its own reasons, but it is very important that Canadian consumers have complete assurance with regard to what has gone on and to know that what has gone on, if it was bad, has been terminated. It is important both to the consumers and to the fishing industry on both coasts. Has there been a decision to go ahead with some form of public inquiry with a commissioner, or is that possibility still in abeyance? Is the prospect of a public inquiry still under consideration?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this question of the future of the tuna industry and all of its ramifications was raised the other day by the Honourable Senator McElman, and at that time I undertook to take note of his constructive suggestion. I reiterate that undertaking. At the present time the investigation is a departmental one.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, confidence is very important in this matter, and the experience in recent weeks in relation to the involvement of the minister and the people in the department has been such as to undermine the traditional confidence which both consumers and fishermen have had in that operation. I am not pressing for an outside inquiry; rather I am asking whether the prospect of an outside inquiry is still a possibility.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, in the opinion of the government, the inquiry that is under way right now will be adequate for the purpose. If it should prove not to be the case, we shall have to think again.

● (1430)

Senator Stewart: What reassurances will consumers, whose confidence has inevitably been shaken, have as to the validity of the findings of that inquiry?

Senator Roblin: When my honourable friend has an opportunity to look at the report that will be made, he will find the answer to his question.

Senator Frith: In other words, he will have to take your word for it.

[Senator Roblin.]

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, under the heading of "Delayed Answers": At a meeting of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee when, I believe, my friend the Leader of the Government was present, I asked the Minister of State (Finance) and her officials whether I was going to get my information to help me do my job, as I see it, in that committee. She said that they had the information, that the whole matter was under review and that she expected to have the material for me shortly. We have always had trouble with such words as "shortly", "in due course" and "soon", and I say "we" in the sense of those of us who are looking at the matter from another perspective. Will the leader please ask again for this material, because I got the distinct impression that it was almost ready.

Senator Marshall: You will get it "shortly."

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I shall ask the minister to take a close look at the meaning of the words "shortly" and "soon" in order to satisfy my friend.

Senator Frith: Good, because I will be asking every day until I get it.

Senator Roblin: I have told the minister that already but I am still having a little trouble.

Senator Doody: It is still "almost ready."

Senator Frith: If she has been told, then I will make a point of asking every day.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ORDER NO. 3 AND INQUIRY NO. 2 WITHDRAWN

On Orders of the Day:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Order No. 3 and Inquiry No. 2 deal with the subjects covered in Order No. 1. I have discussed with Senator Bosa, in whose name Order No. 3 stands, and with Senator Gigantès, in whose name Inquiry No. 2 stands, withdrawing these two items, because the subjects can be spoken to by whoever wishes to speak to them under Order No. 1, which was initiated by Senator Flynn as co-chairman of the special joint committee mentioned in the order. They have agreed to my suggestion, so, with leave, I would ask that those two items be withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order No. 3 and Inquiry No. 2 withdrawn.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY CONSULTATION PAPER ON TRAINING AND DOCUMENT ENTITLED "EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES: PREPARING CANADIANS FOR A BETTER FUTURE"—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtreau:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to study and report upon the Consultation Paper on Training, issued by the Department of Employment and Immigration, tabled in the Senate on 11th December, 1984, and the document entitled "Employment Opportunities: Preparing Canadians for a Better Future", tabled at the First Ministers' Conference held in Regina, Saskatchewan, on 14th and 15th February, 1985; and

That the Committee be empowered to engage the services of such professional, clerical and technical personnel as may be required for the purpose of the said examination—(Honourable Senator Phillips).

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I understand that last week, in my absence, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition was inquiring concerning my plans with regard to this order. I am happy to advise him that I plan to speak to it on Thursday. I trust that he will be able to retain some of his followers, including the sponsor of the motion, here on Thursday afternoon when I deal with it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): When they hear about it, I am sure that they will not miss it for anything.

Senator Doody: Seating will be a problem.

Order stands.

THE CABINET

ACCESS TO INFORMATION—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Davey calling the attention of the Senate to the Government's preoccupation with secrecy.—(Honourable Senator Davey).

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, this item has been on the order paper since December 4, 1984. Surely the honourable senator in whose name it stands cannot anticipate leaving it there any longer. I hope that, if he does not intend to speak on it, at least he will follow the procedure just followed by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition and withdraw the inquiry.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I spoke to Senator Davey about this matter today. I understand that he intends to speak on it this week, and I am sure that Senator Phillips will not want to miss that either.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Is that Senator Davey's inquiry or Senator Stollery's?

Senator Frith: Senator Davey's. Senator Stollery yielded to Senator Davey a couple of days ago.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, October 16, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Martial Asselin, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.

Prayers.

RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

CANADIAN FORCES—SPOUSES OF MEMBERS—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I give notice that, on Tuesday next, October 22, 1985, I will move:

That the Senate do urge the Government of Canada to permit freedom of assembly and speech, and such other freedoms guaranteed to all other Canadian citizens, for spouses of members of the Canadian Armed Forces.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SOUTH AFRICA—APARTHEID—CANADIAN POSITION AT COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, could the Leader of the Government throw some light on the position which the Government of Canada will be taking at the Commonwealth Conference now being held in the Caribbean, attended by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs? The question of the racial policy pursued in South Africa is to be one of the foremost, if not the foremost item on the agenda. Can the Leader of the Government tell us precisely what position the government will take at that conference as it seeks to work out a conclusion by the Commonwealth partners?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): The Government of Canada has made its own position in respect of South Africa quite clear. Several statements have been made by the Minister of State for External Affairs and, I think, by other ministers as well, in which the position of the government has been set out. While I do not have those statements to hand, I think that they are generally well known as being in favour of effective action to bring to the notice of the South African government the views of our country and our people respecting the principle of apartheid. We are against it. We have introduced and we will continue to introduce measures to make that opinion felt in a more concrete way in South Africa. Those measures—and I can report on them in more precise detail at some later time when I have the papers in hand, if my friend wishes me to do so—indicate a gradual tightening of pressure by Canada on South Africa, with a view to inducing the government of that state to take equitable action on apartheid. Our position at the conference will be to explain our policy with respect to that nation, to point out what we believe are its merits and to see whether we can secure the consent of our colleagues in the Commonwealth to adopt measures that are similar to or much the same as those we have adopted.

We recognize that there is a wide division of opinion on the matter as between the United Kingdom and other countries. As I read in the press—and I must say that that is my only source of information at the present—the position of the United Kingdom is less forthcoming than we believe our position to be. There are also the views of other members of the Commonwealth who wish to proceed to measures beyond what we have suggested. Our effort will be to find a common denominator which is acceptable to all parties, including, I believe, the public of Canada, that will enable the Commonwealth to present a united posture in respect of this matter.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I am aware of the statement on South Africa made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on July 6, which may be interpreted according to one's tastes. But I note that the Commonwealth Trade Union Council, meeting in the Caribbean, is urging the Commonwealth to impose comprehensive economic sanctions against South Africa, which would include the prohibition of the sale of oil, agricultural products and other trade items to South Africa. Is it the position of the Government of Canada that it is now prepared to support at the Commonwealth Conference a comprehensive system of trade sanctions against South Africa?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I think that perhaps one of the most interesting and constructive statements made on this whole problem was the statement made by "Sonny" Ramphal, Secretary General of the Commonwealth Secretariat, dealing with this question. The thrust of his advice was that we should seek a system of selective sanctions which could be invoked seriatim as events transpired, as being the most practical method and the most helpful method of applying sanctions in an effort to deal with this problem.

I believe that his statement on that matter coincides very largely with the views of my own government, and I think that will be the course that might be most productive in the present circumstances.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I have been trying to get some clarification on what the differences are between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United Kingdom. We are told that the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and Sir Geoffrey Howe have both opposed any imposition of economic sanctions on South Africa, and I do not find in the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on July 6 any move toward what one would call economic sanctions. There is no general prohibition of trade between Canada and South Africa, although we have taken some steps in carrying out some United Nations resolutions on trade in armaments.

I really wanted to know the differences between Canada and the United Kingdom on this point. Are they differences that are manufactured in the press to create some interest in the Commonwealth Conference? That is really what I would like to know.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I can only give the honourable senator the Canadian policy in the matter. I am quite unable to tell him what the policy of the United Kingdom is, because only the United Kingdom can do that. But if I were to hazard a guess, I would suspect that the question of selective sanctions will be the primary subject of conversations at those meetings, and Canada is prepared, in respect of certain matters, either on a voluntary or some other basis, to proceed along those lines.

We have taken certain steps that my honourable friend is aware of, and that clearly leads to the conclusion that we might take more if we think the situation requires it.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I would like to be clear as to what the Leader of the Government means when he says that we have imposed certain sanctions. It depends on one's definition of a sanction. To my knowledge, there has been no prohibition of trade between Canada and South Africa. In certain cases the government has removed support that would otherwise be available to exporters, but has not, to my knowledge, other than in compliance with certain United Nations resolutions on armaments, interfered with trade. So I find it difficult to understand where we differ, if we do, from the United Kingdom. I am not pressing the Leader of the Government to answer if the information is not available to him at the moment, but I do know that the British Foreign Secretary, Sir Geoffrey Howe, was here recently. It was reported that he and the Government of Canada had full discussions on South Africa and the nature of what might happen at the Commonwealth meeting, and that Sir Geoffrey Howe was hoping to enlist Canadian support against the imposition of economic sanctions. I am curious to know if there is a difference here and, if so, where is it? If the Leader of the Government cannot tell me today, perhaps he could tell me tomorrow or Tuesday next because this conference will be going on for some time, and it would be good to know what is really happening down there.

● (1410)

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I think it would be wrong to draw the conclusion from whatever press reports my honourable friend has read that the Canadian government is trying to make its policy conform to that of Prime Minister Thatcher. It is quite the other way around; we are trying to bring about an accord between Mrs. Thatcher's views on the matter and the views of other members of the Commonwealth. It is our hope that we may—and one must not make grandiose claims in this matter of being the link, interpreter or the porte parole—use our good offices to bring about an accord between the views of Mrs. Thatcher and those of other members, some of whom hold more extreme views, with a view to arriving at a unified Commonwealth position on the matter. What success we will have and the precise details of that arrangement will, of course, remain quite unknown until the discussions are over.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I understand the process of the Commonwealth meeting. What I want to know is: What is the position of the Government of Canada and where does it differ from the position of the Government of the United Kingdom? Or is there no difference? The Leader of the Government has told us that he could not tell me the view of the British government on this matter, but he did tell me that it was the government's intention to have that view coincide with other Commonwealth members'. Can the Leader of the Government get me some information on this matter so that we can establish some common ground?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am sure that my honourable friend has a great deal of information at his disposal. He has the statements made by the government over the past few months on the subject which have been progressively defining our position. If he refers to them—

Senator Flynn: He is too lazy.

Senator Roblin: —he will have the information that is available to the public with respect to the position of the Government of Canada. The position of the Government of the United Kingdom is quite another thing. If the honourable senator is patient enough to wait for the Commonwealth Conference to conclude, then all these arcane and mysterious matters will be clear to both him and me.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, what the Leader of the Government is telling me is that following the conference we must go to the newspapers to find out what the position of the Government of Canada is, that he cannot tell us today, and that he cannot tell us what the view of the Government of the United Kingdom is, even though that view was conveyed recently to the Government of Canada by the British Foreign Secretary. For all these items of information we must go to the press. That, to me, is a most unsatisfactory way of dealing with Members of Parliament, in which group senators are included. Surely, we are entitled to get some information on a major international event in which Canada is playing a very important role. Perhaps we could give some views that would be helpful before the conference ends, but we are denied that opportunity and told to look at the press when it is all over.

Senator Stanbury: They say the same thing with regard to free trade.

Senator MacEachen: I think that is pretty bad.

Senator Roblin: If it were true, it would be pretty bad. Of course, it is manifestly quite untrue. My honourable friend knows perfectly well that the position of the Government of Canada is not released through the press in the way in which he describes, that it is released through statements by ministers. I do not happen to be the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Senator Olson: You answer in this chamber for all the ministers.

Senator Roblin: The honourable senator is quite right. If my honourable friend would just keep quiet and wait until I am finished, then he can make his statement.

Senator Olson: You make that statement too often.

Senator Roblin: I am saying to my honourable friend that the views of the Government of Canada have been made manifest by the statements of the ministers. I do not have them here. If my honourable friend finds his files so deficient that he does not have those statements, I will get them for him, even though it is in the public domain and it is not strictly part of my duty to do so.

However, that information is available. I have no responsibility for what the newspapers say, but when the conference is over my honourable friend will not have to have recourse to the newspapers to find out what happened, because I can tell him that the Prime Minister will make a full statement as to what happened, and he and all of us will be able to grasp that situation.

As to the present position of the Government of Canada, it is clear; it is in writing; it is available. If my friend does not have that information, I will get it for him.

Senator MacEachen: I have a further question. This is the statement on South Africa issued by the Secretary of State on July 6. I am asking my honourable friend if that is the position that is being taken by the Prime Minister and his foreign minister at the Commonwealth Conference. Can he tell me whether that is the policy in full, and that we are not going beyond that?

Senator Roblin: I can tell my honourable friend that I do not think the statement he has in his hand is the last word that the government has said on this subject. I think there have been several statements made since then. I do not have them with me, but I will be glad to provide them for my friend.

Senator MacEachen: Perhaps the Leader of the Government can tell us when he next comes into the chamber in what way the policy of the government has diverged from the major policy statement issued at Baie Comeau on July 6. Can he also tell us then what the Prime Minister will be saying to his colleagues at the Commonwealth Conference?

I think it is shocking that these simple matters cannot be divulged. After all, we are not in the Politburo; we are in the Canadian Parliament where things are supposed to be public.

Senator Roblin: If you were in the Politburo, you would not be asking questions such as this. You are in a democratic country, and you are a member of a democratic assembly. Within the terms of reference of a question period, and within the terms of reference of my knowledge of the matter, my friend shall be satisfied. However, he need not expect me to have instantly at my fingertips during Question Period the information that he seeks and which is under the control of one of my colleagues, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Neither is there any point in his asking me what the Prime Minister will say at the Commonwealth Conference, because that is information which he will convey to his colleagues there, and it is only when that has been done that we will be able to obtain more information on this matter.

If my honourable friend will just allow me to consult the papers that are available, I will be glad to let him have the information. However, if he expects me to anticipate what will be said in Bermuda, I am afraid he is barking up the wrong tree.

Senator MacEachen: I have been very reasonable with the Honourable Leader of the Government. I have not insisted upon an answer to these questions today. I have invited him to provide me with answers tomorrow and, in the meantime, he has the opportunity to consult with officials in the Department of External Affairs, in the Prime Minister's Office and in the Privy Council Office, all of whom have undoubtedly participated in putting together a Canadian position that was, we hope, considered by the cabinet before the Prime Minister went to the Commonwealth Conference. Surely you are not telling me that the Prime Minister will make instant policy when he gets off the plane. All I am asking is to be told what the situation was when the Prime Minister left; what the preparations were and what is now the policy of the Government of Canada. There is nothing very demanding in that, and I am also saying that if you cannot tell me today, please tell me tomorrow. That is all.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend knows perfectly well I am not about to tell him what transpired in cabinet. He sat in cabinet for many a long year and I can never recall any occasion on which he responded to a question such as that by telling what went on in cabinet.

I also have to tell him that I really do not take my advice from the kind of advisers that he has been talking about. They are able, competent, public servants but they do not formulate the policy of the government. That is formulated by my colleagues, and when I have had a chance to talk to the Secretary of State and to the Prime Minister, then I will be in a position to give my honourable friend some of the information that he seeks.

My honourable friend has invited me to use another occasion on which to give him further information on the matter. I have accepted that invitation and will be glad to do so.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. H.A. Olson: My question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Is the government ready to announce the policy—and if not, when will it be announced?—as to the negotiating position of Canada respecting the so-called “freer” trade negotiations?

[Senator Roblin.]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am not exactly sure what it is my honourable friend is driving at. Would he like to expand on his question?

● (1420)

Senator Olson: I should like to know what it is that the Government of Canada is going to negotiate on when Canadian officials meet with their American counterparts. If the government is not ready to tell us what will be negotiated, could the government tell us what will be up for discussion so that those who are vitally concerned with this matter will know whether or not items of concern to them will be part of the negotiations?

Senator Roblin: The government is conducting consultations in Canada, with Canadians, in order to decide what aspects of the matter should be pressed at the conferences as being important to our interests.

Consultation meetings are now taking place with the various provincial ministers. One was held the other day in Halifax at which somebody got tangled up in underwear. The Prime Minister and the premiers will meet later this year. Studies are being prepared and meetings are planned with the 23 or so sectors of the economy of Canada which are in play in these discussions. That means it will be some time yet before we are able to arrive at some conclusions as to what the main thrust of the negotiations will be. But it is our hope and expectation that we will carry the people of Canada with us in these discussions, and that means that at the proper time they must know what the details are.

Senator Olson: May I ask whether or not discussions have begun with officials from the United States to apprise them of what it is the Canadian government wishes to negotiate?

Senator Roblin: My impression is that we must wait until the United States Congress has given permission to the President to enter into these discussions before we talk to them in any constructive or official way.

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate relating to bilateral trade talks with the United States. In a report published in the Gazette from Canadian Press on October 15, we were informed that a United States lobby last month "applied pressure" on the former Minister of Communications, Marcel Masse, threatening to link other trade questions in Congress with cultural questions unless the minister of the day softened his stand on Canadian laws protecting Canadian publishing and Canadian magazines.

I am now informed that a preliminary American negotiating committee composed of representatives of the State Department, the Federal Communications Commission and other U.S. government departments as well as private sector representatives, visited Ottawa within the past two or three weeks and attended upon cultural industry associations to determine questions relating to copyright and publishing.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise us what government departments that group of Americans—representing the American government—met with in Ottawa, and what the Canadian government's position is with respect to those negotiations?

Senator Roblin: With respect to the pressure on the government to make some changes in its broadcasting policy, its publishing policy and things of that sort, my response is: What's new? As long as I have been in this chamber there has been an active lobby in the United States to get us to reverse some of the positions we took with respect to publishing in this country and with respect to trans-border broadcasting. It is one of the most persistent lobbies I have ever come across, and I am not the slightest bit surprised to hear that they are still at it.

My friend has asked a specific question, namely, was there an American delegation that came to visit the Canadian government on this subject, and if so, what came of it. I apologize for not knowing of the visit, but I shall make inquiries to see what information I can get.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether it is the position or policy of the government that it will not enter into discussions or negotiations with the U.S. Administration in respect of trade until such time as a resolution of the U.S. Congress has endorsed the undertaking of such discussions and negotiations by the U.S. Administration.

Senator Roblin: I shall have to answer that question very carefully. There are all kinds of negotiations that take place on a daily basis between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States on the whole gamut of trade questions, and I fully expect that those kinds of contacts will continue. I am not aware that any of them bear on the question of freer trade between our two countries, though it is possible that some might.

I shall have to make some inquiries to determine whether or not that type of discussion is going on. I do not believe there are such discussions, but I might be wrong. I will make inquiries to determine whether or not that is the case.

My honourable friend should realize that this is going to be quite an inquiry. I am going to have to inquire of a number of departments to determine whether or not there are negotiations going on that could be described as out of the ordinary, as opposed to those negotiations that take place on a continual basis.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I think I can save the Leader of the Government a good deal of effort in this regard. My question related specifically to the matter of changes to bring about free or freer trade.

Did I understand the Leader of the Government to say that the Government of Canada will not enter into such discussions or negotiations with the U.S. Administration until such time as there has been a resolution of Congress favourable to such discussions and negotiations?

Senator Roblin: I am sure my honourable friend recognizes that some green light from the U.S. Congress is very important to us and would be the sign that we should proceed further than we have done up to now. But bear in mind that there are all kinds of negotiations going on right now that might be considered to be of a free trade nature. Examples would be the talks about timber, the talks about fish, the talks about potatoes, or the talks about steel—

Senator Haidasz: What about lumber?

Senator Roblin: Yes, and the talks about lumber. Why not? Talks on the core problems in respect of trade with the United States are not going to stand still while we await something to happen in the U.S. Those talks will continue.

If my honourable friend is referring to that kind of negotiation with respect to freer trade, then the answer is yes, such negotiations will be ongoing. But the formal arrangements, the more universally structured discussion on the question of trade relations between Canada and the U.S. will have to await some indication on the part of the U.S. government that it is ready to proceed with such discussions. However, that can by no means stop U.S. and Canadian officials from talking about other matters that bear directly on that very topic.

Senator Stewart: Well, let's not waste our time with obfuscation about "other matters." Presumably, the Government of Canada intends to undertake discussions or negotiations with regard to changes in the general framework of trade between Canada and the United States. The Leader of the Government in the Senate spoke first of a resolution of the U.S. Congress. Now he speaks of a "green light." I think his expression was "some kind of green light." That suggests a much more modest requirement than a resolution of the U.S. Congress.

Would the government leader tell this house what kind of green light he is talking about, what kind of green light this government would require from the Congress of the United States before it entered into discussions or negotiations with the U.S. Administration relative to a new general trade arrangement with that country?

Senator Roblin: Yes, I will. To avoid the obfuscation that my honourable friend complained about, I think I had better reduce it to writing.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps we can save the government leader a trip to the various departments. There is an act of the U.S. Congress authorizing the President and the Administration to enter into free trade negotiations with Israel and Canada. That is certainly a green light.

● (1430)

Senator Roblin: That is what one could describe as a pretty green light, but it is really more of an amber light. The green light is a further expression of the opinion in the United States Congress. I have to say that that is an important part in the procedures that will be followed.

Senator Frith: The act of Congress is not a green light.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I have a question on the same subject. As I understand it, the Administration has been authorized to conduct free trade negotiations with Canada. The Macdonald commission has recently come out with a multi-million dollar 1,300-page report on the economic union in Canada, with all of the background material. There has been an ongoing debate for some months on the whole question of whether we should conduct our trade negotiations multilaterally or bilaterally with the United States, with a great deal of evidence in favour of something being done in terms of trade negotiations and a free or freer trade arrangement with the United States.

Given all of that, is the Leader of the Government saying that the Government of Canada does not have a process that relates specifically to a matter which has occupied the minds of the Canadian public for at least some years?

Senator Roblin: I do not know why my honourable friend does not pay attention to what goes on because there is a process in train with respect to developing our views in this matter. I have explained it in this house on several occasions. It has been the subject of wide comment outside this house, and if he just took the trouble to look at it he would know the answer to his question.

Senator Stollery: The Leader of the Government just explained to us that these discussions are ongoing and sectoral, and so are quite separate from the question of free or freer trade, which is not a sectoral process. It has nothing to do with discussions over timber, discussions over steel, or discussions over the other items of trade which are of great concern to many Canadians. It is a completely different and separate issue which requires a certain amount of study. I am trying to find out whether the Government of Canada actually has anything in place dealing specifically with the issue of across-the-board free trade with Canada, an issue which has been the subject of a 1,300-page royal commission report within the past five weeks.

Senator Roblin: I am sorry that I cannot claim credit for the royal commission because that resides elsewhere, but I can see that my honourable friend thinks that the subject of timber, for one, has nothing to do with the grand issue of freer trade—I do not use the word "free" trade because I think that is a misnomer, and I do not think it is likely to come to pass—or at least, as a minimum, preserving our present markets in the United States. If he thinks there is no connection between these two subjects, I have to tell him that I think he is mistaken because there is the closest connection. Anyone who has any knowledge of what is being said in the United States on this topic will understand just how close that connection is. There are some groups down there who are trying to make a solution to the timber problem a prior condition to anything else. I am not critical of my honourable friend's comments, but I want to assure him that the problems in connection with these sectors are at the very heart of a freer trade situation between our two countries.

As I said a little while ago, and I will repeat it now, the factors that are being examined in connection with the Canadian position have to do with those that we have developed at the meeting of provincial trade ministers, the meeting of the Prime Minister and the premiers, and the discussions in the 23 different sectors that might be affected by what happens. It is a process that is a long way from being completed and is still going on. Until it is closer to being completed, I expect our views on this subject will not be finalized.

As ministers have already said, if anyone thinks that the free trade negotiations are going to start tomorrow, that is a misapprehension. If they start early next year, it will be pretty good going.

I would suggest to this chamber that there is a long way to go before we get to that bargaining table and that there is a lot of talking to do and a lot of understanding to get across with respect to those people who have interests for or against this particular move, all of which have to be taken into consideration as we develop the course we are to follow.

There is no magic answer; there is no three-word expression I can give to illustrate what is going on, but I hope I can convey to my friend something of the processes necessary to arrive at a policy we feel we can stand by.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question relative to the expression the Leader of the Government in the Senate used concerning a "green light" from the U.S. Congress.

My understanding of the legal situation is that, as far as the Canadian side is concerned, no legislation is necessary, and the government is wholly empowered to enter upon such discussions and negotiations in such forums as it chooses. As far as the United States Constitution is concerned, the power to negotiate trade and tariff matters lies in Congress and they have to delegate that to the Administration. In terms of the last trade bill, as Senator Frith has pointed out, they delegated to the Administration specifically or to the President the right to enter into negotiations for a free trade agreement with Canada.

My question is: Is the present desire to obtain some form of resolution from Congress, and particularly from the Senate, at the initiative of the U.S. government, the Canadian government or both? Or is this wholly a matter that the U.S. Administration is saying it would like to have in addition to the authority under the Trade Act?

Senator Roblin: I believe I am correct in saying that this is a domestic initiative within the United States.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, I am now more confused than I was at the beginning of this series of questions. Do I understand that the American Congress, or the American Senate, will pass a resolution, and if that resolution, in effect, offers an invitation to its officials to negotiate across the entire spectrum, and if we, in advance, have not excluded from that spectrum certain items, such as the cultural industries, would that not put us in an immediate stalemate position with the United States?

Senator Roblin: One of the things I am going to do is follow up on the statement made by Senator van Roggen about the resolution of the United States Congress. I think he is right, but I do not have the exact reference at my fingertips and I want to get that to be sure I am right so we can deal with this matter more authoritatively.

With respect to my honourable friend's question, each party will bring to the bargaining table whatever it thinks it proper to bring. I imagine there will certainly be areas of the United States economy which will not be open for discussion at the bargaining table. So, I do not expect any resolution of the United States Senate will preclude the government of that country from deciding what it wants to talk about.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, while the Leader of the Government is investigating the present legal situation, would he confirm my understanding that, as Senator van Roggen has said, the legislation is already in place to allow the President to carry out the negotiating of a trade deal with Canada; and that what they call the "fast track" system in the United States Congress means that once the President negotiates a trade deal—he goes ahead and does his negotiation with Canada—he then submits the deal to Congress and, within 60 days, Congress must either accept or reject that deal without amendment?

I assume that the whole process of negotiation must go on before that deal is put before Congress. I can only assume, from what the Leader of the Government has said, that the Administration has decided that the proper course of wisdom calls for some submission on its part to Congress before it proceeds. I understand that, even though it has the legal authority, it is of the view that it is politic to have some kind of further confirmation from Congress.

Would the government leader provide to us some idea of what the Administration intends to put before Congress, when it intends to put it there, what the terms of reference will be and what it expects back by way of resolution before it proceeds with the first stage of negotiating the agreement and before it goes to the final stage of submitting that to Congress?

I appreciate that my question is complex, but no one has yet explained to us how the process is going to work in the United States. We have heard that, by means of a telephone call, our Prime Minister spoke to the President and asked him to commence negotiations in the United States. We have not heard where that is going, when it is going or what the ultimate result will be. We know what the legal situation is, but that is not the procedure that is being followed.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for the question. I think it is a good one and I will try to find the answer to it. The communication between the President and the Prime Minister was followed, of course, by correspondence. Naturally, I am not an expert on American procedure—my honourable friend does not think I am, nor does he expect me to be, for that matter—but I will try to find out what I can about the processes involved in that country.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. As the answers to Senator Stanbury's questions will be somewhat technical and probably best submitted in writing, could the Leader of the Government include in them a comment on whether the fast track system in the United States Congress can be used in the case of a treaty as opposed to an Executive Agreement? There are two ways in which free trade could be implemented between Canada and the United States. One is by means of an Executive Agreement, where, under the fast track, Congress would have to pass such legislation—as would this Parliament—as would enable it to fulfil the terms of that agreement. A second, quite different method of entering upon a free trade arrangement with the United States is by means of a treaty, which must be approved or ratified by the United States Senate. The latter method is a much more binding one on future Congresses of the United States.

I, for one, would be loath to see Canada enter into free trade arrangements with the United States without those arrangements being enshrined in a treaty. I would greatly appreciate it if the Leader of the Government could, in his answers to other questions, include an explanation of the treaty as opposed to the Executive Agreement, outlining which one, if either, the fast track applies to.

Senator Roblin: I can tell my honourable friend that an Executive Agreement would not be satisfactory to the Government of Canada.

Senator van Roggen: Good.

Senator Roblin: Free trade arrangements would have to be entered into by way of a treaty. What needs to be enshrined in any agreement is a system of adjudication of disputes and a system of definitions as to what constitutes unfair trading practices, subsidies, and all of those things which are at the root of our problems today. We must get ourselves into a position where we will not find the rules changed unilaterally in a procedure in which we have no say. What is most important, in my mind, is that these arrangements should be made via the treaty route, and that is the route I expect to report on.

Senator van Roggen: In such an event the fast track may not apply, and I would appreciate the comments of the Leader of the Government in that regard.

INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE

BARRIERS

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether any concrete steps have been taken by the government to establish free trade within Canada before we get involved with freer trade with the United States of America.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): That is the best question I have heard today, and I appreciate it. I think it is very germane. That is one of the very points to be discussed when the Prime Minister meets with the premiers in November. Local buying preferences and other interferences with trade between provinces are things that I personally deprecate. The question of a provincial impact on an international trading treaty is also important. The provinces must be brought on side as this whole process is developed.

If I may add a gratuitous remark, I was quite surprised to read a study the other day which, while it did not approve of interprovincial barriers, did not seem to hold the view that they are quite as damaging as some of us are inclined to think. The question of interprovincial barriers and provincial support for an international trading treaty with the United States is very important. It was important when the GATT arrangements were made. I am surprised, for example, that people still talk free trade. My God, GATT has given us free trade for at least three-quarters of our trade already, and the country hasn't fallen apart, for goodness sake. Those arrangements went through with the assent of the provinces, however, and I can assure my honourable friend that the same kind of assent will be sought now.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, my question is addressed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. He spoke earlier about a treaty arrangement which would give us more protection in the sense that it would bind the Americans to a greater degree than would an Executive Agreement. It would bind the Americans at all three levels of government not to enact any statutes regulating trade which would discriminate against Canadians when such statutes would not discriminate against Americans. This will be asking the three levels of the American government to give up considerable power. One of the things that worry those of us who are concerned about this, and there are a few, is what we would have to give up in exchange. Could the Leader of the Government arrange to have some experts try to reassure those of us who are concerned about this fear that we have?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Of course, the coin has two sides to it. The Americans are asking us to do precisely the same thing that my honourable friend wants them to do. That will certainly be part of the negotiating process.

INDUSTRY

YUKON—RE-OPENING OF CYPRUS ANVIL MINE—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. As he well knows, the Cyprus Anvil mine in the Yukon has been closed for some time. Cyprus Anvil accounted for a large part of the Yukon's economy. The former government paid $25 million towards a $50 million stripping program, and I understand that the federal government and the territorial government are now negotiating with another group to try to re-open the mine. Could we be provided with a progress report on the status of the negotiations? Is there any chance of a quick settlement of the outstanding problems so that that mine can be re-opened?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think that I can give to my friend a reasonably optimistic reply to his question. The Honourable David Crombie, the minister in charge of this particular problem, has been working very hard towards an agreement among half a dozen parties concerned—those responsible for electricity, water supply, transportation, the townsite and all the rest of it—and in which half a dozen interests are in play. I think he has them all heading in the same direction. Although I do not want to be too positive in my assertion, my impression is that the negotiations are going very well and that no insuperable obstacles have thus far disclosed themselves, except the fact that the world has lots of zinc.

NEW BRUNSWICK—CLOSURE OF STAR-KIST PLANT— GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the disturbing news yesterday that 400 employees of the Star-Kist plant in St. Andrews, New Brunswick are being given notice of an indefinite layoff, would he indicate whether his government has a genuine concern about this matter? If so, what concrete steps has it taken to save that plant and the 400 jobs that it provided?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my information is not quite as gloomy as that of my honourable friend. It seems to be correct that that plant will stop working for a while, but it also seems to be the intention of management to resume in full force as soon as market conditions make that possible.

• (1450)

Senator Haidasz: My question also was: What concrete steps has this government taken to protect the jobs of the people at the Star-Kist plant at St. Andrews, New Brunswick?

Senator Roblin: We are trying to ensure that the plant, like all of our fish plants, produce a good product.

Senator Haidasz: How?

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government inform us whether there has been any assurance from the management of that plant to someone in government that, in fact, the plant will be re-opened on November 9?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I have no information on that point.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable senators, about two weeks ago, the Leader of the Government in the Senate informed me that—and I am paraphrasing the Leader of the Government's comments—we could expect a statement very shortly by the Government on the matter of the fish packing plant in St. Andrews. Today, is the Leader of the Government in the Senate in a position to inform us when the Government will make its statement?

[English]

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am afraid that my honourable friend has me there. I am not aware of what statement he is talking about.

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, if the Leader of the Government in the Senate has a moment, I will find the exact quote. I raised this matter about two weeks ago. In his answer, the Leader of the Government in the Senate implied that the Government was about to make a statement about the plant and its inspection services, in response to questions raised by other senators, and also about the consumer protection aspect as it concerns fisheries products. I realize that the Leader of the Government in the Senate may have a lapse of memory, as happens to me occasionally, but if he does not mind waiting, I will find the exact quote in a moment.

[English]

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I think my honourable friend's second reference to the detail of what he was interested in rings a bell. If he will give me the citation, I will examine my answer and see what else I can give him. It may have to do with the investigation that is taking place by the Department of Fisheries, and which, I believe, is still not completed.

TRANSPORT

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—WELLAND CANAL BLOCKAGE

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, through the media we have learned that there has been a partial collapse of one of the locks in the Welland Ship Canal. I am advised that this has caused tremendous concern among shipping people because there is no alternative port at which they can unload their cargoes. It also means that undoubtedly there will be a layoff of a large number of people.

Is the Leader of the Government in a position to give us a report on the situation, how quickly the lock might be repaired, and what has been done about finding alternative ports and dealing with the layoffs caused by this collapse?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is true that the shipping industry as a whole on the Great Lakes is suffering from hard times, because not only are they blocked at the Welland Canal right now, but the volume of grain movements has been substantially reduced. There has been serious hardship among the people who earn their living in that shipping system.

The lock of the Welland Canal, as my honourable friend knows, is the only way of getting from one lake to the others, and so its blockage is a very important matter. The situation is in the hands of the St. Lawrence Seaway Corporation, which is looking into it. It is not a direct government operation.

I will ask my colleague, the Minister of Transport, to find out what he can about the situation and what steps can possibly be taken to rectify it.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government give me a progress report on the questions I asked a month or so ago?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, while I convey my honourable friend's reminders faithfully, the answers have to be given in the committee. That is where the minister made her statement. So we can raise the matter again in committee tonight, and we will see what happens.

Senator Frith: But the minister will not be there tonight.

Senator Roblin: But we will find out.

CONDOMINIUM ORDINANCE VALIDATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall moved the second reading of Bill C-73, to validate certain ordinances of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of Bill C-73, the Condominium Ordinance Validation Bill, is to allow the construction and sale of condominium housing in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

The old Land Titles Act happens to be holding back new housing development in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. That act of 1894 applied to the northern and western lands that Canada took over after Confederation. As part of the housekeeping legislation of those times, it allowed the proper registration of titles.

As new western provinces came into being, they wrote their own laws for the same purpose, but the federal Land Titles Act has remained in force for the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

Today the Territories have themselves taken over many aspects of government. Indeed the Registrar of Land Titles for the Northwest Territories acts almost as an employee of the territorial government; the office is located with the territorial offices and advice comes from the territorial public service. But the appointment remains a federal appointment, and the registrar has to abide by the federal Land Titles Act. This act holds back housing by the technicality that it makes no provision for registering titles to condominiums.

The writers of the original law had no crystal ball and gave no thought to this future form of ownership. They dealt with the situation as they saw it. Land titles were generally a straightforward matter; somebody owned a piece of land and a building, and that was that.

[Senator Roblin.]

In our time, of course, the condominium form of ownership has become popular. By selling to multiple owners, builders can reduce the cost of construction and services, and condominiums today can offer good and convenient private accommodation, often at a lower price.

Provincial governments have rewritten their laws on titles to take account of condominiums. But the territorial governments remain under the provisions of the old Land Titles Act, which ignore the existence of condominiums.

The Northwest Territories in 1969 and the Yukon in 1968 passed ordinances that would make it possible to register condominiums. Later, however, the federal Department of Justice formed the opinion that the Territories had gone beyond their authority and that their ordinances conflicted with the Land Titles Act.

One solution was to change the act. The previous federal government twice started out to do so, but each time, however, other bills took priority and Parliament never got around to changing the act to allow registration of condominiums in the north.

Another simpler solution involves passing an act which would validate existing territorial condominium ordinances, which also, in effect, amends the Land Titles Act, and it is this latter validation route that is proposed for both Territories in the bill I am introducing today.

I mentioned that condominiums can cut expenses through owners sharing costs. It is expensive enough in southern Canada to bring in services such as water and sewerage. Installing them in places like Yellowknife, in the cold and rocky Canadian Shield country, takes on new dimensions of difficulty.

The cost of transporting materials to the north, the cost of labour, the short construction season, the nature of the land and climate, all add to the expense of a house; and to cut costs and add convenience, builders have wanted, and still want, to put up condominiums—but the law gives the potential owners no way to register their titles. So, one can imagine the frustration of both builders and buyers.

Some builders in the Northwest Territories started out to build condominiums, but, because of the law, had to rent out the units rather than sell them to individual owners. In Yukon, the Registrar went ahead and registered some 130 units, but some uncertainty hangs over the titles.

• (1500)

Northern communities have a crying need for housing. Last year the Legislative Assembly of the Northwest Territories set up a Special Committee on Housing. After holding 60 meetings and visiting 40 communities it published its report. The report offered more than 80 recommendations. The special committee wanted its co-chairmen to act as a special implementation review committee to ensure the government acts upon the recommendations. In Yellowknife, which has nearly one quarter of the population of the Northwest Territories, the vacancy rate for apartments is zero. The mayor of Yellowknife spoke on the subject before the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development in the other place. He said that for housing in his city there was a shortfall in the immediate future of at least 250 units.

Economic growth in the north has increased the pressure for housing. Mineral exploration activity, the new regional hospital, the opening of new and/or branch offices have all increased demand in Yellowknife. The mayor of that city also spoke about house prices. With the expense and general difficulties of northern construction, a trailer on a privately-owned lot can cost up to $95,000 and a newer single family house can cost almost $160,000. It is almost as expensive as Ottawa! Condominiums could provide housing at an intermediate price, and give these families a better chance to have their own place. But, of course, the lack of provisions to allow the registering of condominiums prevents them.

The solution being proposed in the bill has the support of the City of Yellowknife, the Northwest Territories Association of Municipalities, the Yellowknife Chamber of Commerce, of MLAs of the territorial governments, the real estate communities and northerners in general. As for opposition, there has been none. The act, once passed, will affect only property that is already in private hands. The changes will have no effect on crown lands or native land claims. Amendments will give builders the chance to build and residents the chance to buy. In the other place, the honourable member for Western Arctic, Mr. Dave Nickerson, drew attention to the issue by putting forward a private member's bill affecting the Northwest Territories. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development offered to make the initiative into a government bill and to widen it to include Yukon. Honourable members of all parties on the Commons Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development unanimously asked for action on the matter. The other place has dealt with it and now the responsibility rests with us.

I note in the House of Commons Debates that the members of the opposition parties who spoke on the bill spoke very highly of it and asked for immediate passage. This bill helps individuals, helps families, and helps the northern economy with jobs and investment. Everything about the bill seems clear and straightforward. Builders and potential buyers are only waiting for us to pass the bill, and that being the case, I would ask honourable senators to give this very useful bill their prompt consideration and support.

On motion of Senator Lucier, debate adjourned.

CANADA'S INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—INTERIM REPORT ON BILATERAL TRADE WITH UNITED STATES AND CANADA'S PARTICIPATION IN RESEARCH ON STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Interim Report of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's International Relations pertaining to Bilateral Trade with the United States and Canada's Participation in Research on the Strategic Defense Initiative, tabled in the Senate on 17th September, 1985—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.).

Hon. Phillippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I would like to thank Senator MacEachen for yielding to me at this stage of the debate on this issue.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator MacEachen, do you yield to Senator Gigantès?

Senator MacEachen: Yes, Your Honour. It will give me a chance to speak at another time.

Senator Gigantès: There was a pre-arrangement. My leader is a very reasonable and indulgent man—

Senator Doody: He must be.

Senator Gigantès:—like other Canadians. My admiration and love for Canadians started during World War II when I met people like Senator John Morrow Godfrey and Senator Marshall and I developed a passionate concern for this country which was to become mine eventually. It is a special, distinct and wonderful country, a country in which Senator Phillips, who has a reputation for being—Senator Doody: Careful now.

Senator Gigantès:—a fire eater, is decent enough to accept an apology and have a good relationship with me, as has Senator Walker and Senator Flynn, who is not here and with whom I regret not being able to exchange some barbs today, but with whom I have a warm relationship. The warmth I feel toward this whole country leads me to talk about free trade, because I fear.

I would like to recount for your benefit the remarks of Dr. Eric Kierans on the "Morningside" program of the CBC last Tuesday, October 8. I do this because I share, as do many other Canadians, his disquietude over the free trade negotiations with the United States. Some honourable senators may feel this matter has been sufficiently debated, or that it should be left to the negotiators and that the rest of us should be quiet. Some others want to keep the issues in the public domain. Dr. Kierans, a noted economist and, incidentally, a very successful businessman said:

What we are getting into with the United States is like tossing a shark and a plump little tuna into the same swimming pool. It has nothing to do with free trade.

He continues:

The pure theory of free trade is something equivalent to the Judaeo-Christian ethic—do unto others as you would that others do unto you. Free trade theory presupposes a state of full employment, no government intervention (and since Keynes we have all kinds of that), a gold standard by which to judge things objectively. Then you can look at a trading situation between, say, England and Portugal. England is better at making cloth; Portugal is better at making wine. Then England takes over the making of all the cloth and Portugal takes over the making of all the wine. But then we must ask what happens if you have a country that is better at producing everything. If England is better at producing both cloth and wine than is Portugal, the theory says, England still must be better at producing cloth rather than wine. That being the case, in conditions of full employment, England puts all her employment into producing all the cloth and lets Portugal put all her employment into producing all the wine.

Now the United States may be better at producing machine tools than lumber. According to the free trade theory, the United States should allow Canada to produce lumber. And in fact we are more efficient at producing lumber than is the United States. And they will not even let us corner the market for those things in which we are more efficient.

The Americans are looking for a surplus with us in merchandise trade to create employment in their country. We too are looking for a surplus from them. Can we both have surpluses?

Dr. Kierans said he was also worried because "all the trade talk is emphasizing a very one-sided option and that option is that growth depends upon increasing export trade. Growth depends also on creating a balanced economy at home. Doing more things here than we are doing now and, in effect, trying to substitute our own industrial output for imports." Dr. Kierans concedes that the Macdonald commission report, in its second volume, says that imports substitution is the wrong way to go and that we should aggressively pursue export promotion. But if every country in the world aggressively pursues export promotion, "who are the losers?" asks Dr. Kierans. There must be some losers. If we are successful in exporting our unemployment, somebody else will lose employment in their country. Unless we first create a fully balanced economy and a competitive economy at home, we will be weak and vulnerable and dependent on the export game, Dr. Kierans says.

● (1510)

Mr. Don McGillivray, in a recent column, deplored the tendency to sing the praises of free trade without examining all the possible problems. For instance, why is it that Canadian provinces have grown so much faster than their neighbouring "Northern Tier" U.S. states? Manitoba's population grew 41 per cent in the 40 years from 1941 to 1981. That of neighbouring North Dakota grew only 2 per cent. In the same 40 years, Alberta grew 170 per cent and Montana only 40 per cent. British Columbia grew 230 per cent from 1941 to 1981 and the State of Washington only grew 137 per cent.

Ontario grew 128 per cent in those 40 years; Pennsylvania only grew 19 per cent and New York 30 per cent. However, in the same period, 1941 to 1981, Florida grew 400 per cent and California 200 per cent compared with New York's 30 per cent.

Projections published in the United States by U.S. authorities predict that New York State will grow 7 per cent between now and the year 2000 and Michigan will grow 3 per cent. But Florida's population will grow 36 per cent and California's population 24 per cent. In other words, investment has moved to the Sun Belt; jobs have moved to the Sun Belt and people have followed.

In the 10-year period, 1970 to 1980, the population of metropolitan areas in the northeast United States declined by 2 per cent, while the metropolitan areas to the south and west grew by more than 20 per cent.

What happens to people here if investments move south because we are no longer allowed by a free trade agreement to subsidize investments? Why should our evolution differ from that of the "Northern Tier" region in the United States? We keep being told about the advantages of having access to the huge U.S. market. The Northern Tier American region has had access to this huge market, and yet their relative position in that market has declined. We, as a separate market, have had a higher rate of growth between 1950 and 1980, both in population and in standard of living, than the United States by 72 per cent compared to 47 per cent. That is a huge difference.

The sort of free trade, or freer trade, now being discussed has built-in inconsistencies, in my view. If capital and jobs in the United States move to the Sun Belt from the Northern Tier, people can follow from within the Northern Tier. However, Canadians would not be able to move to the Sun Belt. If they were allowed to do so, that would be a common market arrangement and not a freer trade arrangement. Could our social policies then be continued if we are losing our tax base, our investments and jobs to the Sun Belt?

When we can no longer offer the inducements we now offer to investors, because the U.S. calls these "subsidies," the only inducement our various regions will have to offer will be a reduction in taxes. We shall have to have the same taxes as the Sun Belt, or even lower, to compensate for the economic burden of our winters. That is fine for the rich, but is it fine for the majority of Canadians?

An October 3 editorial in The Gazette puts the case well, and you will allow me to quote from that editorial:

Logic and the carefully worded statements of public officials both suggest that it is a delusion to think that Canada's distinctive social and cultural policies would emerge unscathed from a free trade deal with the United States. Mr. Clark, who has been given 'ultimate responsibility' for the talks by Mr. Mulroney,—stopped short of promising that cultural industries, including book publishing, would be excluded from the talks—

The issue is real. Washington recently indicated it might like Canada to alter some of its cultural policies. The U.S. seems especially miffed by a federal policy designed to increase Canadian ownership in the book publishing industry, which now stands at 20 per cent.

Meanwhile, American border broadcasters probably will seek changes to Canadian rules that allow Canadian advertisers to claim a tax deduction for ads they place on Canadian stations but not on American ones, and that let cable companies broadcast Canadian ads on American channels when they show a program at the same time as a Canadian station does.

And U.S. Ambassador Thomas Niles suggested last weekend that a 'dispassionate' discussion of cultural industries would be welcome.

Once free trade began, there also would be market pressures on Canadian social policies. In order to lure new investment, or to stop Canadian companies from moving south, Ottawa probably would find itself pressed to ease up on environmental, health and labor regulations, and to cut the taxes that pay for social programs.

If Canada somehow did emerge from negotiations without having to change its social and cultural policies, it probably would have found it necessary in return to make concessions in some other area.

Those who argue in favour of a trade deal with the United States say that Canada won't be able to afford its social and cultural policies unless the Canadian economy gets the shot in the arm that many feel free trade would bring. But a wider, international, trade deal would be better for Canada than tying itself more closely to the United States. It would mean greater market access for Canadian exporters without having to toe the U.S. line on 'subsidies'. In international negotiations, Canada could expect to have its position on subsidies bolstered by Western Europe and others whose views on government participation in the economy and culture are closer to those of Canada.

The Gazette continues:

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce, meeting in Saskatoon, has passed a resolution favoring government moves toward free trade but calls for a mechanism to ensure free trade does not infringe on Canada's freedom to make trade, industrial and social policies. That have-one's-cake-and-eat-it stance is naive.

If the economic benefits of free trade are large enough—and they may not be—then Canadians might well consider such an arrangement worthwhile. But they should stop deceiving themselves about the likely cultural and social side effects.

To repeat—and I am speaking now and not quoting from The Gazette—why should we expect to do better out of free trade than have America's Northern Tier states? They decline, while the Sun Belt thrives. They have declined while we, without free trade, have done much better. The power of self-delusion is dangerous. Band wagons can turn to juggernauts. Let us not run over ourselves because we are dazzled by one side of a shiny coin.

On motion of Senator MacEachen, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, October 17, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Martial Asselin, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.

INCOME TAX ACT TAX COURT OF CANADA ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Lowell Murray, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Thursday, October 17, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

EIGHTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-72, intituled: "An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to make a related amendment to the Tax Court of Canada Act", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday October 9, 1985, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted

LOWELL MURRAY
Chairman

[English]

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Lowell Murray: At the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we have no objection to giving it third reading today.

Senator Murray: Then, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move third reading now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, with the indulgence of the Senate, because the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has such a busy schedule of meetings, may I be permitted to draw to the attention of the Senate that the committee will meet next week: on Monday afternoon, at 2 o'clock; on Tuesday morning, at 9.30; on Wednesday afternoon, at 3.30, and again that day at 8 p.m.—and possibly on Thursday morning, although it is not yet confirmed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Am I right in saying that the meeting on Monday has witnesses starting at 2 o'clock, the last group being scheduled to appear at 6 o'clock?

Senator Murray: That is correct.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, October 22, 1985, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before leave is granted to pass this motion which brings the Senate back on Tuesday next, I would like to have some indication as to what government business will be before the Senate. I understand that there is a heavy schedule of committee meetings, and I believe that senators will be here to deal with that burden of committees, but I do not see the point of sitting in this chamber three days next week when there is hardly any government business before us.

I may not be fully informed, but I have made inquiries and I am told that it is unlikely that there will be any legislation coming from the House of Commons for several days; that if there is any item that may come, it will not be of urgent importance and could be dealt with at a later time.

What I am really asking, honourable senators, is: Is it useful to bring the chamber together—quite apart from the committees, which ought to meet—unless we have some important government legislation? My understanding is that we do not. If we do, of course, it would be our obligation to sit in the chamber next week.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I can fully appreciate what the Leader of the Opposition is saying. I have to report that there is no great rush of government business coming from the other place. The purpose of sitting during the coming week was to facilitate the committee work. It is our desire to have as many senators here as possible to fill the ranks of the committees so that the legislation and other matters before them can be properly treated.

It might be of advantage to all senators if, perhaps, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition and I spoke about the suggested adjournment privately. Perhaps we can come to a resolution on the matter and refer back to the Senate a little later this afternoon.

In the meantime, we could stand this motion at this point, if that is agreeable.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think that is a good idea.

I do want to make a comment about committees. Senator Doody and I agree on this and I think many senators also agree. During the last year committees have been meeting even when the Senate was not sitting. It had become rather a tradition that the Senate would sit simply in order to accommodate the committees. That tradition, I think, has blessedly been eroded a little by recent practices. That is very encouraging. We have found that committees are able to meet on Mondays and sometimes on Fridays. In fact, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has been meeting on Mondays with good attendance, and I think that is a very salutary development.

Therefore, I hope we can work something out, and we will take this opportunity to divorce Senate sittings from opportunities for the committees to do their work. I agree that we should stand this motion for the moment, and Senator Doody and I will then confer on the matter.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it agreed that we revert to Notices of Motions later this day?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion stands.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, yesterday we had an interesting discussion about the negotiating position of the Canadian government in the proposed trade discussions with the United States. In one of his answers, the Leader of the Government indicated that some further discussions with the provinces were needed.

I found out late yesterday that the Minister for International Trade has indicated that what they really want or what they really need, because of United States insistence, is that the provinces should delegate the power to negotiate in areas where they have exclusive jurisdiction to the federal negotiator. Is that what the discussions with the provinces are about—the delegation of this authority to a federal negotiator?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in cases of international trade, it has always been necessary for us to move in conjunction with the provinces, and that has always been successful.

Last night, before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, the Minister for International Trade was present and gave a pretty thorough explanation, resumé and rationale of the entire process that was under discussion here yesterday. I, for one, am grateful that he did, because he said it in an authoritative way, which I am afraid, not being the minister in charge, could hardly be expected of me.

I will make sure my honourable friend receives a copy of the minister's statement. If I may take the liberty of doing so, I should like to recommend that all senators who are interested in trade take a look at that because it is a most interesting statement and sets out the practical course we hope to follow.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I asked what the Canadian negotiating position was going to be and I was told that the answer would be forthcoming only after these other discussions. I did not realize at the time that the United States had already laid on the table what it wants. It wants a federal negotiator, or a negotiator, which is almost a single window or a single desk. They are insisting on having on the table such things as liquor sales, and so on, which are exclusively within provincial jurisdiction.

It seems to me that, since the United States has indicated the terms and conditions under which it will come to the table and negotiate, we ought to have some right in one of the houses of Parliament to know what the Canadian position is. The minister said that they wanted to work in concert with the provinces, but that is not what the United States is asking. They want to deal with one person.

Senator Roblin: We will have more problems than one in respect of provincial liquor policies because we are under siege at GATT on exactly that issue. It may be that it will come to a head before anything happens with our trade with the United States.

The whole question of the process of negotiation—who is going to do it; who is going to be consulted; and how we are attempting to arrive at a national consensus—was, I think, dealt with effectively by the minister last night. I think my honourable friend will have the principle of his question answered when he sees that statement.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): He will not find that in the statement. The minister said a lot more in his evidence.

Senator Roblin: That is quite so. My honourable friend was present and took part in the proceedings, as did the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): I thought the questions were well put.

Senator Roblin: The questions were satisfactory and they evoked magnificent answers, in my opinion. You cannot ask for more than that.

I did not intend to say—and I hope I did not say—that I was only going to send him the minister's statement, because I quite agree that was just the opening gun. The two-hour discussion ranged over all the topics that I know interest my friend, and I intend to see he gets the whole works.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think it would be rather mean of me not to announce that today I received from someone answers to my questions. The answers I have been pressing for with regard to the banks' affair arrived on my desk today. I thought the Leader of the Government was going to provide them today, and I was going to thank him for them.

I cannot say that I find them perfectly satisfactory, but I am sure that does not shock anyone, because I do not remember, when we gave answers to questions, people frequently springing to their feet on this side with praise for how satisfactory they were.

• (1410)

However, I did receive the answers. I can tell the Leader of the Government in the Senate that I may be pressing him for more details, but for the moment I am off the leader's back on that particular issue.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am pleased that my honourable friend has been kind enough to mention that. I have to say that the information was enclosed in a plain, brown envelope, and was sent courtesy of the Chairman of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I understand from the Deputy Leader of the Opposition that he received the answers. However, since the questions were asked on the floor of the Senate, I think it only proper that the answers be given on the floor of the Senate so that all honourable senators may hear them. Placing answers to questions on the desk of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition is not good enough.

Senator Roblin: I am inclined to agree with my honourable friend, and I shall see that all honourable senators receive copies of those answers.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—1983 STABILIZATION PAYMENT

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would not want the week to pass without asking the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether or not the question of the 1983 stabilization payment for sugar-beets was raised in cabinet.

[Senator Frith.]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am afraid I cannot tell my honourable friend whether or not that subject was raised in cabinet, but I can tell my honourable friend that the Minister of Agriculture has prepared a recommendation which will be considered as soon as possible.

Senator Fairbairn: I should observe that I am definitely wanting to attribute the success of this to my honourable friend, the Leader of the Government in the Senate. He may have noted that there has been some confusion in recent days about the position of the Minister of Agriculture on the question of this payment. Indeed, the minister wrote a letter to one of my colleagues in the House of Commons, which quite properly was raised in that House earlier this week, in which he said that there would be no payment. When questioned, the minister was unable to remember having written that letter, although it was not a form letter but a "Dear Maurice,—Sincerely, John" letter.

The conclusion I should like to draw from that is that the Leader of the Government in the Senate is very much carrying the torch on this and will urge his colleagues to present the program to the cabinet just as quickly as possible for the farmers who did, in good faith, grow that crop in 1983.

Senator Roblin: I would be surprised if "Dear Maurice" receives another "Dear John" letter very soon. All I can say is that I can give no undertakings—and I repeat that I can give no undertakings—to my honourable friend as to what the results of the policy study will be. All I can tell my honourable friend is that this is being considered. I think it is also fair to say that there is a delegation of sugar-beet people in town today and undoubtedly they will be seeing the minister on this question. I must tell my colleague that the matter has not yet been settled.

Senator Olson: But you are going to bat for her, and that is important.

INDUSTRY

NEW BRUNSWICK—CLOSURE OF STAR-KIST PLANT— GOVERNMENT ACTION—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate will recall that I asked a question yesterday about his comments in reply to my question of October 1.

At that time, 17 days ago, I asked whether the government had a plan to let the workers at the Star-Kist plant in St. Andrew's keep their jobs.

Readers of Quorum will have noted today on page 4 an article saying that Mr. Nielsen, the Deputy Prime Minister and Acting Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, stated yesterday after the Conservative caucus meeting that he would discuss the closure of the plant with various officials to assess the possibilities of providing assistance to the workers laid off at this plant.

I raised this issue 17 days ago. The unfavourable effects of this bad publicity could already be foreseen as well as the negative impact this would have on the jobs in St. Andrew's.

Seventeen days have gone by. Apparently, the government has not yet examined the important question of preserving the jobs still remaining in New Brunswick.

Can the Leader of the Government give us any fresh news about this matter today?

That is my question, honourable senators.

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I took notice, as my honourable friend did, that the minister in charge of Fisheries is looking into this matter, and I know that he is proceeding to do that. I have no further information on the point at the present time.

THE SENATE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS— ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Davey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the Senate authorize arrangements for radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and those of its committees,

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, that the motion be not now adopted, but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): If other honourable senators wish to speak on this motion at any time, I ask them to please signify their intention to do so. I intend to speak to it, but I do not want to hold it up in any way.

Order stands.

THE CABINET

ACCESS TO INFORMATION—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Davey calling the attention of the Senate to the Government's preoccupation with secrecy.—(Honourable Senator Davey).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I stated yesterday that I expected Senator

Davey to deal with this order today. He will not be doing so and his absence may have something to do with a certain event in Toronto last evening. In any case, he is not prepared to proceed today and will deal with it next Tuesday, or the following one, depending on what happens when we revert to Notices of Motions.

Senator Doody: There are varying degrees of being reborn.

Senator Roblin: Tell him that he had better have a darn good reason!

Order stands.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE PIERRE ELLIOTT TRUDEAU, P.C.

RECORD OF ADMINISTRATION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès rose, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, September 17, 1985.

That he will call the attention of the Senate to an examination of Mr. Trudeau's record.

He said: Honourable senators, tomorrow, October 18, is the birthday of the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau. To the delight of his friends he is in fine fettle. His muscles, when one pats his arm, are of iron. Girls turn to look at him, admirably, in the street.

His mind is sharp, as always. His wit sparkles, as always. His grace and class are, as always, unparalleled. He inquires, affectionately, about former companions or antagonists.

He does not stoop to criticize those who have followed him. He continues in his way, stoic, never blaming others. At meetings with former associates, he never indulges in the sterile second-guessing of anyone. He talks of issues, national and international—of their essence, not of their partisan aspects. He still asks the three questions that Canada must ask, the three questions to which Mr. Trudeau devoted his life: How do we survive? How do we prosper? How do we remain ourselves? The specific answers to those questions, he says, are difficult and changing because the world changes. How we answer is fluid; what we answer is not.

● (1420)

Peace is how we survive. The pursuit of the means to control the arms race is more vital to survival than any military contribution by a small power. When one is the best friend and neighbour of a giant who is also one's main protector, a difficult balancing act must be achieved between offering help and offering good, but not necessarily welcome, advice. Here, Pierre Elliott Trudeau gave much of himself to this important task.

On the matter of keeping Canada prosperous, the 15-year record from 1968 to 1983 inclusive is there for all to see in the statistics of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development. Fifteen years is a term long enough to establish a trend. It is such long term trends that are significant, not short term blips on the chart. During those 15 years after 1968, many of them turbulent for the world economy, the Canadian economy grew, on average, by 3.4 per cent per year. That is a faster rate than that of the United States, Germany, Italy or the United Kingdom, and a rate equivalent to that of France. Among summit countries, only Japan recorded a higher growth rate; indeed, the average growth rate for these six countries was just under 3 per cent. Put another way, the size of the Canadian economy increased by 64 per cent between 1968 and 1983, or by almost 10 per cent more than the average of the other six most powerful western economies.

There were in excess of 3 million more Canadians employed in 1983 than in 1968. That is an increase of 42 per cent. The comparable average for the other six summit nations is only 15 per cent. In other words, Canada, under Pierre Trudeau, created new jobs at about three times the rate of its major economic partners. By the end of August, 1985, the current government had been in office one year. Canadian employment in those 12 months grew at a rate of 2.65 per cent. In Mr. Trudeau's last August to August period, 1982 to 1983, at the trough of the recession, employment grew at a rate of 3.1 per cent. He does not bother to remind anyone of this.

Canada's record for absorbing new workers into the economy was remarkable over the Trudeau period, especially as regards women. In 1968, 2.5 million women, or 37 per cent of working-age women in Canada, were employed. In 1983, these figures had risen to 4.5 million, which constitutes 52.6 per cent of working-age women.

This spectacular rise in female employment contributed to the fact that Canada's labour force grew far faster than that of any of the OECD countries. This helps to explain why Canada's unemployment rate in 1982 was then 3.7 times that of 1968. In contrast, the labour forces of the six other major OECD countries grew at half the Canadian rate, yet their unemployment rate grew 2.8 times over the same period.

Prior to the first 1973 oil shock, inflation in Canada was somewhat lower than the average for the summit nations. Over the period following this, through the second oil shock, domestic inflation rose to an annual average of 9.4 per cent, only slightly above the 9.1 per cent average for the major OECD countries. However, in the post-recession period, Canada's inflation rate fell faster than that of almost all OECD countries. Mr. Trudeau left us an inflation rate of 4 per cent.

Per capita disposable income after taxes and inflation—a widely used measure of standard of living—grew about 60 per cent in Canada in the Trudeau years. This is well above the 44 per cent increase in Canada over the previous 15-year period, and compares extremely favourably to the 35 per cent increase in the U.S. over the same period.

Canadians in every region of Canada shared in these real income gains, and, next to Albertans, residents in the poorest provinces saw their incomes grow at the highest rate. This tremendous growth in real income has also financed a 74 per cent increase, over and above inflation, in consumer spending, as well as the construction of more than 3 million new homes.

[Senator Gigant]

Contrary to public belief, Canada devoted a larger share of its gross national product to business investment than most of the other summit countries during Mr. Trudeau's years.

As to how we remain ourselves, Pierre Elliott Trudeau had a very clear perception of who we were, federally bilingual, nationally multicultural. He saw diversity and freedom as the foundations of unity. He was ready to fight for his vision. Even those who disagree with this vision do not doubt the strength and tenacity with which he pursued it.

He cared deeply also for the freedom of the individual, and there is a solid legislative record to illustrate this care. There is the Constitution and the Charter, and much more. He wanted a nation under the law, and when lawlessness challenged, he stood firm. Let me quote from the column in last Sunday's Toronto Star by Professor Anthony Westell of Carleton University. The title is "History 101," and it says:

This being the 15th anniversary of the October Crisis in Quebec, we are being treated to rewrites and reinterpretations of those historic events. The terrorists are now quite often presented as misguided Boy Scouts who have settled down to lead useful and respectable lives and, in some cases, have become public heroes. Pierre Trudeau, on the other hand, passes into popular history as the autocratic Prime Minister who sent the troops to occupy Quebec, imposed the dictatorship of the War Measures Act, and arrested all the real patriots in Montreal. Well, it wasn't like that at all.

The FLQ had been active in Quebec for years before the kidnapping of British Trade Commissioner James Cross in October, 1970. Terrorist bombs had killed seven people and injured others. Plans to kidnap first the Israeli consul and then the U. S. consul had been discovered and foiled in time. The terrorist objectives were always the same: To seize a hostage and demand the release of bombers and murderers already in jail—just as Palestinian terrorists seized a liner—and demanded the release of their friends in jail in Israel.

Hon. David Walker: While my honourable friend is on the subject of statistics, can he tell us the increase in the debt, year by year, or, if that will take too long, the total debt increase during the 16-year period that Mr. Trudeau held power?

Senator Gigantès: I shall be glad to do that in the next instalment of this speech. I will devote it to answering your question, sir. There will be many opportunities. I still have something close to 13 years in the Senate, and I shall be speaking on this subject repeatedly and will address myself to your question, sir. I am glad you brought it up.

Professor Westell went on to say:

The FLQ hoped also to foment a socialist revolution that would separate Quebec from Canada, and they won a disturbing measure of support from romantic intellectuals, excitable students, and radical labour leaders. The Quebec government took the situation seriously enough to request troops to support the police, and, under the law, the federal government had no option but to send the soldiers to Montreal—The later proclamation of the War Measures Act also was done at the request of the Quebec government and of the municipal and police authorities of Montreal—

● (1430)

Professor Westell continued:

One can still have a good argument about whether the use of the War Measures Act was justified, but there is no room for argument at all about who were the thoroughly bad guys and who were the good guys—

Then there were Mr. Trudeau's intangible achievements. He contributed to making us less stuffy. He gave us panache. We discovered, through him, that, maybe, we were not tongue-tied hunks in mountie scarlet but quite dashing, deep down.

There were those who hated him and those who loved him. But there was none who was left indifferent, and that indicates a great contribution to public life. He brought public life closer to the centre of our private lives. "That's how it should be," Pericles said, 25 centuries ago, in the Golden Age of Greece, according to Thucydides whose history Pitt the Elder called "the manual of statesmen."

On motion of Senator Gigantès, debate adjourned.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

NOTICE OF SUBCOMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, with regard to the meeting of the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs which is due to take place when the Senate rises or at 4 o'clock, it now appears that we will be able to move the meeting forward to about 3.15 p.m., in Room 356-S.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we have now had an opportunity to discuss the matter of the adjournment. We have agreed that the work of the committees must not be impeded—and I am sure that honourable senators will join with me in ensuring that we have full membership at committee meetings. So, after consultation and by agreement with our separated brothers and sisters across the floor, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g):

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, 29th October, 1985, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before we adjourn and arising out of the motion we have just passed, I should point out that the Internal Economy Committee is scheduled to hold its regular meeting next Tuesday at 9.30 in the morning. There are three reasons for trying to re-schedule that meeting for 2.30 in the afternoon of that day. The Senate will not be sitting and this will open up that time slot for us. The other two reasons are that it will accommodate the Speaker, who is chairman of the committee, and it will remove the conflict between that committee's meeting and the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee meeting scheduled for 9.30 the same morning. I, for one, would like to attend both committee meetings and there may be others who feel the same way. So, if honourable senators are planning to attend the Internal Economy Committee meeting next Tuesday, it may not be at 9.30 but at 2.30. We shall try to get definite word around as quickly as possible, and I ask committee members to check with their secretaries.

STATUS OF WOMEN

1985 PERSONS AWARDS

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, on October 18, 1929, women in Canada won the legal right to become senators. This victory was won through the efforts of the "famous five" Alberta women: Emily Murphy, Louise McKinney, Nellie McClung, Irene Parlby and Henrietta Muir Edwards. These five women signed the petition that requested an amendment to the British North America Act to grant women "persons" status.

The Persons Awards, which recognize outstanding contributions made towards improving the status of women in Canada, began in 1979, to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the Persons Case.

Today Her Excellency the Governor General will present this award to six persons at Government House. The recipients are Grace Hartman, of Willowdale, Ontario; Marguerite Bergeron-Tremblay, of Alma, Quebec; Nazla L. Dane, of Toronto, Ontario; Evelyn O'Bomsawin-Lamirande, of Tracy, Quebec; Gemma Pelletier Caron, of Campbellton, New Brunswick; and Pearl Steen, of Vancouver, British Columbia.

These recipients continue the tradition of courage, integrity and hard work toward improving the status of women in Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, October 29, 1985 at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, October 29, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Guy Charbonneau, Speaker, in the Chair.

Prayers.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

29 October 1985

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that The Right Honourable Brian Dickson, The Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber to-day, the 29th day of October, 1985, at 4.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be

Sir,

Your obedient servant,

Esmond Butler

Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable

The Speaker of the Senate

Ottawa

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think this is an appropriate time at which to raise a point of order and procedure. Noting that the first item of business on the Scroll is the Royal Assent notice and then looking at the Orders of the Day and the business before the Senate, we find that the only item of legislation requiring us to sit here in the chamber is Order No. 1 dealing with Bill C-73, to validate certain ordinances of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. Senator Lucier is ready to proceed for our side on that matter today. He has told me that, essentially, he will recommend support for that bill and there would seem to be no reason why we should not give it third reading today.

That would mean that we would have virtually no business for the rest of this week, for next week and perhaps even for the week after that. By that, I mean there will be no business for the Senate in the Senate chamber.

On an earlier occasion, I mentioned that, in my opinion, we are proceeding in a very desirable way when we keep our committees active even when the Senate is not sitting in the chamber and that we stop what has been, I think, an undesirable practice—and I know in the past I have participated in and supported this very practice—of scheduling a Senate sitting just for the sake of the committees when there is really no business for the Senate to consider. It seems to me that all sides agree that that is not desirable.

I mention this matter at this stage because, in the normal course, when we finish Royal Assent there will be a motion for adjournment and that adjournment will be until tomorrow unless we do something about it in the meantime. It may be that we should consider not specifying an adjournment date for the Senate, but instead should attempt to find a way to consult on a procedure for calling a Senate sitting when the government is able to tell us that there is sufficient business for us to deal with here in the chamber. This will not affect in any the sittings of committees in the meantime.

We have the opportunity of talking about that matter right now, or, in the alternative, consulting between now and when the adjournment motion is made at the end of the day.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I fully appreciate what the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has said. I agree that there is very little government business, as such, before the Senate as a legislative chamber at this point.

However, a great deal of work is being done by the committees. As a matter of fact, I should like to congratulate honourable senators for their attendance at committee meetings last week when the Senate stood adjourned. I should like it on the record that the committee work went on not only at the normal rate, but that those meetings were over-attended in comparison to what we are used to. I think that augurs well for the suggestion Senator Frith has made.

At the moment I am not prepared to say that we should adjourn, until we are informed of the business coming from the other place. I know that there is a great deal of government legislation in the new legislative apparatus that has been established in the House of Commons. I cannot say when that legislation will surface or how quickly it will come before the Senate. I should like to have an opportunity to discuss the format of that with the government caucus and I assume that either Senator Frith has already done that with his caucus or would like the same opportunity.

At this moment I agree that there is no purpose in bringing honourable senators back after Royal Assent later this day for the balance of this week. I think we should adjourn until Tuesday, November 5. In the meantime, I will discuss this matter with Senator Frith, and perhaps Senators Roblin and MacEachen would like to discuss the matter. I am not prepared to make a commitment now as to an open-ended adjournment, but can say that when we adjourn this afternoon we probably will adjourn until Tuesday, November 5.

LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA (CANADA SECTION) AND THE EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH OF CANADA

PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the following petition:

Of the Lutheran Church in America—Canada Section, having its head office in the City of Winnipeg, in the Province of Manitoba, and The Evangelical Lutheran Church of Canada, having its head office in the City of Saskatoon, in the Province of Saskatchewan; praying for the passage of an Act for the purpose of permitting them to amalgamate.

Honourable senators, I have a special request to make in view of the discussion that took place a few moments ago respecting the adjournment and the recalling of the Senate. Normally, the Examiner of Petitions would examine the petition I have just presented and report on that tomorrow. Following his report to the Senate after "Reading of Petitions," I would, in the normal course of events, ask leave to present a bill. In view of the discussion that we have just had to the effect that we shall not sit tomorrow, I wonder if it would be possible to expedite the examination of this petition and have it reported to the chamber today. Then we could revert to "Reading of Petitions" today, which would provide the background or necessary preliminaries in order to present a bill. If we are going to adjourn for an indefinite time—however long that may be—it would be useful for honourable senators who are interested in it to have the bill presented so that they can study it.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

THIRD REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the Third Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, No. 30, respecting the illegality of certain rules governing the registration of patent agents. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "B", p. 1417.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I move that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the Fourth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, No. 31, respecting the illegality of regulations which restrict the quantity of oil that may be carried on board ships in the waters of Head Harbour Passage, New Brunswick. I would ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "C", p. 1424.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I move that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. We have been waiting impatiently for some weeks to hear of the government's announcement of an assistance package for the drought stricken areas of western Canada. Information given in the House of Commons was that this matter was to be dealt with by cabinet today. My question is: Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate say whether it has been dealt with? If so, when might an announcement be made?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can tell my honourable friend that it was dealt with today in a committee of cabinet. It may be referred to the full cabinet at its next meeting, which is very soon. I should point out to my honourable friend something that he is probably well aware of, which is that the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board made a statement the other day about assistance in grain drying, which is, I think, quite significant in that it involves an extra $3,000 interest-free advance over and above all of the other arrangements. It is interesting to note that about 95 per cent of that harvest is now in the bins, some of it a little damp.

Senator Argue: I appreciate those comments. That information, of course, is not news. People are waiting for an announcement. Do I take it that this item has passed the Priorities and Planning Committee and has gone on to be considered by the main cabinet, or will it go to some other committee of the cabinet of a lesser stratum?

Senator Roblin: I think that I had better content myself by saying that it is before a committee of cabinet. I cannot go further than that.

Senator Argue: If I may, I will ask the question again in another way: Will the cabinet be dealing with that matter today or at a later date?

Senator Roblin: I am not in a position to give a firm reply because I do not know, but I suspect that it will be dealt with at the next meeting of cabinet.

Senator Argue: That is, this week?

Senator Roblin: Yes.

METRIC CONVERSION

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, there has been some confusion in the marketplace concerning the metric conversion program. Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate bring us up to date on the policy of the government in connection with metric conversion?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there has been no change in the policy that was announced some time ago by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs; namely, that the metric policy is the policy of the country but that it is permissible to use the Imperial measure, provided that both are used together. I think the point that my honourable friend is concerned about is that we are still awaiting the regulation which sets out the details of that policy, and I have to admit that that is not yet ready.

CONDOMINIUM ORDINANCE VALIDATION BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bielish, for the second reading of the Bill C-73, intituled: "An Act to validate certain ordinances of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories".—(Honourable Senator Lucier).

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I am pleased to speak today in support of Bill C-73. While some honourable senators may feel that the bill affects only a small portion of Canada's population, we in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories fight very hard for the right to make our own decisions, and any legislation which enhances that right is welcomed with open arms.

Senator Marshall, in speaking to Bill C-73, gave an excellent background history of housing needs in the Yukon and Northwest Territories. Being a Newfoundlander, and coming from a province that knows hard times, Senator Marshall is obviously sympathetic to both northern territories, and I thank him for his understanding of our problems.

For those honourable senators who care to look at the map of Canada, they will find that this great country of ours is held together by the Yukon on the west and Newfoundland on the east; and, as they say in the commercial, "You are in good hands" as long as we are on each end of you.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lucier: As previously stated, Bill C-73 resolves a conflict in jurisdiction. It will allow territorial governments to pass new legislation dealing with condominiums and it will validate present legislation. Housing has always presented special problems in Canada's north. While northerners generally enjoy the open spaces, individual houses are very expensive to build and maintain. Sewer and water lines are buried from 12 to 13 feet deep and are still at risk of breakage because of the cold water running through them. That can certainly add to the cost of owning a house. These problems are very well known in the north. Digging lines through nine feet of frost at 50 below zero is a very difficult task, and it is also very expensive.

Condominiums and row housing permit many younger people, who normally could not afford to own a home, to purchase rather than rent. For that reason, Bill C-73 is very important to the two territories.

Honourable senators, Bill C-73 should also serve to point out another serious problem that we in the northern territories and other Canadians must deal with constantly. That problem is having to wait for 10 or 15 years for Parliament to pass legislation that is non-controversial.

As previously stated by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the member for Cochrane-Superior, and others, the federal and territorial governments have been concerned with this problem for some 17 years. As Senator Marshall stated in his earlier remarks:

The Northwest Territories in 1969 and the Yukon in 1968 passed ordinances that would have made it possible to register condominiums. Later, however, the federal Department of Justice formed the opinion that the Territories had gone beyond their authority and that their ordinances conflicted with the Land Titles Act.

First, we have a problem that everyone recognizes. Second, we have agreement from all parties on the solution to the problem, and agreement on all sides that it should be done quickly. Seventeen years later we finally have before us Bill C-73. Honourable senators, is this the best that we can do? There are 486 parliamentarians in Ottawa being paid to represent Canadian taxpayers. Are there not enough brains in that group to devise a method of dealing with non-controversial legislation that would serve taxpayers in a more efficient manner? While I understand the problems faced by any government in trying to pass a bill, there is no excuse for a fisherman in Newfoundland, a logger in British Columbia, a farmer in Alberta or a miner in the Yukon to have to wait five or ten years for a piece of legislation to which no one is objecting and of which everyone is in favour.

Honourable senators, I hope that Bill C-73 will serve two useful purposes. First, it will impart one more small degree of responsibility for legislation to the Yukon and Northwest Territories in their quest for self-government. Second, it can be held up as a model for all parliamentarians how not to solve a problem. Let us wake up and find a way to deal quickly with non-controversial legislation. We owe that much to the Canadian taxpayers.

In conclusion, I want to thank Senator Marshall and his government for finally putting an end to this problem. I can see no need for Bill C-73 to be referred to committee. In fact, I am prepared to give it second reading, third reading, Royal Assent and whatever it takes to get it out of the way today.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Jack Marshall, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY CONSULTATION PAPER ON TRAINING AND DOCUMENT ENTITLED "EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES: PREPARING CANADIANS FOR A BETTER FUTURE"

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to study and report upon the Consultation Paper on Training, issued by the Department of Employment and Immigration, tabled in the Senate on 11th December, 1984, and the document entitled "Employment Opportunities: Preparing Canadians for a Better Future", tabled at the First Ministers' Conference held in Regina, Saskatchewan, on 14th and 15th February, 1985; and

That the Committee be empowered to engage the services of such professional, clerical and technical personnel as may be required for the purpose of the said examination.—(Honourable Senator Phillips).

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I believe the Clerk Assistant got so enthused with reading the orders that he forgot to look to see if anyone was rising to speak on them. I would like to take a few moments on Order No. 13, if I may.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

● (1430)

Senator Phillips: I am sure that the reading from the order paper was much more interesting than my remarks will be. I was pleased to see that a Grit was taking an interest in the unemployed. As Senator Bonnell was making his remarks, I was thinking: "What a difference an election makes." In all fairness, I must say that there has been a considerable change in attitude on both sides of the house since September 4, 1984.

Senator McElman: You have certainly changed your attitude on a number of subjects.

Senator Phillips: We both have changed attitudes on a number of subjects, Senator McElman.

When Senator Frith was acting as verbal choreographer for the sponsor in assisting with his remarks, he included a number of items and perhaps I might read one or two of them to give you an idea of what they were. This item is found on page 879 of the Debates of the Senate. There, Senator Bonnell said:

It is a time when the unemployment rate is over 10 per cent of our workforce.

It is a time when those receiving welfare or social assistance is over 10 per cent of the population.

It is a time when many of our students are leaving high schools, colleges and universities with no jobs to go to.

It is a time when many of our young women have no employment and no means of support.

Senator Frith: Who are you quoting?

Senator Phillips: I am quoting Senator Bonnell's remarks. I am sure you recall putting those in for him.

I thought that those items sounded familiar. I was about to say it was the heritage of the previous government, because I seemed to be very familiar with the subject outlined there. Then I realized that those items came directly from a pamphlet issued by the Honourable Minister for Employment and Immigration in April of this year. It was, I think, quite a compliment to the minister to have her remarks quoted in detail.

The sponsor stated that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Employment and Immigration were considering changes in the Unemployment Insurance Regulations. Perhaps when Senator Bonnell replies, he would be good enough to explain that section of his remarks in a little more detail. I have checked the regulations and can find no changes that were made, and perhaps he would like to elaborate on what was concerning him in that regard.

The sponsor of the motion was obviously taken by the suggestion of the Minister of Employment and Immigration. He was intrigued that more training should occur in the workplace and that more training should occur in vocational schools, technical schools and that probably less emphasis should be put on university education. That has a certain merit. It is not a new idea, but is one I hope the committee will look at very carefully.

Senator Bonnell also referred to the use of the unemployment insurance systems in assisting those undergoing training. A couple of years ago, a young lady who was teaching an adult training class in Ottawa mentioned that one of her students was taking typing. This student attended for two hours in the morning and then attempted to find employment later on during the same day. She was disqualified by the unemployment insurance system because she was not available to search for employment. Yet here was an individual who had very few skills, was attempting to obtain them and was disqualified. I think that system was totally erroneous and I hope that it will be corrected under the new regime.

Recently, the federal government has signed an agreement with a number of provinces on the Canadian job strategy. I do not think I need bore the Senate with a great many details on that. However, briefly, the Canada Works Program has been terminated except for some 38 projects, including those of a long-term nature such as LEAD, which will probably have another two or three years to run.

The target groups are women re-entering the workforce, youth entering the workforce, native people, the disabled and visible minorities. There are several programs included in the job strategy. First, job entry. This section of the strategy concentrates on women and youth and on attempts to train them and have them gain job experience.

The second is job development, where we find a number of projects designed to provide employment and work experience. The participants can receive up to 52 weeks of training and experience. A new aspect of the program is that the emphasis is placed on the private sector. The funding is 10 per cent provincial, 30 per cent federal and 60 per cent private funding.

The third element in the job strategy is directed towards workers needing skill-updating; in other words, where someone has had some training as, for example, a machinist and requires further training. The plan is that he will receive this further training on the job and have training directed specifically towards that industry.

The fourth section deals with skill shortages. Companies with labour shortage in a specific skill can receive long-term funding to undertake training for individuals.

The fifth section deals with innovations. That simply means that if someone has a bright idea about their work, they can receive assistance in developing a pilot project and, if that pilot project is successful, then they can receive assistance in carrying on that project.

The sixth aspect of the Canadian job strategy deals with community futures. The sponsor mentioned the unfortunate situation where a one-industry town loses that industry and it is therefore necessary, then, to retrain individuals formerly employed in that industry.

Honourable senators, I believe it was in 1976 that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance undertook a study on the training programs carried on by Manpower at that time. I found a number of items in the Canadian job strategy that were recommended by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance in 1976. In particular the emphasis is placed on private industry. That Senate committee, in its report, emphasized that private industry had a place and a responsibility in training those seeking employment. I can recall Senator Hicks being interviewed on television and at the time he impressed me with the emphasis that he placed on the necessity of making sure that jobs were available in the trade for which an individual was being trained. The provinces have, for some time, criticized the federal programs in this regard. I hope that the new job strategy program will meet that requirement.

● (1440)

Honourable senators, I do not want to leave the idea with you that all the answers are found in the Canadian job strategy; I am sure they are not. However, it is a step forward, and I hope that the committee will take the time to look at all of the aspects of it.

I have delayed answering Senator Bonnell for some time in the hope that the federal government would be able to obtain the agreement of all of the provinces. I understand that Ontario and Alberta have yet to sign the agreement, and that the federal government is now commencing its negotiations with the territories in this regard.

I have no objection to the committee's studying the proposal. Honourable senators will find many recommendations incorporated in the strategy that were made by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance in 1976. I am sure honourable senators will find that there the government has shown respect for a Senate report, which is a rather unusual occurrence. I hope that the government will continue to look at Senate reports. They have been ignored too often in the past.

I am sure that honourable senators will be able to do an excellent job on this report, and wish them success in doing that very thing.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to.

THE CABINET

ACCESS TO INFORMATION—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Davey calling the attention of the Senate to the Government's preoccupation with secrecy.—(Honourable Senator Davey).

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I must begin by apologizing for such a long delay in closing this Inquiry, but there is an explanation; the government's penchant for secrecy has been overtaken by two other characteristics, the first that the "let's pretend Liberals" of Campaign '84 have now shown their true colours; this is a government of the rich, by the rich and for the rich.

Secondly, honourable senators, there truly is a P.C. Party, "P.C." standing for Perpetual Campaign; a government that is all public relations and no policy.

There can be no better proof or no better example of the government's ongoing commitment to secrecy than the matter I want to discuss today. I refer to the government's plan for a mammoth omnibus public opinion survey which, believe it or not, is to be paid for by the people of Canada who will not—and I repeat, who will not—be allowed to see the results.

Senator Steuart: Shame!

Senator Godfrey: Unbelievable!

Senator Davey: Unless, of course, they are in the cabinet, the Prime Minister's Office, or the Tory high command, and, as we all know, frequently they are the same people. I think this is a mind-boggling concept. I think it is sheer, utter and devastating gall. I think it is one of the most crass examples of political opportunism that I have ever seen.

Many Tories have traditionally opposed polling. My friend, Bob Coates, sought for years to ban public opinion polls, but the Tories have banned him instead. An even more vocal critic of polling is the Honourable Sinclair Stevens, who is the Minister of Everything, except Erik Nielsen. It is true that some thoughtful journalists and some thoughtful politicians do worry about political polling. My own viewpoint, honourable senators, is very different. Let me state clearly—not for the first time, not just in the wake of victory, but with equal commitment after our defeat in 1984—that I believe any move to ban or limit the use of public opinion polls anywhere, anytime, would be intellectually dishonest, undemocratic, naive and against the best interests of the ordinary citizen.

Freedom cannot be divided; freedom is indivisible. Either you have freedom or you do not have freedom, and if we have it, then surely it includes the right to publish public opinion polls. As a matter of fact, it strikes me that the polling of public opinion is the very essence of what democracy is all about. Those who think otherwise must surely tremble at the prospect of impending technology in this area, and what that could mean in terms of direct democracy.

What about politicians who find out scientifically what people want and then set about pledging themselves to do that? Well, most politicians—an overwhelming majority in all parties, in the Tory Party, in the New Democratic Party and in the Liberal Party—are above that kind of cynicism. Would Ed Broadbent reject his socialistic roots to win Westmount, London West, Vancouver or Vancouver Quadra? Would Pierre Elliott Trudeau have rejected language rights to win a few votes some place in Canada?

Senator Steuart: Saskatoon!

Senator Davey: Certainly not. For that matter, no poll in the world could convince the Honourable Sinclair Stevens to forsake his version of right-wing Ronald Reagan Tory orthodoxy, and I respect the minister for that. But what this government is pursuing is something quite different, quite insidious, quite dangerous. It is not public opinion polling at all; it is private polling of public opinion, very private, but at public expense. I believe it is very wrong.

Now, 1,500 Canadians will be polled each month. How much will this cost? We do not know that; nobody knows that. My guess is approximately $10 million a year at a minimum. What we do know is why it is being done; it is being done to allow this government to play political games. Clearly, there is evidence in recent weeks that this government needs all the help it can get, but at what cost, honourable senators, to the democratic process?

Most of us in this chamber have always considered the public's right to know as an integral part of democracy, but this new Orwellian polling concept completely smothers the public's right to know.

Yes, of course, there can be room for abuse. Polls can be misused to support a point of view, to confirm a prejudice; questions can be rigged, samples can be custom-tailored. In other words, polls can be manipulated by unscrupulous practitioners.

Senator Phillips: Are you speaking from experience?

Senator Davey: I have four major concerns. My first concern is, assuming this government retains some small vestige of decency, how will the polls differentiate between what information goes to the government and what information goes to the Tory Party? Whom can we trust on this matter? The problem becomes even more acute should the pollster happen to work for the party and for the government. Again, whom can we trust?

My second concern is, will all the results of all the polling be available under freedom of information legislation, and if so, how quickly? After all, information which the government may direct to the Progressive Conservative Party presumably would never be available under freedom of information although paid for by the people of Canada.

● (1450)

Third, how can we assure that the government will not build questions into the sample, requested by the Progressive Conservative Party, and which, even if paid for by that party, would dramatically reduce the full costs which they would otherwise pay? Again, how do we know whom we can trust?

Fourth, and finally, how on earth will this system work? What will be done with all this information? Who will receive it? For that matter, who will not receive it? Who will make that call? Precisely what role will the PMO play in this new mammoth polling?

Honourable senators should realize that this monstrous Tory superpoll, closed to the public but paid for by that same public, is no longer in the planning stages. The Department of Supply and Services Professional Services Branch closed bidding on August 30, two months ago, and as of yesterday—because I checked—no winner has been announced. Maybe the fine minds in the Prime Minister's Office are having second thoughts after all. It is enough to make even Allan Gregg get goose bumps. Do not be too surprised if Gregg picks up this $10 million contract. Indeed, be surprised if Gregg does not pick up this $10 million contract because the Tory Party's off-again on-again love affair with Allan Gregg is once again in full bloom, and so it should be. Gregg is a highly-skilled professional pollster with great integrity. Obviously, he has either not been listened to very much recently or he is not tuned in to recent events.

At a time when polling is becoming more and more sophisticated, I urge this government to share the wealth and information with the people of Canada. Don't just talk about letting the sun shine in, but let it actually shine in.

Finally, the leader will understand if I pursue this matter in Question Period because certainly there are a number of pointed questions which, in my judgment, must be answered.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

CANADA'S RELATIONS WITH COUNTRIES OF MIDDLE EAST AND NORTH AFRICA

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 7.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Second Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, entitled: "Canada's Relations with the Countries of the Middle East and North Africa", tabled in the Senate on 26th June, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Nurgitz).

[Senator Davey.]

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Hicks. I trust that that does not take away my right, following the comments of Senator Hicks, to adjourn the debate.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I agree to speak on that basis. Senator Nurgitz commenced the discussion of this report some days ago and then adjourned the debate in his own name. If he does not wish to resume, I merely wish to participate by saying how much I appreciated the support of members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and, particularly, the members of the subcommittee who visited the Middle East approximately two years ago after having made me their chairman due to the illness of Senator van Roggen who was, unfortunately, unable to go to the Middle East at that time.

This was an extraordinarily difficult subject to pursue. There were passionately held views on more than two sides of the problem that we went to investigate. We had a committee that worked well together which tried very hard to get to the heart of the contentious matters that were involved in relationships in the Middle East, particularly the relationships between the Arab population and the Israelis, but also the difficulties in the relationships between different factions of the Arab and Palestinian groups.

I feel very grateful for the support which members of the committee who attended and visited the five countries with me, namely Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Jordan and Israel, gave to me because I felt that I was thrust into the position of being leader of the group without adequate preparation. I had thought that the leader of the group was going to be Senator van Roggen but I was called upon to take his place and I could not have done the job which was done, I hope adequately, if it had not been for the kind of support that I had from other members of the committee.

The subcommittee made a report on our visit which, I think, was well received by all who read it and, subsequently, the committee, after a great deal of work and compromise, made a report which was tabled in the Senate by Senator van Roggen some time ago. I feel that this declaration of Canada's relations with countries of the Middle East represents a real accomplishment, although I am quite aware that we could not achieve a complete consensus and what we had to say could not please everyone. I think it is interesting reading and a worthwhile contribution to the knowledge of Canada's relationships with the Middle East.

I rise only to make these comments and to thank my colleagues on the committee for the support that they gave to me and for their hard work in order to arrive at an almost satisfactory compromise in relation to the contentious difficulties which we inquired into in our study of Canada's relations with the Middle East.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I appreciate that if I speak now this will conclude the debate, and I should simply like to say that I have nothing further to add to the remarks I made at the time that I tabled the report, and to the remarks just made by Senator Hicks.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to participate, this order is considered as having been debated.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, November 5, 1985, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to say a word about the motion.

As honourable senators who were present at the commencement of our sitting today will infer, Senator Doody, Senator MacEachen and I have consulted on this question of the adjournment of the Senate until Tuesday next since there is no Senate chamber business to be dealt with.

We will possibly be consulting about an even longer adjournment of the Senate itself while awaiting legislation. We are advised by Senator Doody that there is a chance of some legislation reaching us next week. That is the reason we are adjourning until November 5.

Honourable senators will understand, however, that, although the Senate is adjourned, Senate committees will be meeting. First, on behalf of Senator Neiman, I point out that agreement to the adjournment motion will have the effect of rendering meaningless the time set for the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to meet on Wednesday because it is provided that that committee will sit "when the Senate rises." I am informed now by Senator Neiman that that committee will meet in Room 356-S at 3.30 tomorrow afternoon.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is scheduled to meet tomorrow at 3 p.m.; the Special Joint Committee on Canada's International Relations at 4 p.m.; the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs at 3.30 p.m.; the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet again at 8 p.m.; and the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs will also meet at 8 p.m. Senate committees will also be meeting on Thursday morning.

On that basis, we support the motion.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet, in any case, on Wednesday afternoon and Wednesday evening. Since the Senate is adjourning, a slot has been left open on Thursday afternoon. I am attempting to fill that slot with an important witness whose name was suggested to me a few minutes ago by the steering committee. I will advise members of the committee of the details of this in due course.

In any case, the committee will be sitting on Tuesday, Wednesday and possibly Thursday of next week.

Senator Frith: Has a time been scheduled for the Thursday afternoon meeting?

Senator Murray: If the meeting is held, it will be held at 2 o'clock.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Perhaps Senator Murray would inform me if the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet at 8 o'clock tomorrow evening.

Senator Murray: Yes, it will.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, last week Senator Molson mentioned that there had been a rescheduling of committees and that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce would be meeting at 8 o'clock, which might mean that the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, which was also to meet at that time, may have difficulty with membership attendance. The alternative was to revert to our practice of recent weeks and suggest that the committee sit when the Senate rises.

Obviously, that alternative is no longer available to us, so we are left in the dilemma where two committees will be meeting at 8 o'clock. I would, therefore, make a special plea to members who are interested in the order of reference to the committee to examine and report upon the activities of the National Film Board with respect to the production and distribution of the film, "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss," to make every effort to attend the committee meeting.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, that underlines the difficulty of having these unexpected recesses. They do cause some confusion with the scheduling of committees. Obviously, it would be far better from an organizational point of view if we could have some notice of these adjournments. I am sure that would make life much more pleasant for our committee chairmen.

Unfortunately, the state of the art of legislation forwarding from the House of Commons has not reached a degree of efficiency that allows us to do that at this stage. There are a number of bills going through the new legislative committee system, and we have been told that at least one of those, perhaps as many as three, will be sent to us next week.

In anticipation of that message from the other place, we have suggested that we adjourn until next Tuesday, November 5.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

● (1510)

At 4.50 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Right Honourable Brian Dickson, The Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to authorize procurement of the dissolution of certain Crown corporations and to amend or repeal other Acts in consequence thereof (Bill C-60, Chapter 41)

An Act to amend the Customs Tariff (Bill C-71, Chapter 42)

An Act to amend the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security Act and certain other Acts in relation thereto (Bill C-69, Chapter 43)

An Act to amend the Criminal Code (pari-mutuel betting) (Bill C-77, Chapter 44)

An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to make a related amendment to the Tax Court of Canada Act (Bill C-72, Chapter 45)

An Act to validate certain ordinances of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories (Bill C-73, Chapter 46)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

• (1700)

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

PRIVATE BILL

EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN CANADA

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, close to the commencement of today's proceedings Senator Olson presented a petition with regard to a bill. The normal procedure is for the Examiner to examine the petition and certify its correctness, following which the Senate would proceed with the bill. That usually takes one day. However, I believe the examiner's report is now available.

Since the bill deals with the amalgamation of two churches, we are asking leave for Senator Olson to present the bill, to give it second reading, and to have it sent to committee for consideration. Normally such a bill is not debated at any great length on second reading.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Your Honour, I think it is necessary to revert to "Reading of Petitions."

[Senator Doody.]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

A Clerk at the Table read the following petition:

Petition from the Lutheran Church in America—Canada Section, having its head office in the City of Winnipeg, in the Province of Manitoba, and The Evangelical Lutheran Church of Canada, having its head office in the City of Saskatoon, in the Province of Saskatchewan; praying for the passage of an Act for the purpose of permitting them to amalgamate.

Senator Argue: Is this a Canadianization bill?

Senator Olson: Yes, partly.

FIRST READING

Hon. H. A. Olson presented Bill S-5, to provide for the creation by amalgamation of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I ask that the bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Olson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Argue, that this bill be read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, may I say at the outset that I appreciate the leave granted by honourable senators for this purpose, and I owe a brief explanation of why it is important that this action be taken now. The two churches have already agreed to the amalgamation. The effective date is January 1, 1986. However, there are a number of actions that are required to be taken before that date. Had we proceeded earlier today to follow the normal procedure, there would have been no problem. But now that we are about to adjourn for some days, it raises the question of having all these procedures completed in time. Therefore I want senators to know how much I appreciate their co-operation. At the same time, I believe I must make a short speech to go into the record, supporting the reasons for this amalgamation.

Honourable senators, it is with great pleasure that I rise today to move second reading of Bill S-5, to provide for the creation by amalgamation of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada.

The petitioners for the bill are the Lutheran Church in America—Canada Section and the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada. These churches, having had a lengthy history of co-operation in a wide range of areas of church life, established the Lutheran Merger Commission. The terms of the merger were agreed upon, which terms have since been ratified at a convention of each church body. In each case, a majority of approximately 87 per cent voted in favour of the merger. Two of the terms of the merger agreement are that the new church is to be called the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada and that the merger is to take place on January 1, 1986. As the merging churches both currently exist in law by virtue of private acts of the Parliament of Canada, the purpose of the bill is to replace those old private acts with a new one that will provide the legislative framework under which these two churches may amalgamate their corporate structures.

A brief explanation of who your petitioners are would now seem to be called for. Both bodies have their origin in the Protestant Reformation movement of the sixteenth century, and in particular to the leadership in religious reformation of Martin Luther, whose name each of the petitioners and the new church will bear. After the Augsburg Confession of 1530, political support for the Reformation spread and state churches were created, first in the German territories and then in the Scandinavian countries including Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Finland and Iceland.

Following successive waves of immigration, first to the United States and later to Canada, a number of Lutheran Church bodies were formed largely following ethnic lines, but also guided by standards of piety within these ethnic groupings. In Canada, organized Lutheran congregations date back to the founding of Halifax in 1749 when German tradesmen, who had earlier settled in England, accompanied Governor Cornwallis to the new fortress. Soon there followed to Nova Scotia a large contingent of settlers recruited in Europe who located largely in Lunenburg county.

Following the American revolution, German Lutherans were among the United Empire Loyalists and founded congregations on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, and subsequently, when Upper Canada came into being, near the capital of York, which, of course, is present day Toronto.

Eventually these congregations and others, which sprang up subsequently in German settlements throughout southern Ontario and beyond, affiliated with Lutheran Church bodies which had begun to be formed in the United States. By the time German and Scandinavian immigrants began to flow into western Canada, not only from Europe but also from the United States, Lutheran Church bodies of these various ethnic groups had formed in the United States and sent missionary pastors to organize these scattered Lutherans into congregations as well.

As the various Lutheran Church bodies underwent acculturation to North America, some of their earlier differences became less significant and they began to amalgamate. By 1960 the American Lutheran Church came into being, which brought together three church bodies which had emerged out of Norwegian, Danish and German ethnic backgrounds respectively. Three years later a further Lutheran body, Norwegian in background, also joined the new church. In 1960 the Canada District of the merging American Lutheran Church located in western Canada was incorporated by the Statutes of Canada under the name of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Canada. Then, in 1967, the Canadian wing of this church became structurally separate from its American body, continuing as the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Canada and now including several additional congregations of the American Lutheran Church in eastern Canada.

About the same time, developments were under way for the formation in 1962 of another major Lutheran body which assumed the name of the Lutheran Church in America. Bringing together four church bodies which had emerged from Swedish, Danish, German and Finnish backgrounds respectively, the Lutheran Church in America made constitutional provision for its Canadian wing by providing for a Lutheran Church in America—Canada Section.

The Canada Section, while not structurally separate from the American body, was given responsibility to act for the Lutheran Church in America in Canadian matters including responsibility to negotiate and consummate an amalgamation with another church body in Canada. In 1966, the Lutheran Church in America—Canada Section, while still remaining structurally part of the Lutheran Church in America, was incorporated by Statutes of Canada.

● (1710)

Honourable senators, I now turn to the contents of the bill. The bill is not a very complicated one. It begins by providing that the petitioners may amalgamate. The remaining provisions simply provide for the objects, capacities and powers of the new corporate entity, its membership and management, its by-laws and its rights and obligations as a successor company. You will appreciate that these provisions must fuse the traditions of the church in these matters, as set out in the constitution and by-laws of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada, with the normal requirements of law for the protection of members and the public.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Olson, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, November 5, 1985, at 2 p.m.

NATIONAL FINANCE

NINTH REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE
REPORT ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) LAID BEFORE PARLIAMENT FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1986

TUESDAY, October 29, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

NINTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1986, were referred, in obedience to the Order of Reference of May 29, 1985, submits its final report as follows:

On June 11, 1985, the Committee tabled an interim report on these Supplementary Estimates in which it addressed a range of issues. In that report, the Committee indicated that it intended to examine further an item in those Supplementary Estimates that is directly related to international financial arrangements arising from Vote L2a - Financial and Economic Policies in accordance with the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act. In so doing it heard from the following witnesses:

Thursday, June 13, 1985

From the Department of Finance:

Mr. G.E. Shannon, Senior Assistant Deputy Minister;
Mr. Guy Glorieux, General Director;
Mr. Peter Brakel, Chief, International Finance;
Mr. Brian Hunter, Officer.

Wednesday, October 16, 1985

From the Department of External Affairs:

The Honourable James Kelleher, P.C., M.P., Minister for International Trade;
Mr. W.A. Dymond, Senior adviser and Coordinator, Canada/U.S. Trade Task Force.

This was the first opportunity the Committee had to review Canada's financial arrangement with the World Bank and other international regional development banks. Two hearings took place after Bill C-30, "An Act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreement Act", received Royal Assent on May 16, 1985, and brought into law major changes in the way Parliament addresses these international development financial institutions.

One change of interest to the Committee provided the Senate and the House of Commons with the opportunity, at Estimates time, to assess and decide upon Canada's contribution to these institutions. It was as a result of this amendment that the Committee met to discuss the financial support to the international development financial institutions under Supplementary Estimates (A), 1985-86.

These hearings revealed two issues concerning Canada's responsibilities to international development. The first was consideration of the way Canada internally divides its responsibilities regarding the World Bank Group and the regional development banks among its Ministers. Currently the Minister of Finance is responsible for the World Bank Group while the Secretary of State for External Affairs is responsible for the regional development banks. Yet both the regional banks and the World Bank Group engage in development activities. The only rationale forthcoming from officials regarding this apparent division of responsibilities was historical precedent.

The second issue was Canada's position regarding the coordination of activities of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank Group. At the Seven-Nation Economic Conference (Bonn Summit) in May, the leaders of these nations, including Canada, called for improved cooperation between the IMF and the World Bank Group to encourage sound long-term development. The Committee was left with the impression that Canada had considerable work to do to ensure that its own IMF activities were better coordinated with its World Bank activities. Furthermore some senators felt that Canada could play a stronger role on the international scene and give greater attention to meeting the commitment made at Bonn.

At the end of these hearings the Committee was left with the impression that the two issues addressed in this report deserve considerably more attention and should become the subject-matter of a Parliamentary review.

Respectfully submitted,

FERNAND-E. LEBLANC,
Chairman.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

THIRD REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

TUESDAY, October 29, 1985

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its

THIRD REPORT

(Statutory Instruments No. 30)

1. In accordance with its permanent reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 38, and section 19(3) of the Statute Revision Act, S.C. 1974-75-76, c. 20, your Committee has determined to draw to the special attention of both Houses sections 152 to 158 of the Patent Rules, C.R.C. 1978, c. 1250, as amended.

2. Section 15 of the Patent Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. P-4, requires the keeping of a Register of Patent Agents on which are to be entered the names of all persons entitled to represent applicants in the presentation and prosecution of applications for patents before the Patent Office. Sections 152 to 158 of the Patent Rules deal with the qualifications required of those whose names are entered on the Register, the holding of qualifying examinations, the eligibility criteria to be met by those who sit for an examination, and the circumstances in which the name of a person may be removed from the Register. These provisions were enacted by the Governor in Council pursuant to section 12(1)(a) of the Act. For the reasons detailed in this Report, your Committee is of the view that regulations governing the registration of patent agents are to be made by the Commissioner of Patents pursuant to section 15(2) of the Act and that the sections under Report are ultra vires the Act as having been made by someone other than Parliament's delegate.

The pertinent enabling provisions read as follows:

12.(1) The Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister, may make such rules and regulations as may be deemed expedient

(a) for carrying into effect the objects of this Act, or for ensuring the due administration thereof by the Commissioner and other officers and employees of the Patent Office;

15.(1) A register of attorneys shall be kept in the Patent Office on which shall be entered the names of all persons entitled to represent applicants in the presentation and prosecution of applications for patents or in other business before the Patent Office.

(2) Entry on such register shall be made in accordance with regulations to be made by the Commissioner with the approval of the Governor in Council.

Prior to 1923, any person appointed in writing by a patent applicant could represent that applicant in the presentation and prosecution of a patent application. By section 57 of the Patent Act, S.C. 1923, c. 23, it was enacted that:

57. A register of attorneys shall be kept in the Patent Office on which shall be entered the names of all persons entitled to represent applicants in the presentation and prosecution of applications for patents or in other business before the Patent Office. Entry on such register shall be made in accordance with regulations to be made by the Commissioner with the approval of the Governor in Council.

Section 15 of the current legislation is in the same terms.

As for section 12 of the Act, it was first enacted in its present form by the Patent Act, 1935, S.C. 1935, c. 32. Prior to this enactment, the legislation conferred on the Commissioner of Patents the authority to make "such rules and regulations, and prescribe such forms, as appear to him necessary and expedient for the purposes of this Act".⁽¹⁾ The Committee considers there is no material difference between the general regulation-making powers previously conferred on the Commissioner and those now exercisable by the Governor in Council pursuant to section 12(1)(a) of the Act. What is significant is that the Statute of 1935, while it transferred from the Commissioner to the Governor in Council the authority to make regulations for carrying into effect the objects of the Patent Act, maintained the Commissioner's authority to make regulations in accordance with which entries are to be made on the Register of Patent Agents.

The provisions of the United Kingdom legislation dealing with the registration of patent agents were considered by the House of Lords in Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood.⁽²⁾ There, Lord Watson stated that:

...the main intention of the Legislature appears to have been to protect poor inventors from being robbed by unskilled patent agents who failed to make a specification and claim in such a form as would secure to them the fruits of their invention.⁽³⁾

The Committee has no doubts that similar considerations guided the Canadian Parliament when it enacted what is now section 15 of the Act. A patent agent whose name is entered on the Register is reputed to possess the knowledge and skills required for the presentation and prosecution of patent applications. The registration process will thus necessarily involve the prescription of qualifications to be met by those who desire their name to be entered on the Register. If it were otherwise, registration would be a mere formality and the entry of an agent's name on the Register would not assure inventors of that agent's competence and ability to "secure to them the fruits of their invention". In light of Parliament's intention in enacting section 15 of the Act, the authority to make regulations in accordance with which entries are to be made on the Register includes, in your Committee's opinion, the authority to prescribe the qualifications required of those who wish their name to be so entered. Interpreted otherwise, section 15(2) of the Act would have to be confined to the making of rules prescribing the formal details of registration.

Your Committee submits that the history of sections 12 and 15, the scheme of the Act, and the purpose of Parliament in enacting these provisions militate against such a restrictive interpretation and lend support to its opinion that regulations governing the registration of patent agents are to be made by the Commissioner of Patents rather than by the Governor in Council. Had the general regulation-making powers been considered adequate for that purpose, there would have been no need for Parliament to enact what is now section 15(2) of the Act.

3. Informed of the Committee's position, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs replied that her Department was advised by the Department of Justice that sections 153 to 156 of the Patent Rules were validly enacted pursuant to section 12(1)(a) of the Patent Act and were intra vires the Act.⁽⁴⁾ The relevant correspondence is appended to this Report. The Committee has carefully considered the legal opinion referred to by the Minister and has concluded that it does not adequately answer its objection to the rules under Report.

The circumstances which made it necessary to seek an opinion from the Department of Justice and the opinion itself indicate that the principal concern of its author was to establish that the Patent Act allows for the making of rules prescribing the qualifications of patent agents rather than to determine whether such rules should be made under section 12 or 15 of the Act. To the extent the opinion concludes that the Act provides authority for such rules, the Committee is in agreement with it. The Committee does not agree, however, that this authority is to be found in section 12(1)(a) of the Act.

The statement that "regulations under either subsection 12(1) or subsection 15(2) which support the right of the Commissioner to refuse to recognize any person as a patent agent or patent attorney would be intra vires" discloses the author's unstated assumption that rules governing the registration of patent agents can be made under either section 12 or 15 of the Act. Your Committee believes this is an erroneous view of the Statute. As stated by the Joint Chairmen and Vice-Chairman of the Committee in their February 7th letter to the present Minister:

The view of the Committee is precisely that the rules governing the registration of patent agents must be authorized by one of these two enabling powers. To argue that such rules can be made under either of Sections 12(1) and 15(2) would mean that Parliament had indifferently conferred the same authority on two delegates and, while it is always possible for Parliament to do so, that this is the case should not be assumed unless no other interpretation of the Statute offers itself.

In this instance, the Committee considers that section 15(2), being a specific grant of regulation-making authority, prevails over the general regulation-making authority conferred by section 12 of the Act. This interpretation is such as to ensure that a consistent and rational meaning is placed on the whole of the sections referred to when read together in the context of the legislation.

4. While the Executive is now asserting that authority for the rules under Report is to be found in section 12(1)(a) of the Act, the Committee notes its position has not been consistent in the past. On 10th June, 1948, the Governor in Council adopted Order in Council P.C. 2637 which revoked the rules enacted in 1935⁽⁵⁾ and substituted therefor the Patent Rules, 1948, made by the Governor in Council pursuant to section 12 of the Act, and the Register of Patent Agents Rules, 1948, made by the Commissioner of Patents pursuant to section 15(2) of the Act.⁽⁶⁾ The provisions of this last set of Rules are similar to sections 152 to 158 of the present Rules.

In 1954, the Governor in Council purported to revoke the Register of Patent Agents Rules, 1948 of his own authority.⁽⁷⁾ These Rules were made by the Commissioner pursuant to the regulation-making power delegated to him by section 15(2) of the Patent Act and can only be revoked by the Commissioner. While the approval of the Governor in Council is required for the making, amendment or revocation of regulations under section 15(2), this is not to say that the Governor in Council may substitute himself for Parliament's delegate. If authority is wanted for this proposition, it can be found in section 26(4) of the Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. I-23, which provides that:

(4) Where a power is conferred to make regulations, the power shall be construed as including a power, exercisable in the like manner, and subject to the like consent and conditions, if any, to repeal, amend or vary the regulations and make others.

Your Committee is of the view that the revocation of the Register of Patent Agents Rules, 1948 by the Governor in Council was without legal effect and that until such time as these Rules are revoked by the Commissioner of Patents, they must be regarded as being legally in force.

5. Your Committee recommends that the provisions of the Patent Rules which regulate the registration of patent agents be formally revoked and that the Register of Patent Agents Rules, 1948 be amended by the Commissioner of Patents so as to bring them in conformity with the current practices of the Patent Office.

Dear Madam Erola:

The attached correspondence was before the Committee at its meeting of the 10th instant.

If it is indeed the case that the provisions of the Patent Rules dealing with the registration of patent agents other than that already noted by the Committee have been enacted by the Governor in Council, under Section 12 of the Act, rather than by the Commissioner of Patents, under Section 15 of the Act, we would have to conclude that the pertinent Sections of the Rules are ultra vires the Patent Act as having been made by someone other than Parliament's delegate.

Considering that the matter raised by the Committee involves an issue of legality, we do not feel it is sufficient for Mr. Post to indicate that it will be dealt with by the Commissioner of Patents in connection with possible amendments to the Rules at some future time. We think the issue is a substantive one that should be addressed immediately.

If it should turn out that aside from the amendment made by SOR/83-416, other regulatory provisions have been enacted by the wrong subordinate law-making authority, they should also be formally revoked and new rules made by the Commissioner of Patents in conformity with the powers granted to him by Parliament.

We will be grateful for an assurance that this matter will be studied without delay and that, if necessary, remedial action will be taken shortly thereafter. We are sending a copy of this letter to the Commissioner of Patents for his information.

Dear Sirs:

This is further to my letter to you of June 27, 1984 following your letter dated June 5, 1984 expressing concern that the recent amendments to the Patent Rules had been enacted by the wrong subordinate law-making authority. As I said in my letter I fully agree that the question you raised is an important one requiring immediate attention. Consequently, officers of Consumer and Corporate Affairs Canada, including the Commissioner of Patents, were instructed to investigate this matter further and report back to me. I am happy to pass on to you the information they provided on how the amendments were made.

When the amendments were being proposed the legal officer responsible, acting with the knowledge of the Commissioner of Patents, requested the advice of the Privy Council Office on whether the enabling authority for the amendments was section 12(1) or section 15(2) of the Patent Act. At the same time he pointed out that Mrs. Dawson (now Associate Chief Legislative Council) had previously expressed the opinion that neither of these sections authorized the making of regulations respecting qualifications of patent agents. The Privy Council Office advised that they still agreed with the views expressed by Mrs. Dawson.

Because there was a difference of opinion between counsel for this department and the Privy Council Office the matter was referred to the Department of Justice for resolution. For your information I have attached a copy of the letter from the Director of the Advisory and Research Service, Department of Justice, dated September 8, 1978. As you can see, we were advised that the Rules in question were validly enacted pursuant to section 12(1) of the Patent Act and were intra vires.

Given this opinion from the Department of Justice that the Rules in question are intra vires and that Sections 140 to 143 (now Rules 153 to 156) were validly passed by virtue of section 12(1) of the Patent Act, I do not consider that the wrong subordinate law-making authority acted in this matter and I do not believe that the remedial action that you suggest is necessary.

I trust that the above information will prove to be helpful to you.

Yours sincerely,

Judy Erola

TO: Alice Desjardins

FROM: John F. Leman

SUBJECT: Validity of Sections 140 to 143 of the Patent Rules.

The validity of sections 140 to 143 of the Patent Rules has been questioned.

Section 15 of the Patent Act⁽¹⁾ requires that a register of attorneys be kept of persons entitled to represent applicants in the presentation and prosecution of patent applications or other business before the Patent Office.

Section 140 of the Patent Rules specifies the classes of individuals and firms which may be added to the register. Section 141 specifies the criteria for the eligibility of Canadian residents for examinations required by subsection 140 (a). Section 142 establishes an Examining Board to set the examination. Section 143 establishes the manner of fixing the time and place of the examination and notifying the candidates.

The Patent Rules were proclaimed on 1 December 1954⁽²⁾ and rules 140 to 143 were revoked and substituted by new rules on 14 July 1966⁽³⁾.

Rules 140 to 143 as they now stand read as follows:

[Text of sections 140 to 143]

These regulations must derive their authority from the Patent Act or some other Act of Parliament to be intra vires⁽⁴⁾. The authority to make rules is found in Section 12 of the Patent Act and the authority with respect to the register of attorneys and patent agents is found in sections 15 and 16 of the Patent Act. Section 12 states in part:

[Text of sections 12(1)(a) and 12(2)]

And Sections 15 and 16 read as follows:

[Text of sections 15 and 16]

Elmer Driedger discusses the general forms of legislation enabling regulations and gives some rules that help in determining the scope of the regulation making power⁽⁵⁾. Where the parent statute confers the power to make subordinate legislation subject to objective limitations that power must be construed narrowly and strictly. Where the parent statute confers the power to make subordinate legislation subject to subjective limitations that power must be construed widely. This is illustrated by the following examples. If the parent statute is worded objectively and states: "he may make regulations as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of this Act" the powers are to be strictly construed. If the parent statute is worded subjectively and states: "he may make regulations as he deems necessary for carrying out the provisions of this Act", the powers are to be construed broadly. The power to make regulations given by the regulations under subsection 15 (2) are objective and should be construed narrowly. However, this power must be read with section 16 which gives the Commissioner the right to refuse to recognize anyone as a patent agent or a patent attorney for gross misconduct or any other cause that he may deem sufficient and regulations under either subsection 12(1) or subsection 15(2) which support the right of the Commissioner to refuse to recognize any person as a patent agent or patent attorney would be intra vires. It is essential to keep in mind the scheme of the legislation. The House of Lords considered a similar problem in Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood [1894] A.C. 347 where the Board of Trade made regulations imposing an annual fee upon patent agents to keep their names on the register. The Court held that imposing the fee was intra vires of the regulating powers of the Board. Lord Watson states at page 363:

Here, in the Act of 1888, the main intention of the Legislature appears to have been to protect poor inventors from being robbed by unskilled patent agents who failed to make a specification and claim in such a form as would secure to them the fruits of their invention.

and at page 364:

The 1st section of the Act of 1888, by sub-section 1, imposes a prohibition upon persons whose names are not on the register against using the description of "patent agent"; and the next sub-section lays upon the Board of Trade the duty of making by-laws or regulations for establishing and maintaining a register of patent agents; those who had been patent agents before the date of the Act having their names inserted, as a matter of course, if they complied with the regulations; those who were not in that position, and who were subsequently admitted, having their qualifications tested by examination, or in some other mode.

Now, it appears to me that the whole scheme was left to the discretion of the Board of Trade; and it is impossible for me to say that, looking to those regulations, the Board of Trade have in any measure exceeded that discretion. It was by their opinion, not by any judicial opinion, that the matter was to be determined.

Driedger gives an additional test. He applies the decision of the Privy Council in Attorney General for Canada v. Hallet & Carey Ltd.⁽⁶⁾ and concludes that where Parliament gives a power to make regulations for a stated purpose or objective that power is to be construed broadly. However, where the parent legislation only gives the power to make regulations for a stated and specific subject, then the power is to be construed narrowly. For example the power to "make regulations for the purpose of restricting export" is much broader than the "power to make regulations restricting export".

Applying this test section 12(1) is sufficiently broad to permit the Governor in Council to make regulations requiring the examination of candidates to be enrolled as acceptable patent agents and to establish an examination board. Sections 140 to 143 of the Patent Rules are intra vires and are validly passed by virtue of section 12(1) of the Patent Act.

February 7, 1985

The Honourable Michel Côté, P.C., M.P.
Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario
K1A 0A6

Dear Mr. Côté:

We refer to your predecessor's letter of September 7, 1984 (copy attached), which was considered by the Committee at its meeting of January 24, 1985.

The original concern of the Committee had to do with whether rules governing the registration of patent agents ought to be enacted by the Commissioner of Patents pursuant to Section 15(2) of the Act rather than by the Governor in Council pursuant to Section 12(1)(a) of the Act. As it considered Section 15(2) to provide this authority the Committee did not question the sufficiency of the enabling authority for the enactment of such rules. Insofar as the opinion sent under cover of the Minister's letter deals principally with whether or not there is any statutory authority for these rules rather than with the question raised by the Committee it is not an altogether satisfactory answer.

It appears to us the main concern of the writer of that opinion is particularly evident when he argues that:

"The power to make regulations given by the regulations under subsection 15(2) (sic!) are objective and should be construed narrowly. However, this power must be read with section 16 which gives the Commissioner the right to refuse to recognize anyone as a patent agent or a patent attorney for gross misconduct or any other cause that he may deem sufficient and regulations under either subsection 12(1) or subsection 15(2) which support the right of the Commissioner to refuse to recognize any person as patent agent or patent attorney would be intra vires."

We believe the underlined reference to regulations made under either of Sections 12(1) and 15(2) indicates that Mr. Leman was not overly concerned with identifying which of these two Sections provided the necessary authority for rules governing the registration of patent agents, but rather with demonstrating that there existed statutory authority for the rules.

The view of the Committee is precisely that the rules governing the registration of patent agents must be authorized by one of these two enabling powers. To argue that such rules can be made under either of Sections 12(1) and 15(2) would mean that Parliament had indifferently conferred the same authority on two delegates and, while it is always possible for Parliament to do so, that this is the case should not be assumed unless no other interpretation of the Statute offers itself.

In this instance, the power conferred on the Governor in Council by Section 12(1)(a) of the Act is a general power; that conferred on the Commissioner of Patents, on the other hand, is particular and allows the Commissioner to make regulations in accordance with which entry on the register of attorneys shall be made. The rule of interpretation expressed in the maxim generalibus specialia derogant -the application of which is not discussed in Mr. Leman's opinion- leads us to think that the authority for rules governing the entry of names on the register must be sought in the particular power granted to the Commissioner by Section 15(2) of the Act rather than in the general power conferred on the Governor in Council by Section 12(1)(a).

If we were to accept that the present rules governing the registration of patent agents had properly been made by the Governor in Council, there would be great difficulty in determining the content of the rules which Parliament sought to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to make pursuant to Section 15(2). What regulations, other than regulations of the kind that have been made pursuant to Section 12(1)(a), would Parliament have intended when adopting Section 15(2)? The difficulty of furnishing an answer to this question reinforces us in our view that the rules which have been made by the Governor in Council under Section 12(1)(a) should have been made by the Commissioner of Patents under Section 15(2).

We will be grateful for your reconsideration of this matter.

Dear Sirs:

Further to your letter of February 7, 1985, I have asked my officials to consider once more the question of amendments to Patent Rules pursuant to Section 15(2) or Section 12(1)(a) of the Patent Act.

My officials have given thorough consideration to the matter at hand and to the legal opinion received from the Department of Justice in 1978. I must recognize that my Department is bound by the opinion that the amendments to the rules in question, enacted pursuant to Subsection 12(1)(a) of the Patent Act, were intra vires. We see no reason to question the soundness of this opinion concerning rules that have proved effective for a fair number of years.

I trust that this response is satisfactory. I would like to add, however, that your concerns will be taken into full account in the event of further amendments to this particular area of the Patent Rules.

Yours sincerely,

Michel Côté

Respectfully submitted,

NATHAN NURGITZ,
Joint Chairman.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

TUESDAY, October 29, 1985

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its

FOURTH REPORT

(Statutory Instruments No. 31)

1. In relation to its permanent reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 38, your Committee has determined to draw to the special attention of both Houses SOR/82-244, the Oil Carriage Limitation Regulations. In your Committee's judgment, these Regulations are ultra vires section 730(1)(d)(ii) of the Canada Shipping Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. S-9. The purpose of the Regulations is to restrict the quantity of oil that may be carried on board oil tankers in the waters within Head Harbour Passage, New Brunswick, and your Committee is of the view that the application of a regulation of this kind may not be limited to a particular body of water.

2. In section 727(2) of the enabling Act, Parliament determined that:

Except where otherwise provided in this Part [Part XX] or in any regulation made thereunder, this Part and any regulations made thereunder apply

- (a) to all Canadian waters south of the sixtieth parallel of north latitude;
- (b) to all Canadian waters north of the sixtieth parallel of north latitude that are not within a shipping safety control zone prescribed pursuant to the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act;
- (c) to any fishing zones of Canada prescribed pursuant to the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act; and
- (d) to all ships in waters described in paragraphs (a) to (c).

The effect of this provision is that a regulation made under Part XX of the Act will apply to all the waters described in section 727(2) unless the regulation provides otherwise. At first glance, the Regulations under Report, as they expressly state that they apply only in the waters within Head Harbour Passage appear to come within the proviso "Except where otherwise provided ... in any regulation". However, once this legislative proviso is read together with sections 728(1) and 730(1) of the Act, it becomes clear that its scope is more limited than first appears. The text of sections 728(1) and 730(1) is reproduced in Appendix "A". Your Committee draws attention to the fact that sections 728(1) and 730(1)(g), (h), and

(o) refer to "waters to which this Part applies and with respect to which those regulations are made applicable". Other enabling clauses refer only to "waters to which this Part applies" or contain no specific reference to the waters described in section 727(2).

It is a well established principle that every provision of an Act of Parliament is to be given meaning. As explained by Viscount Simon in Hill v. William Hill (Park Lane Ltd.):

... it is to be observed that though a Parliamentary enactment (like parliamentary eloquence) is capable of saying the same thing twice over without adding anything to what has already been said once, this repetition in the case of an Act of Parliament is not to be assumed. When the legislature enacts a particular phrase in a statute the presumption is that it is saying something which has not been said immediately before. The rule that a meaning should, if possible, be given to every word in the statute implies that, unless there is good reason to the contrary, the words add something which would not be there if the words were left out.⁽¹⁾

Your Committee is of opinion that the legislative proviso in section 727(2) of the Act is to be construed by reference to the phrase and with respect to which those regulations are made applicable. Having prescribed that a regulation made pursuant to Part XX of the Act applies in all of the waters described in section 727(2) unless it "otherwise provides", Parliament used this particular phrase to identify those regulations that can be made to apply to only part of the waters described in section 727(2) of the Act. In short, only regulations made pursuant to sections 728(1) or 730(1)(g), (h), and (o) of the Act may provide that they do not apply to all of the waters to which Part XX of the Act applies but only to those waters specified in the regulations. If the proviso in section 727(2) is read as a discrete grant of authority to make a regulation applicable only to a particular body of water, the additional phrase used in sections 728(1) and 730(1) (g), (h), and (o) is rendered meaningless. Your Committee submits that the scheme of the Act requires that this phrase be interpreted as defining which regulations may be made to apply to only part of the waters described in section 727(2) and so come within the legislative proviso in that section. A regulation made pursuant to any other enabling clause is not one referred to in the proviso "Except where otherwise provided ... in any regulation" and will apply to all the waters described in section 727(2) of the Act.

For these reasons, your Committee considers that any regulation made pursuant to section 730(1)(d)(ii) which prescribes the maximum quantities of any pollutant that may be carried on board ships of a designated class must apply to all Canadian waters, except those in a shipping safety control zone north of the sixtieth parallel, and to all waters in a fishing zone of Canada. Insofar as the Oil Carriage Limitation Regulations purport to apply only to the waters within Head Harbour Passage, New Brunswick, they are not authorized by the Canada Shipping Act.

3. Shortly before the adoption of this Report by your Committee, the House of Commons gave first reading to Bill C-75: the Bill proposes the adoption of a new Part XX of the Canada Shipping Act under which the Governor in Council would have the authority to designate the waters to which a regulation of the kind reported upon would apply. Insofar as the present legislation only grants that power in relation to specific classes of regulations, the adoption of Bill C-75 would represent a significant alteration of the existing legislative scheme. The Committee asks that parliamentarians give careful consideration to this aspect of the proposed legislation. But even if Parliament enacts Bill C-75 without amendment, this will not validate the Regulations under Report. The vires of the Regulations is to be determined by reference to the law as it stood when they were made and subsequent legislative changes have no bearing on this determination. If the enactment of the amending Bill now before the House of Commons will authorize the making of such regulations in future, it does not give the existing regulations a legal validity they lack ab initio.

4. Your Committee can not conclude this Report without commenting on the Minister of Transport's failure to offer reasons in support of the validity of the Regulations under Report. In this connection, we draw attention to the correspondence reproduced in Appendix "B".

When its objections to a particular statutory instrument are conveyed to the regulation-making authority concerned, the Committee expects that it will be given reasoned arguments in support of the validity or propriety of the instrument or that the regulation-making authority will explain why the Committee's views can not be accepted. In this instance, the Committee has repeatedly been informed that the Act provides sufficient authority for the Regulations. The bare assertion that a particular instrument is valid can not be accepted as sufficient if the Committee is to properly discharge its mandate pursuant to the Statutory Instruments Act. As stated by this Committee's predecessor:

... a mere statement that a particular course of action or omission is intra vires or is supported by an opinion of a solicitor of the Department of Justice, or of the Attorney General himself, is an affront to the Houses. At the very least, reasoned argument should always be given both to the Committee and to the Houses.⁽²⁾

In their letter of 3rd April, 1985, the Committee's Joint Chairmen and Vice-Chairman attempted to make this clear to the Minister. Unfortunately, the Minister's reply of 30th May, 1985, discloses a complete misunderstanding of the agreement reached between the Minister of Justice and this Committee's predecessor which was approved by the Cabinet in 1977. The Committee did not request that it be informed of or given access to the legal advice received by the Minister from officers of the Department of Justice, but that the Minister of Transport explain his own legal position as the Minister of the Crown responsible for recommending the adoption of the Regulations under Report to the Governor in Council. This request was entirely in accordance with the Cabinet approved agreement to provide the Committee with explanations as to the legality of any instrument queried by it, on the understanding that such explanations are to be treated as the sole responsibility of the responding department or Minister.

728. (1) The Governor in Council may make regulations prohibiting the discharge from ships of any one or more pollutants specified in the regulations, except as thereby authorized for the purposes of this Part, in any waters to which this Part applies and with respect to which those regulations are made applicable.

730. (1) The Governor in Council may make regulations

(a) prescribing substances and classes of substances that are, for the purposes of this Part, pollutants;

(b) prescribing for the purposes of subsection 728(2) circumstances in which, the location at which and the manner in which the master of a ship shall report to a pollution prevention officer or other designated person;

(c) respecting the fitting, maintenance, testing and use of electronic and other navigational equipment on ships carrying pollutants, in addition to that required under any other provision of this Act or the regulations;

(d) prescribing with respect to ships of any class designated in the regulations

(i) the types of pollutants and the maximum quantities thereof that may be carried on board such ships whether as cargo or otherwise,

(ii) the maximum quantities of any pollutant that may be carried in cargo holds or tanks and in any fuel tanks in such ships, and

(iii) the method of stowage of the cargo or fuel in such holds and tanks;

(e) respecting the supplies and equipment to be carried by and the fittings and installations required on ships carrying pollutants for handling the pollutants and dealing with any discharge thereof;

(f) respecting the method of retention of oily or other wastes by ships carrying pollutants;

(g) requiring ships in waters to which this Part applies and with respect to which the regulations are made applicable to have on board, maintain and use appropriate charts, tide tables, lists of lights and other nautical publications;

(h) respecting the number and qualifications of navigation and engine room personnel, including pilots and lookouts, required to be on duty on ships of any class designated in the regulations in any waters to which this Part applies and with respect to which such regulations are made applicable;

(i) prescribing procedures and practices to be followed by persons on board ships in order to ensure safe navigation in waters to which this Part applies;

(j) prescribing procedures to be followed when pollutants are loaded or unloaded from a ship in waters to which this Part applies or transferred on board a ship in such waters;

(k) prescribing the supplies and equipment to be maintained by the operators of loading and unloading facilities for ships for use in the event of any discharge of a pollutant during the loading or unloading of a ship;

(l) respecting the records to be kept on board a ship

(i) of any activities on board the ship in waters to which this Part applies that result in or may result in the discharge of a pollutant in any such waters or into the atmosphere,

(ii) of loadings and unloadings of the ship at any facilities in such waters, and

(iii) of discharges of pollutants by Canadian ships in any waters, which discharges, if made in waters to which this Part applies, would be contrary to any regulation made pursuant to subsection 728(1), and prescribing the person or persons by whom such records shall be kept;

(m) for regulating and preventing the pollution of the air by ships;

(n) for regulating and preventing the discharge of pollutants by Canadian ships in such waters, other than waters to which this Part applies, as are designated by the Governor in Council;

(o) establishing compulsory traffic routes and other shipping traffic controls considered necessary for safe navigation in waters to which this Part applies and with respect to which those regulations are made applicable;

(p) prescribing quantities of pollutants for the purposes of the definition "in bulk" in subsection 727(1); and

(q) designating or prescribing anything that, pursuant to any provision of this Part, is to be designated or prescribed by the Governor in Council.

APPENDIX "B" TO THE REPORT

July 4, 1984

The Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, P.C., M.P.
Minister of Transport
House of Commons
Ottawa, Ontario

Dear Mr. Axworthy:

Re: SOR/82-244, Oil Carriage Limitation Regulations

The purpose of the referenced Regulations is to limit, pursuant to Section 730(1)(d)(ii) of the Canada Shipping Act, the quantity of oil that may be carried on tankers in waters within Head Harbour Passage in New Brunswick.

While Section 730(1)(d)(ii) of the enabling Statute contemplates that Her Excellency may prescribe the types of pollutants and the maximum quantities of such pollutants that may be carried on board ships of a designated class, the enabling Section does not permit the Governor in Council to limit the designation or prescription to a particular body of water as he has purported to do in the Oil Carriage Limitation Regulations. In Section 727(2) of Part XX of the Canada Shipping Act, Parliament has determined that, "except where otherwise provided in [Part XX] or in any regulation made thereunder", Part XX and any regulations made pursuant to the enabling powers it contains apply:

- (a) to all Canadian waters south of the sixtieth parallel of north latitude;
- (b) to all Canadian waters north of the sixtieth parallel of north latitude that are not within a shipping safety control zone prescribed pursuant to the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act; and
- (c) to any fishing zones of Canada prescribed pursuant to the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act; and
- (d) to all ships in waters described in paragraphs (a) to (c).

Section 727(2) makes it clear that a regulation made pursuant to Section 730 of the Act is to apply in all Canadian waters except as otherwise provided in Part XX or in the regulations.

It is the view of the Committee that a regulation made pursuant to Section 730(1)(d)(ii) cannot be made to apply to only part of the waters described in Section 727(2) and so fall within the proviso: "Except where otherwise provided in this Part or in any regulation made thereunder". We note that Parliament, having enacted Section 727(2), was careful to specify which regulations could be made to apply to only part of the waters described in that Section. The Act specifies that the regulations made pursuant to Sections 728(1), 730(1)(g), 730(1)(h) and 730(1)(o), apply "in any waters to which [Part XX] applies or with respect to which those regulations are made applicable". We believe this language shows that Parliament provided in the Statute itself which regulations could be made to apply to particular bodies of waters and thus fall within the words: "Except where otherwise provided in this Part or in any regulation made thereunder".

In granting the regulation making authority found in Section 730(1)(d)(ii), Parliament did not provide that the application of the regulations made thereunder could be restricted to waters "with respect to which those regulations are made to apply". Consequently, the Committee takes the view that any such regulation is to apply in all the waters described by Parliament in Section 727(2) and that the referenced Regulations cannot be made to apply solely to the waters within Head Harbour Passage in New Brunswick.

Informed of the Committee's position in this matter, your Department has merely advised the Committee that in the view of the legal advisers to the Department, the Act provides sufficient authority for the present Regulations. It was not explained to us how such a conclusion could be reached on the basis of the statutory language used in Part XX of the Canada Shipping Act.

We would appreciate your reconsideration of the position taken by your Department in this matter.

Gentlemen:

This refers to your letter of 19 December 1984, with which you enclosed a copy of correspondence concerning the application of the Oil Carriage Limitation Regulations within Head Harbour Passage.

The matter was referred to departmental legal advisers who are still of the opinion that there is sufficient authority under the Canada Shipping Act to make the regulations in question.

As has been noted in previous correspondence on the subject, however, there appears to be a clear difference of opinion. I am therefore wondering if it would not be more appropriate to leave the matter to the Courts to decide in the event that there is a challenge on the regulations. It seems to me that this would be preferable to engaging in a debate on the legal interpretation to be given to certain passages of the Canada Shipping Act.

I have issued instructions that your letter be brought to the attention of the responsible officials, in the event that it is decided to amend the Act, so that your views might be taken into account when preparing any such amendments.

Yours sincerely,

Don Mazankowski

The Honourable Donald F. Mazankowski, P.C., M.P.
Minister of Transport
House of Commons

Dear Mr. Mazankowski:

Re: SOR/82-244, Oil Carriage Limitation Regulations

We thank you for your letter of January 21st, 1985, which was placed before the Committee on March 21st last.

Committee members do not feel your letter is an adequate response to the previous Chairmen's letter of July 4th, 1984. When the Committee's objection to the Oil Carriage Limitation Regulations was brought to the attention of your Department by counsel to the Committee, we were advised that:

"... on a reading of Part XX of the Canada Shipping Act as a whole, the Governor in Council does have authority under subsection 730(1) to make regulations, including any regulations under paragraph (d) thereof, applicable only to a particular body of water".

In a letter dated December 6th, 1982, our counsel further detailed the reasons for which we do not think the Governor in Council to have this authority, in an attempt to obtain a substantive reply from the Department beyond a bare assertion of validity. In her letter of February 10th, 1983, Dr. Sainte-Marie wrote that:

"It seems to me that there is a clear difference of opinion between the Committee and our legal advisers on the legislative authority of the Governor in Council to make the above regulations. As I mentioned in my letter to Mr. Eglington, dated July 15, 1982, our legal advisers are of the view that there is sufficient authority to adopt such regulations".

The Committee can not accept as sufficient a mere statement that a conclusion supporting the validity of an instrument has been made. In any such case, we expect to be given an explanation of the legal reasons which support the conclusion and to be shown in what way the Committee's reasons do not support its own position or conclusion. Any other approach would seriously impair the Joint Committee's ability to fulfill the statutory mandate given to it by Parliament and this was recognized when, in 1977, the then Minister of Justice wrote our predecessors:

"In discussing this matter with yourselves and the Committee, my mind has generally focussed on the narrow issue of the tabling of legal advice given by my Department to the government. But my officials and I have considered more generally some of the difficulties which I understand the Committee is experiencing and as a result I have recommended to my colleagues in Cabinet a system which I believe is practical and will result in the Committee obtaining more complete information when it has questions related to statutory instruments.

I have proposed that departments and agencies nominate a senior official, perhaps at the deputy-minister level, to whom requests for explanations concerning statutory instruments would be directed. This official would then provide the requested explanations having regard to the department's policy and legal position. Naturally, in many cases there will be consultation between the department concerned and the Department of Justice. It must, however, be understood that the explanations provided, including any explanation as to the legality of the instrument, would be the sole responsibility of the responding department and that legal advice given to those departments by the Department of Justice will not be disclosed. It is my hope that this system will provide for responses that will allow the Committee to perform its important function, while preserving the confidentiality of lawyer-client communications. This proposal has now been approved by my colleagues and steps are being taken to have it implemented in the very near future."

The purpose of Messrs. Godfrey, Beatty and Robinson's letter to the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy was to draw to his attention your Department's failure to provide the Committee with a substantive response to its objection and to request that this response be given. In light of this, we trust you will understand we can not accept it as sufficient for you to inform us that your legal advisers "are still of the opinion that there is sufficient authority under the Canada Shipping Act to make the regulations in question" and would ask for a substantive reply to our letter of July 4, 1984, including a statement of the legal reasons upon which this conclusion relies.

Gentlemen:

Thank you for your letter of 3 April 1985 concerning an amendment to the Oil Carriage Limitation Regulations.

In your letter, you quote extensively from a letter written in 1977 by the then Minister of Justice in which he set out the procedure for responding to the Committee's request for explanations with respect to specific regulations.

I believe that it was quite clearly stated in that letter that legal advice given to departments by the Department of Justice would not be disclosed. I am concerned that your latest request may now be inviting such disclosure.

After reviewing the matter, I have concluded that Transport Canada's past correspondence has provided the Committee with all the explanations, in accordance with the aforementioned arrangements. To go further, I believe, would amount to disclosing the legal advice that Transport Canada has received from the Department of Justice.

I hope the foregoing has clarified Transport Canada's position.

Yours sincerely,

Don Mazankowski

Respectfully submitted,

THE SENATE

Tuesday, November 5, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Rhéal Bélisle, the Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

Prayers.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

HIS EXCELLENCY HASJIM DJALAL, AMBASSADOR OF INDONESIA

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to draw your attention to the presence in our gallery of His Excellency, Dr. Hasjim Djalal, the Ambassador of Indonesia. He is accompanied by his Minister-Counsellor, Mr. Soewandi Kusumoadinoto, and Mr. Buru, the Consul in Toronto.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THE PRIME MINISTER

SPEECH ON OCCASION OF FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF UNITED NATIONS PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as requested at the last sitting of the Senate, I now table the speech delivered by the Prime Minister to the United Nations, and ask that it be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of speech see Appendix, p. 1445.)

LOUIS RIEL

HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF HANGING—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, November 7, 1985, I will call the attention of the Senate to the one hundredth anniversary, on November 16, 1985, of the hanging of Louis Riel.

YOUTH

SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Wednesday, November 6, 1985, I will move:

That the Order of Reference of the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth be amended by deleting the words "28th November, 1985," and substituting therefor the words "27th February, 1986"; and

That the Honourable Senators authorized to act for and on behalf of the Senate in all matters relating to the internal economy of the Senate during any period between sessions of Parliament or between Parliaments, be authorized to publish and distribute the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to direct my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I directed a question to him a week ago today with respect to when the cabinet would be dealing with the drought emergency program, and whether an announcement would be made immediately. The Leader of the Government in the Senate informed us then that that proposal had been before a cabinet committee that day, and that he expected it would be dealt with by the full cabinet at the end of last week.

Newspaper reports suggest that the proposal has not yet been dealt with. There is great apprehension and consternation in the prairies that the government may be losing interest in doing a first-class job of dealing with the problems that have arisen from the worst drought and grasshopper infestation to affect a large part of the prairies in 50 years.

I urge the leader to tell us when the government will, in fact, deal with this matter, and I ask him to tell us whether or not the report that will be made public will deal with the request for $50 an acre for acreage payments and $100 per brood cow.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can tell my honourable friend that the government will never tire of trying its best to do good, and we are still in that frame of mind with respect to this problem.

When the question was asked last Thursday, I was careful to tell the Senate that I was not in a position to give a firm reply for the simple reason that I did not know. This is being considered by a committee of cabinet. It is not being considered by a committee of which I am a member, and even if I were, it would be difficult for me to give further information than I have already given.

I can assure my honourable friend that the matter is on the agenda and has not been forgotten. I am just as anxious as he is to get an answer.

Senator Argue: Is the matter before the Priorities and Planning Committee, or has it been cleared by that committee? Because if it has been cleared by that committee, the way things used to be done, it is likely to be cleared by the full cabinet. Is it bogged down in the Priorities and Planning Committee? Is it in danger of dying in the Priorities and Planning Committee unless enough people raise hell?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend knows that I cannot disclose where a document is in the cabinet process. All I can tell my honourable friend is that it is before the cabinet and will be dealt with. I think he will find that we have not forgotten the importance of this issue.

Hon. H. A. Olson: I have a supplementary question. Four or five weeks ago I asked the Leader of the Government for a definition of the word "soon" which he used at that time. Do we have to have a new definition of "soon", or what does the word now mean?

Senator Roblin: I have to admit that "soon" is a word which is a little elastic.

Senator Argue: With this cabinet, it means forever.

Senator Roblin: Don't despair; you will get something.

TRANSPORT

PORT OF CHURCHILL, MANITOBA—CONTINUED OPERATION

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am sure the leader is quite aware of the subject I am going to raise.

There has been a great deal of talk in Manitoba regarding the Port of Churchill and the federal government's commitment to keep the Port of Churchill going. I could go on and on, but I am sure that the Leader of the Government in the Senate knows what I am referring to, including the many commentaries being made at this time in our province. Has he made any representations to his government in this particular regard and, if not, would he do so?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Minister of Transport met with representatives of the Province of Manitoba last week. To the best of my knowledge, they dealt with all the points at issue and were able to arrive at some conclusions. The net result is that, on the whole, the project is proceeding along the correct lines. There is an aspect of the matter which is under the jurisdiction of Ports Canada. While that is a government body, it does run an independent operation and, therefore, it is necessary for Ports Canada to make a decision with respect to one aspect of this matter but I believe that that decision has not yet been made. The minister is urging Ports Canada to get a move on.

Last week as well, I think, the contract was let for a tugboat to operate in the Churchill harbour, which was one of the important undertakings given in this matter, so progress is being made.

I have to tell my honourable friend—and I am speaking now in a speculative sense which, I suppose, is a dangerous thing to do—that the Senior Grains Advisory Committee has issued a report on the Port of Churchill which I have not yet read, but which I would commend to my honourable friend, and if I get a copy I shall pass it along to him.

Senator Argue: What organization is that?

Senator Roblin: The Senior Grains Advisory Committee.

Senator Argue: Of the Department of Transport?

Senator Roblin: I cannot give any more information than that.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On October 16 I asked him about a visit of a group of American governmental officials, accompanied by members of the private sector, who apparently attended upon trade associations in Canada related to our cultural industries, and particularly copyright and publishing. At that time I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he could inform us as to what that group was doing in Canada and whether or not they were, in fact, making representations with respect to the government's trade policy with the United States. Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate prepared to respond today to the question I asked on October 16?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am still waiting for information from the departments concerned.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, today we heard that the Canadian Ambassador to the United States has been threatened by a representative of Gulf and Western that should the government not comply with its request to approve the Prentice-Hall proposal there will be a "scorched earth" policy with respect to Canada's relations with the United States.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate assure us that Canada's cultural interests in the publishing industry will be upheld in that decision, and that the government will not succumb to threats by American lobbyists?

Senator Roblin: I can give my honourable friend the assurance that the government will not succumb to threats by American lobbyists, although I expect that between now and the run up to these negotiations there will be many matters raised besides cultural interests. I fully expect that those with lumber interests and others who have particular concerns will be making their views widely known. It would be unusual if that did not happen. In similar circumstances I would expect interested people in Canada to do the same thing. With reference to the Prentice-Hall issue, it is, in accordance with the current law, being reviewed, but I think—and I have to be careful about timing because I have not been too lucky in that regard recently—by the end of the year we will have a ruling on that issue.

CULTURAL HERITAGE AND NATIONAL IDENTITY

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, as the Leader of the Government in the Senate knows, I have asked leading questions on the subject of our cultural heritage and national identity, and he has, at various times, offered me assurance in this regard. On October 15, he said: "... the policy of the government has not changed." On September 25, he said, "My suspicion is that he will find himself well satisfied." Honourable senators, I am not well satisfied; I am rather troubled following Senator Grafstein's question.

On July 9, Marcel Masse announced the new book publication policy which will require foreigners to sell within two years to Canadians any book publishing firms purchased directly or indirectly. That is very clear. That was a policy announced by Mr. Masse.

Yesterday, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that free trade talks will include discussion of book publishing in Canada. Which statement of policy is correct?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I guess the hope I expressed of being able to satisfy my honourable friend was misplaced. I now have to say, for reasons which are obvious, that I think it is unlikely I will ever be able to satisfy my honourable friend on issues in which he takes a direct interest.

However, with respect to this matter, I can say that the policy of the government has not changed.

Senator Frith: What is the obvious reason?

Senator Roblin: Politics. I think, perhaps, now and then, a little politics creeps into this chamber. I am not surprised and I do not object to that.

I am simply saying that the policy of the government has not changed, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs has made it quite clear that the government is committed, without any question, to expanding and strengthening the Canadian publishing industry. We want to protect those who require protection. That is still the policy of the government.

Senator Davey: As a further supplementary question, what publishers would qualify as those needing the protection of the government? What would be the description of those?

Senator Roblin: I think, myself, that, on the whole, the publishing industry needs the protection of the government. There may be isolated instances where this is not the case, particularly where issues have arisen that were commenced prior to the enunciation of the government policy and which may cast a reflection on what is decided and what is done. I can say that the whole of the publishing industry and other aspects of our cultural interests are included in this overall statement.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Davey: As a further supplementary, is the announcement made by Marcel Masse in July extinct—part of history?

Senator Roblin: The answer is: That is the policy of the government at the present time.

Senator Davey: I am not trying to be difficult, but did I understand the Leader of the Government to say that the policy announced by Mr. Masse in July is the policy of the government?

Senator Roblin: The policy announced by my former colleague, the Honourable Marcel Masse, is still the policy of the government. I think this was reiterated by the present Secretary of State, the Honourable Benoît Bouchard, the other day.

Senator Davey: I am confused, and not for the first time. I do not understand how that squares with the comments of the Secretary of State for External Affairs yesterday. I think that is clearly at odds with the statement of Mr. Masse. Perhaps I am wrong, and it would not be the first time. I find this very troubling.

Senator Roblin: I think, if my honourable friend were to read what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, it would be as clear as I could make it. I will either read it now or send him a copy.

Senator Davey: Would it be possible for the Leader of the Government to read it now?

Senator Roblin: He stated:

The Government of Canada is committed, without any question, to expanding and strengthening the Canadian publishing industry. That is why we are going to be involving representatives of that publishing industry directly in our preparations for any negotiations that might ensue. We want to protect those who require protection. We want to achieve larger access for those who are looking forward to larger access. That strengthens Canadian cultural industries. That is what we are seeking to do.

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. The Leader of the Government should be aware that the association of the publishing industry has taken a very strong and total stand against the Prentice-Hall takeover or any further erosion, through American influence, of Canadian publishing. Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate clarify who in the publishing industry in Canada is prepared to suggest that that stand, taken by their own association, should be changed as it relates to this policy? He seems to indicate that there is some sort of split in the ranks of the publishing associations in terms of their unanimous stand against government action on this point.

Senator Roblin: I repeat that they will be consulted about the government's policy, and, if that is their stand, it will be made known. I understand that there is more than one publishing association in Canada, one of which takes the stand that my honourable friend has mentioned. There is another that has a somewhat more ambivalent approach to the matter. I must confess that I am not an expert in these matters so I simply record the fact that there is more than one view that has been taken.

Hon. J. Allan MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs made it clear that the publishing industry will be included in the negotiations with the Americans on free trade. In the light of the assurance given about the policy enunciated by the former minister with respect to acquisitions of Canadian publishing houses, will the two-year rule referred to by Senator Davey be carried into the negotiations by the Canadian government as a firm policy position and one that is non-negotiable?

Senator Roblin: I think that that is the case. Just to satisfy myself that I am giving the correct information, however, I will take the question as notice.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—1983 STABILIZATION PAYMENT

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he can report any progress on the question of stabilization payments for the sugar-beet producers.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I have to congratulate my honourable friend on her persistence. She does not overlook the issue. I am sorry to have to report that it is bound up with our discussions respecting drought assistance.

Senator Fairbairn: As a supplementary, may I ask if, in the cabinet, the question of stabilization is now tied in with the national sugar policy discussions and the discussions on the drought assistance? Is this not an issue that is not being considered on its own merits but, rather, as part of a package?

Senator Roblin: No, this issue is being considered on its merits. There are at least two questions respecting sugar-beets: What is to be done about the past and what is to be done about the future? Both of those matters are now in the mill.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

POLL—AWARDING OF CONTRACT

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I should like to ask about the super-duper omnibus government poll, the bidding for which was closed by the Department of Supply and Services on August 30. Could the government leader tell us which company was awarded the contract for that particular poll?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am sorry to say that I have absolutely no information on the subject. I will ask one of my colleagues if it can be provided.

Senator Davey: Perhaps the Leader of the Government would remind his colleagues that it is now two months since the bidding closed. That seems to me to be a rather lengthy period of time.

Senator Roblin: If there is anyone who knows anything about polls, it is certainly my honourable friend. I will take that into account.

Senator Davey: I take that as a compliment, thank you.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers to questions.

PARLIAMENT HILL

COST OF TOURIST RECEPTION TENT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on May 15 last by the Honourable Azellus Denis respecting Parliament Hill—cost of tourist reception tent.

(The answer follows:)

The National Capital Commission advises the following combined capital cost for 1984 and 1985 for the Infotent:

Purchase of tent	$ 40,100
Interior furnishings (floor, counters, seating, etc.)	67,900

Landscaping	40,000
Utility installations	8,300
TOTAL	$156,300

The operating costs (personnel, material, equipment, security, cleaning, utilities, installations, dismantling and storage):

1984 - $91,000	1985 - $125,000
And the Infotent revenues:
1984 - $5,800	1985 - $10,000

TRANSPORT

SECURITY AT CANADIAN AIRPORTS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 25 last by the Honourable Allan MacEachen respecting Transport—security at Canadian airports.

(The answer follows:)

As per the Minister of Transport's announcement in the other place on June 25, 1985, the withdrawal of RCMP services at certain designated airports has been deferred pending the outcome of the full evaluation of airport security systems ordered by the Prime Minister June 24, 1985.

This evaluation is being done by the Interdepartmental Committee for Security and Intelligence under the leadership of Blair Seaborn, and the final report is expected imminently.

The screening of passengers and their carry-on baggage, as well as stowed baggage and cargo is performed by the air carriers as dictated by Transport Canada's Civil Aviation Security Measures Regulations.

AIRPORT TAX—REPORTED RESTRUCTURING

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 25 last by the Honourable Paul Lucier respecting Transport—airport tax—reported restructuring.

(The answer follows:)

The Government is taking unprecedented steps to increase security throughout the Canadian airport system. These measures are necessary and costly.

The current situation is such that cost recovery for the airport system in 1980 was 50 per cent and today it stands at 34 per cent. This deficit in the airport system is such that the cost to Canadian taxpayers is $58 per round trip.

The Canadian Air Transportation Tax of 9 per cent is less than the Japanese and Brazilian Air Transportation Taxes of 10 per cent and 13 per cent respectively. The Canadian tax is comparable to the U.S. Air Transportation Tax of 8 per cent. All foreign taxes mentioned are without ceilings.

Since longer haul routes make more use of en route air navigation services, it is logical that increased contributions to the recovery of costs be made by individuals travelling longer distances. Conversely, those that travel the longest distances in the future may very well benefit the most from current proposals for further regulatory reform.

The removal of the ceiling on the Air Transportation Tax, originally implemented in 1974, is a necessary step in maintaining the efficiency and security of our Air Transportation System. Furthermore, it should be judged in the context of all the initiatives being undertaken to improve the convenience and reduce the cost for the travelling public: proposals for increased Regulatory Reform that include downward pricing flexibility; an aggressive negotiating position with the United States that will likely see more Canadian and American cities connected by air service; and as the Budget stated, an exploration of options for more locally-oriented management structures for airports which will be a major step to controlling costs.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ACQUIRED IMMUNE DEFICIENCY SYNDROME—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on September 18 last by the Honourable

[Senator Roblin.]

Stanley Haidasz respecting Health and Welfare—acquired immune deficiency syndrome—government policy.

(The answer follows:)

The Department of Health and Welfare is heavily involved in the development and implementation of strategies to prevent the spread of AIDS in Canada.

Funds have been allocated for the implementation of a national blood donation screening program. The Canadian Red Cross Blood Transfusion Service (CRC-BTS) will have in place, by November 1st, the technology for testing all blood donations for evidence of the virus believed to cause AIDS. Contaminated blood will be discarded, thereby virtually eliminating the risk of transfusion-associated AIDS. The CRC-BTS is, in addition, continuing its policy of self-exclusion of donors from population groups known to be affected by AIDS (e.g. male homosexuals).

As of July 1st, 1985, it was required that all Factor VIII concentrate given to hemophiliacs to promote clotting be heat treated to inactivate the virus. This will protect hemophiliacs from AIDS.

In addition, the Department is actively involved in the development of educational material on this subject. The National Advisory Committee on AIDS was created in 1983 and is comprised of scientists and physicians nationally. The Committee is working with the Department in the development of guidelines and information for health care professionals and the public. Education as to prevention of AIDS through lifestyle modification is a primary focus.

An educational pamphlet for the general public has been developed and distributed to provincial ministries of health, universities, secondary schools, hospitals, health units, community information centres, AIDS support groups, the Canadian Red Cross Society, the Canadian Hemophilia Society, private physicians, public clinics, and concerned individuals across the country. Over 500,000 copies of this pamphlet have been distributed, and an additional 200,000 pamphlets will be mailed out by the end of this year. A review for health care professionals has been distributed to professionals nationally in an effort to keep this group accurately informed.

National surveillance is ongoing to monitor the pattern of this disease in Canada. A hospital surveillance program is also underway to determine the risk of infection in health care workers who have been exposed to blood or body fluids while providing care to AIDS patients. Periodic surveys of female prostitutes are underway in order to determine the potential for spread into the heterosexual population. Presently, there is no evidence in Canada that prostitutes are affected.

The Department is providing laboratory testing services to physicians and researchers across Canada. As testing will be carried out at the provincial level in the near future, the laboratory will serve as a training site for technicians from the provinces as well as providing a reference laboratory service.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH IRAN

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on September 19 last by the Honourable Eymard Corbin respecting Foreign Affairs—re-establishment of diplomatic relations with Iran.

(The answer follows:)

Canada's diplomatic relations with Iran have not been severed. Iran maintains an Embassy in Ottawa, headed by that country's Chargé d'affaires, while Canadian affairs are looked after by the Canadian interests section of the Royal Danish Embassy in Tehran which includes a small number of locally-engaged staff employed by Canada.

We want to look to more productive relations with Iran, particularly in trade. To this end, the Government scrutinizes attentively any possible opportunity to enhance the bilateral relationship.

Periodically since 1980, there have been discussions between Canadian and Iranian officials about possibilities for improving relations, including occasional visits by Canadian government personnel to Tehran. For instance, earlier this year, one of our trade officers spent several days in Iran promoting Canadian commercial interests there.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

SALE OF CANNED TUNA UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION—PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE—EXTENT OF KNOWLEDGE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on September 24 last by the Honourable Royce Frith respecting Fisheries and Oceans—sale of canned tuna unfit for human consumption—Prime Minister's Office—extent of knowledge.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May we have this one read?

Senator Roblin: Yes. The former Minister of Fisheries advised in a news release issued September 20, 1985, that he had the first of a series of conversations with the Prime Minister in regard to the Star-Kist tuna matter on Wednesday, September 18, 1985. He also stated that two members of his staff had advised a member of the Prime Minister's Office on one occasion in July that a television network might run a story on the issue. Neither the former minister nor his staff provided the Prime Minister's Office with the now known details of this case, until Wednesday, September 18, 1985.

The former Minister of Fisheries was most certainly not persuaded by the Prime Minister's Office to overrule his officials.

SALE OF CANNED TUNA UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION—CONSUMER CONFIDENCE—FUTURE OF STAR-KIST PLANT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 1 last by the Honourable Eymard Corbin respecting the sale of canned tuna unfit for human consumption—future of the Star-Kist plant.

(The answer follows:)

The question was answered by Senator Roblin at the time that it was asked. Senator Roblin replied:

"I think I can tell my honourable friend that the government is examining in depth the whole question of certification of the wholesomeness of food of every kind. I think that I am within proper bounds if I tell my honourable friend that some announcements may be made with respect to this matter when the policy has been thoroughly considered.

With respect to employment at the plant in St. Andrews, New Brunswick, one must hope that the plant will continue in operation, because it has produced an acceptable product over many a long year, no matter what one happens to think of the particular issue that has been in the public press so persistently for the last little while. I believe that it will continue to produce a good product. However, it is clear to me that the plant will have some difficulties in re-establishing the full market, and for the next short period of time I would expect that to be the situation. We will just have to wait and see how the matter develops."

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

CENTRE BLOCK—REMOVAL OF PHOTOGRAPHS OF BRITISH PRIME MINISTERS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 15 last by the Honourable Henry Hicks respecting the Parliament Buildings—Centre Block—removal of photographs of British Prime Ministers.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Let us hear that answer.

Senator Roblin: Are you serious?

Senator Frith: Yes, I am.

Senator Roblin: The Speaker of the House of Commons advises:

This past summer while renovations were being made to the Parliamentary Restaurant and corridor leading to the restaurant, the photographs of the British Prime Ministers were removed. The Parliamentary Spouses Association, which was asked to suggest paintings for the restaurant, recommended that prints of Canadian Prime Ministers be put up in the corridor in place of the photographs.

Plans are now being made to have prints of the Canadian Prime Ministers hung in the corridor and a suitable location for photographs of the Prime Ministers—that is, of the United Kingdom—will be found.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

SALE AS PET FOOD OF CANNED TUNA UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 15 last by the Honourable Stanley Haidasz respecting the sale as pet food of canned tuna unfit for human consumption.

(The answer follows:)

Although there are presently no federal standards for the quality of the ingredients that go into pet food, the companies that market it have their own standards that the producers of pet food must meet. In the case at hand, Star-Kist has indicated that it does not intend to use the returned tuna for either human or pet food.

TRANSPORT

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—WELLAND CANAL BLOCKAGE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 16 last by the Honourable Richard Stanbury respecting Transport—St. Lawrence Seaway—Welland Canal blockage.

(The answer follows:)

Officials have determined the extent of the damage and worked out a repair procedure which is currently underway. It is expected that repairs will be completed by November the 6th.

Regarding any diversion of cargo, the Seaway is providing information as best they can but this would be a commercial decision.

With regard to possible lay-offs, the Minister is cognizant of that situation, and every effort is being made to speed lock repairs so that the ships can operate again.

BANKING

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL BANK—MEMORANDUM OF INTENT—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on September 19 last by the Honourable Royce Frith respecting the Canadian Commercial Bank—Memorandum of Intent—request for information.

These questions were raised again in the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee meetings on Bill C-79. Therefore, the answers were provided to Senator Frith directly in committee. However, in response to a request made in the Senate, I will repeat the answer now.

[Senator Roblin.]

(The answer follows:)

The participation agreement contained a number of provisions which were believed, at the time, to be adequate to ensure the continued operation of the Canadian Commercial Bank as a viable institution. During the summer, steps were taken to initiate the terms of the March agreement. However, on September 1, 1985, the Minister of Finance appointed a curator to the bank to oversee its operations until such time as a provisional liquidator could be appointed. Following this action, fulfillment of the terms of the March support agreement was not possible.

Specific Questions:

1. Schedule of assets. The schedule of assets referred to in the March memorandum of intent contains information on third parties which had business dealings with the bank. The release of this information is forbidden under Section 251 of the Bank Act. In addition, consent has not been obtained from the various parties identified in the schedule who have loans outstanding with CCB. Providing information on the relationship between the assets in the schedules and assets allegedly transferred to the U.S. subsidiary constitutes an indirect release of this information and is prohibited by the privacy requirements of the Bank Act.
2. Participation certificates. Participation certificates were issued in accordance with the terms of the support package.
3. Ranking of the support group. Under the terms of the March support agreement, members of the support group, other than the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation (CDIC), rank pari passu, or in equal standing, with depositors in the liquidation of the bank. The CDIC did not receive the same standing as other support group members because it stood to lose far more than its contribution in the event of the bank's failure. Thus most members of the support group will rank equally with the unsecured depositors of the bank including the government which will assume the rights of certain of these depositors in liquidation. However, they will not receive compensation from the government under Bill C-79.
4. Special Representatives. In accordance with the terms of the support package the Inspector General of Banks appointed two special representatives (Messrs. Cockburn and Johnston) to conduct a review of the "portfolio assets". Their reports contain confidential information on third parties which had business dealings with the bank and, as such, have not been made public.
5. Payments on loans identified in the support package. Interest was paid on some of the loans in the support

- package. Other loans identified in the support package have not paid interest.
6. Payments of dividends. No dividend payments were made by the bank following the adoption of the support package.
 7. Share warrants. Share warrants were not issued by the banks as the required change in the authorized capital of the bank was not completed prior to September 1, 1985.
 8. Opinion of the Inspector General. The Inspector General prepared a letter, in accordance with the support package, in which he expressed his view as to the solvency of the bank following the implementation of the support package.
 9. Subordination of debentures. An agreement was entered into in which the holders of the debentures waived interest payments until the members of the support group were repaid in full.
 10. Administration of the portfolio. The memorandum of intent did not include any provisions relating to the day to day administration of the portfolio identified in the support package by the CCB.
 11. CCB reports to the support group. The Inspector General of Banks maintained constant contact with CCB on matters regarding the bank's funding and other operations following the implementation of the support package.
 12. Directions given by support group to the CCB concerning the administration of the portfolio. There were no instructions issued by the members of the support group in regards to the administration of the support package portfolio.
 13. Ranking of support group participation. See number 3 above.
 14. Acquisition of participation certificates. The government did acquire participation certificates in accordance with the terms of the support group.
 15. Acquisition of warrants. No warrants were issued.
 16. Acquisition of debentures. The Government of Canada, in conjunction with the governments of Alberta and British Columbia acquired the outstanding debentures of the bank, totalling some $39 million. The cost of purchasing these debentures was shared equally by the three governments involved. The acquisition of these debentures was undertaken to meet the terms of the memorandum of intent, which specified that debenture holders must waive interest payments, to ensure the implementation of the support package.

17. Supporting agreements. The Government of Canada entered into a supporting agreement with the governments of Alberta and British Columbia whereby the three governments agreed to forgo interest payments on these debentures until all members of the support group were reimbursed.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

UNIVERSITY OF HAWAII—CONTRACT FOR SURVEY RESEARCH

Question No. 16 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Lorna Marsden:

18th September

1. Why was the largest contract awarded by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources ($603,795) given to the University of Hawaii in Honolulu for the purpose of carrying out survey research on the Juan de Fuca ridge system and the Vancouver Island continental slope, as listed in the August 1985 Research and Development Bulletin of Supply and Services Canada?

2. What were the contracts given in the last year by the Canadian Government to Universities outside Canada?

Reply from the Minister of Supply and Services:

1. A geophysical survey of the northern Juan de Fuca ridge system and Western Canadian Continental margin was recently completed by the Hawaii Institute of Geophysics, University of Hawaii with the acoustic imaging system SeaMARC II. The H.I.G. SeaMARC II imaging system is the only one of its kind in the world, making it necessary to award the contract to that research group.

Among many things that make this system unique are:

- (a) The ability to continuously insonify a large area of seafloor (10 km swath width, at 8 knot profiling speed)
- (b) The ability to obtain a high resolution, high quality geometrically correct backscatter image over the full swath width
- (c) The ability to obtain bathymetric data over the full swath width.

Many ongoing Canadian research programs, both in E.M.R. and in universities, are depending upon the imagery that only this system has been able to provide.

2. See table which follows.

THE SENATE

OASIS DEMONSTRATION CHANGE OF TIME

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I wish to advise those honourable senators who will be attending the Oasis demonstration

[Senator Marsden.]

this afternoon that the time of the demonstration has been moved up from 4 p.m. to 3 p.m. in Senator Bosa's office, Room 246-N.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to raise a point of order with respect to Orders of the Day. I begin by stating that it is evident from reading Orders of the Day that there is no legislation before us today. A week ago today we met and we had the bill dealing with the Yukon, which we dealt with very quickly; and because there was no evidence of any further government legislation, we adopted an adjournment motion to meet again today.

At that time I was somewhat skeptical as to the probability of having any legislation before us today, because I had made inquiries in the House of Commons, and, having had some experience in that place, I thought it was unlikely that there would be any bills before us if, indeed, we did meet today.

However, the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate was good enough to check with his counterparts in the House of Commons and reported that it was expected that we would have Bill C-66 and possibly Bills C-46, C-47 and C-48. Of course, not only has none of these bills come to us, but none of them was called by the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons in the intervening period. In fact, the information conveyed by the government to the opposition in the House of Commons was that a totally different set of bills would be dealt with in that house, including the Excise Tax Bill, the Employment Equity Bill, the Canagrex Bill and the Employee-Employer Relations Bill that affects employees of the House of Commons. There is a very bad gap in the information with which the leadership of the government in the Senate is confronted.

I do not intend to complain that we do not have legislation, nor do I intend to accuse the government of negligence or lack of planning, because I know that frequently there are reasons why legislation is held up in the House of Commons. What I want to express is my dissatisfaction and the dissatisfaction of the members of the opposition that the Senate is asked to meet, with the Speaker in the Chair, so frequently when there is no government legislation before us. I believe that this situation is unsatisfactory and I believe that it reflects badly on the Senate. We have to take some steps to change this unsatisfactory situation.

I know that as a result of this chamber's decision to adjourn last week there was at least one unfavourable headline which stated that the Senate had risen after three hours' work. If we permit ourselves to have that misleading headline or similar headlines direct our conduct, then we will lose even more ground in public opinion than we have lost already. It is clear that, even though the Senate was not meeting with the Speaker in the Chair, there were a large number of committee meetings doing very effective work.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator MacEachen: Let me say that if we do not insist upon that reality then we will be faced with even more unfavourable headlines. I know that there are a number of inquiries standing in the names of individual senators on the order paper today. Presumably, if they had been urgent inquiries, if these subjects were clamouring for debate, these senators would have stood up much earlier than today and spoken to those items. The fact of the matter is that they have been stood frequently because, in the opinion of the senators in whose names they stand, they did not justify immediate discussion and could be postponed. I do not believe that a meeting of this body is justified solely to deal with inquiries which have been postponed so frequently. I believe that we have to do a much better job of pooling information with respect to the business that is likely to come to the Senate from the House of Commons. My information, as I have said, was totally different from the information that the government had and upon which it based its decision or its wish to have this chamber meet again today. That is one point.

● (1430)

The second point is that we must plan better. I must say, honourable senators, that I dislike the notion that the Senate should meet, with the Speaker in the Chair, to deal with a single bill, then adjourn and meet again when another bill finds its way from the House of Commons. I believe that we ought to meet, with the Speaker in the Chair, when we have a substantial block of bills; when we have a solid piece of work to do. I believe that, with some planning, we could lay out a schedule of sittings, with the Speaker in the Chair, to deal with legislation and, as required, with items that are of interest to individual senators.

In saying that, am I saying that the Senate will not be working? Not at all, because today, if the Senate had not met, with the Speaker in the Chair, a good many senators would have been able to reschedule their committee meetings and, at this very moment, they would be attending very useful and needed committee meetings.

Honourable senators, we talk about Senate reform but there are some things that we can do to improve our own operations, and one of them is to take a more realistic attitude towards the work of the Senate, understanding that its principal activities take place in the committees which are now busily at work and which remain busily at work, even though the Senate is not meeting, with the Speaker in the Chair.

Therefore, honourable senators, I am doing two things: The first is to express my general dissatisfaction with the situation that we have today, namely that there is no public legislation, no government business before the Senate. There will be a great deal of government business to be dealt with by the Senate in the future, with the Speaker in the Chair. However, instead of meeting in what I call ceremonial fashion, filing in and filing out, why don't we plan ahead and block out our work so that, when the Senate meets, with the Speaker in the Chair, we have a solid piece of work to do and that we do all of the debating on second reading and third reading? When the Speaker is not in the Chair, then we can intensify the work of the committees. That does not mean, honourable senators, that we are neglecting legislation because, in the committees, there is presently under way pre-study of government legislation. That work could be intensified and increased so that the committees would attain even greater eminence than they presently enjoy.

Honourable senators, I raise this point of order gently today. I hope that we can consult about it and see whether it is possible to develop a work plan for the remainder of 1985 and 1986 that will permit us to deal expeditiously with government legislation; meet when that is required and, when we are not meeting with the Speaker in the Chair, we have a solid body of committee work to do that will justify calling the committees. By so doing, we will make a real contribution to the work of the country.

I can only say that, for myself, I find the present system thoroughly unsatisfactory. It offers no enticement to any legislator to be in this room today, called, presumably, to do public business, only to find that there is not a single piece of government legislation before us. I am not offering criticism as to why that is not the case. I am saying, why don't we do something to remove this recurring embarrassment and put the Senate on a better footing, not only in the eyes of the public but in our own eyes. Because let me tell you, honourable senators, if we do not have respect for our own operations and deal with them with respect, no one else will have much respect for them either.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am sure my honourable friend would expect me to respond to his well-reasoned, and, I would almost say, eloquent argument but perhaps that is going a little far. His statement may be persuasive on the surface but I find some difficulty in accepting it in all of its glory.

With respect to what the Senate is supposed to be doing, I agree that it would be desirable to have a smooth flow of government legislation into this chamber. I recall only too well the view taken by the present Deputy Leader of the Opposition when he sat on this side of the house, explaining to some of us on that side why it was not always possible. He explained to us that, really, it is not the government that has the control of the flow of legislation from the House of Commons, as a rule, but the opposition. Therefore, when we try to forecast what legislation we will be getting from the House of Commons, we must take into account not only the intentions of the government but also we must form some judgment as to what the opposition will agree should be done. If the opposition does not agree that a bill should move as expeditiously as we would like, there is not a great deal that we can do about it. Senator Frith used to make this point with crystal clarity.

Senator Steuart: But he was defeated. Don't you remember?

Senator Roblin: He was not defeated. He is still there; I am looking at him and I hope he is still of the same frame of mind.

The bills that were referred to by my honourable friend, Bill C-55, Bill C-59, Bill C-64 and Bill C-66, are still at the report stage in the House of Commons. One would have expected—and indeed I did expect—that they would have moved through the report stage and be here now, but they are not. Needless to say, I make representations to my colleague, the Leader of the House of Commons, telling him that we are here to do business and we would be glad to have those bills. I also suggest to him that he should take advantage of the fact that the Senate is a good place to introduce some bills, particularly bills which do not have a high political content. Technical bills or bills that must have a great deal of consideration given to them could well be introduced into the Senate in the first instance so that we would have an opportunity to deal with them before the House of Commons does, and in that way, perhaps, reduce some of the traffic jam there and get on with things. I think I have made a persuasive case and I expect that, before long, we will receive some of those bills in this house.

However, honourable senators, we are here to do more than attend to the government business. We have the business of the Senate, and the business of the Senate is laid out in the several resolutions or inquiries that are on our order paper. As my honourable friend was at some pains to point out, they have not been dealt with very expeditiously. That is true. Some of them have been there for several months and some not so long. Some of them are not of great consequence, it is true, and it would not matter if they were left indefinitely on the order paper. But there are some that are of consequence, and it is not a case of not having business to do but rather of not being ready to do it, and if we have any regard for the reputation of the Senate, then surely we should have the incentive to get on with our own business.

I can think of several other issues with which the Senate might concern itself, that are ideally suited to be debated in this chamber, and which we are not at present undertaking. Perhaps I share some responsibility for that. Let me tell you, for example, that the report of the Economic Council of Canada on the Economy of the Nation is a document that is well suited to be debated by means of inquiry in this house, and I see no reason why that could not be brought forward. The Report of the Auditor General is no light document. I do not recall when it was last debated here, but surely the Report of the Auditor General is something that we might consider as a suitable subject for the Senate to discuss. If we are looking for further business, what about the report issued by the House of Commons on equality, which has raised a few eyebrows here and there? That might be another subject which we could consider. We could also look at certain papers with respect to corporate taxation. Why are we not looking at those papers? We often complain in the Senate that we receive bills from the House of Commons in an almost frozen state, and that it is difficult to make amendments. That is often true, but it seems to me that if we were to debate some of these issues before they got to the legislative stage, we might have an opportunity of making an impact on the legislation that eventually comes before us. So, there is work for the Senate to do if honourable senators wish to undertake that work.

Let us suppose that we do not; let us suppose that we carry on as we are now, with no government legislation, and decide that our own business does not require our attention this day. Should we meet or not? I think we should.

[Senator MacEachen.]

We have sat on 88 days since this Parliament first met on November 5 last year. That is not an excessive number of days for the Senate to have met. If we sit on a day like this when there is no government business to deal with, does that prevent the committees from undertaking their responsibilities as soon as the Senate adjourns? Not at all; that is the plan of action. We come to the chamber. Question Period is called. Then we have an opportunity to debate the issues which senators themselves have placed before the chamber, and then senators are free to attend committee meetings. It can be arranged for Senate committees to meet when the Senate adjourns or later in the afternoon. To think that we are losing good committee time is, perhaps, an exaggeration. I do not think we are.

Honourable senators, it seems to me that we should be cautious about adopting the suggestion made by my honourable friend. I hesitate to say this, but he is a newcomer to this chamber. He, perhaps, brings a refreshing point of view to some of our problems, that I do not deny, but I do know that for many years we have found the current procedure to be tolerable, even if some honourable senators have approved of it in a noisy way. At least it has been possible up to now to carry on our business that way, and I think it still is.

If the Senate wants to change the way in which it does business, it can do that; it is the master of its own fate. The government side in this house is in no position to say "Nay," because we know that the "Nays" will not carry because there are not enough of us.

But if it is seriously suggested by the Leader of the Opposition that he wants to reorganize the business of the Senate, he is at liberty to try to do so. I am not proposing that he should do that; I simply say that it is not just the Leader of the Government who has the say as to what goes on in this place. I have my opinion; my colleagues have their opinions, and we have no difficulty expressing them, and that goes for all honourable senators. If an honourable senator thinks that there is a better way of doing business, one better suited to the nature of this chamber, then there is nothing in the world to prevent the Senate from considering that.

I wish to warn you, however, that once we depart from this well-trodden—perhaps overly-familiar—path which we have followed for many years, one has to anticipate a number of difficult problems to solve. If we are to go to this idea of having a backlog of bills to be dealt with before we meet, obviously that raises questions that need to be considered. I do not say that they are insuperable, but they are certainly going to raise new issues. If there is an emergency piece of legislation, we will come back to deal with that. But if there is a handful of what we consider to be minor bills—which, while it may be our opinion, may not necessarily be the opinion of the House of Commons—and if we wait to get more bills, then the question of time allocation arises, because the members of the other place have to be satisfied that we are dealing with these matters in a way that will suit their notion of a proper and timely consideration of public business. We are not alone in this, we are one chamber of the legislature. While I do not suggest that we take our orders from the other place—and we do not—nevertheless, there are legitimate concerns which have to be carefully considered.

So, I conclude that it is not an imposition to ask this body to meet 88 days since November 5 of last year. It is not an imposition to meet if there is no government bill on the order paper, because there are other things we can do, and even if we decide that we are not going to do them, that does not impede the work of the committees because they can assume their functions when the Senate is not sitting. Indeed, in the event of an emergency, the committees can meet when the Senate is sitting. So, no committee work is impeded.

I put it to you, therefore, that the case for dramatic change in the way we do business is not proven. If it is the will of honourable senators that we operate in some other way, honourable senators know how to bring that about.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government levelled a point at the Leader of the Opposition stating that he was a "newcomer," and that he might not be aware of the traditions of the Senate. Well, honourable senators, I am not a "newcomer"; I have been here for 19 years. During that time, and here I am going back to when the late John Connolly was the Leader of the Government in the Senate, we sometimes adjourned for two or three weeks to the call of the Speaker of the Senate. We did not stay here when we did not have something important to debate or legislation to deal with; we adjourned for whatever period seemed to be advisable in the circumstances. As I said, we were at all times subject to the call of the Chair. Very often we would receive a telegram to tell us that the Senate was being recalled. The Senate would reconvene, sit for whatever time was necessary to do the work that needed to be done, and then adjourn again. It was efficient; it worked, and it created no problems.

So, if we are looking for a precedent, that precedent is already there. It was not necessary then, nor is it necessary now to sit on an automatic three-day-a-week basis when there is no legislation to consider.

What developed at that time is rather interesting, because that is when the Senate experienced the remarkable growth of the committee system. The Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, the Senate Committee on National Finance and the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs all became much more powerful and worthwhile committees then. That was the genesis of those committees' really dealing with subjects of interest to the public and doing work that the Senate does so well.

One of the problems of having a rotational meeting system is that there really is not time for all the committees to meet. For example, when I was chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, that committee met every Tuesday afternoon. Now the Senate sits on Tuesday afternoon and we have been told that the committees can meet Tuesday evening. Well, it is difficult to get witnesses to come to an evening meeting. It can be done, but it is far more convenient for a committee to sit in the afternoon. In those weeks when the Senate is not sitting it is evident that the committees still do their work; they still have a good attendance, and they are not interfered with by unnecessary sittings of the chamber itself.

When the Honourable Paul Martin became the Leader of the Government in the Senate he wanted the Senate to sit on a regular basis. Just like the Leader of the Government of today, he kept saying that we ought to have debates on all sorts of issues. Quite frankly, that did not work at all, and, in fact, interfered with the way the committee system operated.

When the Senate meets to deal with legislation, it can also deal with other subjects under debate and inquiries at the same time. But what happens in the Senate now, honourable senators? We get talking and dealing with issues—and people can be scheduled in as part of the debate—and the sitting, instead of going on for an hour, goes on for three or four hours. When we come here and have a debate on just one inquiry or on just one issue raised by a senator, I do not think we get much in the way of debating. The result is that we deal with one issue and then we close down for the day. And in the course of doing that, we have interfered with the scheduling of committees.

If you are conducting a serious study, as we used to in the National Finance Committee, and you are looking ahead perhaps three or four months, you want to know that you can schedule committee hearings without their being interfered with. If the Senate is sitting, then you have to schedule your meetings accordingly.

I really think there is every precedent for changing our approach. If there is no legislation, I think we should adjourn and concentrate on committee work. I do not think that we should become a debating society just because we want to sit every week. The important work of this body is done by its committees, and I think the committees work better when we are not sitting than when we are.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I am not a new boy in this chamber and I have listened to what everyone has said. It is my view that there is no substitute for the sitting of this chamber. We are here to sit, and to sit regularly. If there is not enough work to be done in the chamber, there is plenty of work to be done in our committees. However, I believe that committees are not the most important aspect of our work. It is the work of the chamber itself which has the power and the tradition. Certainly, our committees are doing much more work than they used to and some of it may deal with more important issues than was the case in the past. There is no reason why they cannot continue to do so. But it is our duty to be ready to deal with any matter on a moment's notice and I think that this house should be kept open under all circumstances.

I remember the days when we adjourned for two to three weeks at a time and we received terrible publicity. The press attacked us immediately. We can still adjourn the odd week when we have a heavy schedule of committee work, and that is understandable, but I do not think that we can afford to risk our rather weakened position in the eyes of a great number of Canadians to adjourn this chamber for two weeks to a month. I think it is our duty to sit regularly and also to make time available for committee meetings, thereby allowing us to discharge our obligation. I recall in the past adjourning for long periods of time and I found it most unsatisfactory. We did not feel that we were doing our duty and we certainly received adverse publicity in that regard. I am opposed to long adjournments of this chamber under any circumstances.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, because the subject of procedure has been raised, which has brought forward some very interesting points of view, I think that it is time to bring up one other thought in connection with our procedure. A few years ago we introduced Question Period in this chamber and it was done for very valid reasons by the Standing Rules and Orders Committee which sought the advice and agreement of the chamber. I think it has served a very useful purpose, but those of us who have been here for any length of time have to recognize that Question Period has changed to a very marked degree. It was agreed that questions would be short and would deal with matters of immediate importance, and that there would be no preamble and no debate. That condition has not been honoured in this chamber for the past two or three years.

Since we are talking about reforming or improving our procedure, I would like to suggest to the chamber that perhaps we should have the Standing Rules and Orders Committee—I see that our chairman, Senator Molgat, is present—examine the rule that allows Question Period, to see if it can be strengthened in some way so that it may be more effective in its application.

I have observed that as it operates today, Question Period four times out of five produces debate. Some of the newly appointed senators are taking great liberty with it. They frequently say that they have a supplementary and then make another speech. This is not the purpose of Question Period. Since we are now discussing possible improvements in our procedure, I feel it is the part of wisdom to suggest that the Standing Rules and Orders Committee examine the rule governing Question Period with a view to making it operate as originally intended.

AGING

JUSTICE FOR THE ELDERLY—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Croll calling the attention of the Senate to justice for the elderly.—(Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax)).

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, before participating, albeit briefly, in the reply to the inquiry of Senator Croll of last June, I say to my colleague, Senator MacEachen, that I am conscious of the delay, but it was not due to any indifference on my part to the quality of the remarks that he made at that time. I have given some thought as to what I might say in reply and I have changed my mind several times.

Before I speak to the inquiry, I should say that in my first month or so in this chamber I indicated that while I knew over 50 per cent of the members of this chamber, some of my happiest associations and memories arose from meeting some of the senators that I had not known. One of my biggest thrills was in meeting for the first time Senator Croll whom I have heard about for so many years as a leader of a municipal government, as a member of the Ontario Legislature and as a distinguished member of this house.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator MacDonald: I consider him to be a great humanitarian and an inspiration to all of us who in age are not really that much younger than he is but who have regarded him as an idol and an inspiration in all matters of public life.

Those of you who remember Senator Croll's remarks will note that it was only in his first paragraph that he referred briefly to matters of the elderly, the poor and the unfortunate. He devoted only a paragraph to that. Before getting into those matters, he said, he wanted to say something about the responsibilities of the Senate and the methods of meeting those responsibilities. He deplored the fact that the Senate had been misunderstood. I think he used words "had been kicked around." He indicated that he did not think there was any constituency for the abolition of the Senate, but that there was a constituency for reforming it. It was then that he offered a solution by suggesting that it was about time we put the question directly to the people of Canada, clearly and comprehensively. He called for a national referendum—what he referred to as the "ultimate expression of democracy in action." The referendum question he suggested was:

● (1500)

Do you favour amending the Constitution in order to provide for an elected Senate with an equal number of senators from each of the provinces and territories and with powers similar to those that it now possesses?

While I might share Senator Croll's frustration at the public lack of understanding of the work of the Senate or, indeed, the indifference with which the media may treat the affairs of the Senate, I submit, with respect, that we may have two problems here. The first was expressed in a question asked by Senator Gigantès at the close of Senator Croll's remarks. Senator Gigantès said that he, Senator Croll——proposed a referendum but he also said that the press does not know what we do nor does it want to know what we do. One of the consequences of that is the public probably does not know what we do. How can we go to the public when it has been deliberately uninformed?

How, indeed?

The second matter which puzzled me was Senator Croll's use of the term "referendum." I realize that, although the differences between the terms "referendum" and "plebiscite" have not always been recognized in practice, because they have frequently been used as synonyms, technical differences between the two do exist. A referendum, as I understand it, is supposed to be a method of direct legislation by the people: a specific law either proposed or already enacted is presented to the electorate for ratification or rejection. A plebiscite, on the other hand, is not such a form of procedure. It is merely a device to ascertain the opinion of the electorate on a subject, but not involving any obligation on the legislative body to act upon it, as is, apparently, usual with a referendum.

Even though the referendum has never found its way into Canadian constitutional practice, there has been a number of cases where it has been resorted to or many cases where it has been advocated, as in the case of Senator Croll. It has been common practice in municipal governments in Canada to refer specific questions to the electors, particularly at election time and, mostly in the Canadian experience, involving matters concerning liquor control. However, between 1955 and 1965, no less than 168 Canadian communities held referenda—most called them "plebiscites"—on the issue of adding fluoride to water supplies.

It is clear, however, that the referendum is alien to the spirit of Canadian parliamentary government which is based on the principle that the representatives of the people have been elected in order to decide all questions affecting the well-being of the country.

At the national level, my research indicates that only two advisory plebiscites have been submitted to the public: in 1898 on the temperance issue; and in 1942 on the question of absolving the government from a former pledge not to introduce military conscription.

In the first instance concerning prohibition, the net majority in favour of prohibition was less than 14,000, of approximately 600,000 voters—44 per cent of those on the voters' list. Because of two factors, Sir Wilfrid Laurier did not believe that the pressure was considerable enough to warrant a federal prohibition law because, in the Province of Quebec, 122,000 voted against prohibition and only 28,000 in favour. Vive le Québec libre!

In the second federal plebiscite—and I say "plebiscite" because the Dominion Plebiscite Act of 1942 was passed in Parliament in order to permit this specific recourse—the question was, as many in this chamber will remember:

Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitment restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

On counting the votes, it was found that 2,900,000 had said, "Yes," and 1,600,000 had said, "No." Again, Quebec was the only province where the majority voted in the negative.

In still searching for the specific employment of the term "referendum," the only clear example seems to have taken place in Newfoundland. The people of Newfoundland had an important question to decide on how they were going to be governed. Prime Minister Mackenzie King had said that, should Newfoundlanders indicate clearly that they wanted Newfoundland to become a Canadian province, the government would be prepared to take the necessary steps. A referendum was requested by the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations. In the first referendum, "responsible government" led "confederation with Canada" by over 5,000 votes. This occurred, apparently, because there was a third choice on the ballot, which was a proposition for a government commission which was to last five years. In the second referendum, that option was eliminated and the concept of confederation with Canada gained a majority of approximately 7,000 votes, a margin of 2 per cent. Newfoundland became part of Canada.

A year or so later, I asked my old friend, Don Jamieson—who, I must say, I regret is not a member of this chamber—how those who had voted against confederation with Canada had accepted the so-called "bad news." He gave me the following analogy: He told me that he had an old racehorse in Corner Brook that would never get out of the starting gate unless the contents of the feed bag were mixed with a bottle of Demerara rum. I asked Mr. Jamieson if the horse had ever won a race, and he told me it had not, but that it was the happiest loser you ever saw.

Honourable senators, I wish to conclude these rambling remarks by saying that the principle of the right of the electorate to legislate either by referendum or plebiscite is really an American principle. It is alien to our parliamentary system of legislating through duly-elected representatives.

If Senator Croll feels that this is an unnecessary answer to his thoughtful remarks, I apologize. I sympathize with the comments he made and I share his frustrations. I just feel a little apprehensive about the solution he has suggested.

If I am still not clear on the perception between "plebiscites" and "referenda," and, if, indeed, they have any application to our parliamentary system, I hark back to some comments made by Senator Roblin the other day on quite another matter when he invoked an old British legal maxim which states: "If you don't know the answer to the question, then don't ask it."

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

● (1510)

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: If no other honourable senator wishes to participate in the debate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, when I spoke on this inquiry originally I said that I would speak to it again in concluding the debate. Therefore, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Croll, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Inquiries:

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I am slightly embarrassed. My office has not sent down the written inquiry that I wanted to place on the order paper. I do not know whether honourable senators wish to accept a verbal notice of inquiry or whether we might best leave the matter until tomorrow. The difficulty is that I am going to Bermuda at the end of the week, and I do want to make my remarks on this matter before I leave.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Hicks: I am going away on parliamentary business, honourable senators, so perhaps we will leave the matter until tomorrow.

Senator Roblin: We will be here tomorrow.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 1430)

ADDRESS

BY

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE BRIAN MULRONEY
PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA

TO

THE UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY
NEW YORK

ON

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1985

[Translation]

Mr. President, I would like to speak with you today about people and nations working together.

History shows that the solitary pursuit of self-interest outside the framework of broader international co-operation is never enough to increase our freedom, safeguard our security, or improve our standard of living.

Since 1945, we have not had a world war. But we have lived for decades under the threat of an ultimate catastrophe, one which would unleash immeasurable forces of destruction. The same human genius which conquered outer space has also wrenched from nature the secret of devastation.

In our search to create, we discovered the ability to annihilate. Anxiety has become a fact of daily life. It can be seen in the arts; it permeates political activity; it alters social structure; it shapes mentalities.

How can we help but fear our adversaries, when they too are equipped with an inventive and lively intelligence, when they too have mastered the destructive power of the atom, and above all, when they are filled with the same fear that so preoccupies us—a fear exacerbated by the fact that the strong must also be wary of the anger of the weak. We have even gone so far as to institutionalize fear, to the point that peace itself is based on a balance of terror.

Can we blame the UN for having been unable to put an end to the vicious cycle of force and fear, of injustice and violence? In my view we cannot blame the UN for problems that have been caused essentially by self centered nationalism and our own failures. We must not make the UN a scapegoat for our inability to recognize and accept diversity in the world. We must not blame the UN for weaknesses that result from its being a mere human creation.

While the UN may seem powerless in the face of the circumstances that confront it, it is nevertheless all we have. The men and women who created this organization in 1945 hungered for peace and justice and were guided by high principle. They sought to create a global forum where they could voice their hopes and fears, their dreams and regrets.

In this organization nations have the opportunity to bring reason to their relations, to break the chain of violence, to defuse the lust for revenge, to voice their needs, and to affirm their dignity. And, in the end, to realize the extent to which they share membership in the same species.

In the end, we must always return to consideration of humanism. Humanism generates and shapes international consciousness, cultural development, economic development, and the respect for those values that form the basis of our perception of the world.

The UN was created by man, and is therefore fragile. For this reason, I do not believe that it is completely appropriate to talk about celebrating one particular anniversary of the UN; rather, we must celebrate its existence every day, for it is threatened every day, and it must be protected every day.

[Text]

Since 1945, we have all recognized the threat presented by catastrophic weapons of war. That threat goes beyond our individual concerns as peoples and nations. It commands the attention of all; it calls for urgent action by the entire international community.

Mr. President, forty years ago, the Charter called on the world "to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war". Today, we struggle to save life from nuclear apocalypse. We have some cause for hope. In their meeting next month in Geneva, President Reagan and Secretary General Gorbachev may set us on the road to a significant reduction in the arsenals of both sides. To diminish the spectre of annihilation, the superpowers must reach for an agreement—but the responsibility is not theirs alone.

All of us, through international forums and treaties, have a role to play in arms reduction. We must reinforce negotiations for verifiable disarmament accords on testing and weaponry, both conventional and nuclear. Individually and collectively, we must all do our part. Progress is possible. The recent successful review of the non-proliferation treaty gives credence to that.

Canadians recognize that there is no greater goal, no more compelling duty than the quest for peace. We shall not rest until our security can be assured without tens of thousands of nuclear weapons. Above all, we shall not rest until we have secured the future for our children.

Mr. President, forty years ago, the peoples of the world were united in the hope that human rights could become subject to universal standards. Forty years later, some countries apply these standards only in part, and a few—sadly—hardly at all. In this respect, South Africa stands alone.

Only one country has established colour as the hallmark of systematic inequality and repression. Only South Africa determines the fundamental human rights of individuals and groups within its society by this heinous method of classification. The institutionalized contempt for justice and dignity desecrates international standards of morality and arouses universal revulsion. That is why, at our meeting in Nassau just concluded, Commonwealth Leaders agreed on a course of common action against South Africa.

And the crescendo of pressure is having an impact. Already, the opposition of the business community to apartheid is unprecedented. The combination of internal dissent and external condemnation is obviously taking its toll on the government. The Mandelas, the Tutus, the Boesaks will one day prevail.

It is our hope—and it must surely be the hope of all—that bloodshed and violence will cease in the transition to a free and democratic society. It is our hope—as it must surely be the hope of all—that the Republic of South Africa will come to its senses before it is completely engulfed by the shockwaves of violence.

My Government has said to Canadians that if there are not fundamental changes in South Africa, we are prepared to invoke total sanction against the country and its repressive regime. If there is no progress in the dismantling of apartheid, our relations with South Africa may have to be severed absolutely.

[Translation]

Our purpose is not to punish or penalize, but to hasten peaceful change. We do not aim on conflict but at reconciliation—within South Africa and between South Africa and its neighbours.

The way of dialogue starts with the repudiation of apartheid. It ends with the full and equal participation of all South Africans in the governing of their country. It leads toward peace.

If it is not accepted, the course of sanctions will surely be further pursued. Canada is ready, if there are not fundamental changes in South Africa, to invoke total sanctions against that country and its repressive regime. More than that, if there is no progress in the dismantling of apartheid, relations with South Africa may have to be severed absolutely.

[Text]

Mr. President, forty years ago, emerging from the ruins of global conflict, the world was in economic upheaval. Today, though we have made enormous gains, hundreds of millions are caught in desperate economic circumstances.

Over the last several weeks, from this dais, heads of state, heads of government and foreign ministers have eloquently described their circumstances, ranging from crippling burdens of debt and blighted prospects on the one hand, to the menace of protectionism on the other.

Canada is pressing, urgently, for a new round of multilateral trade negotiations. We are seeking to liberalize further our own trading relationships with our largest partner, the United States of America. We are working actively to strengthen the capacity of international financial institutions to ease the paralyzing burden of Third World debt and permit resumed growth. We are increasing our aid.

The international mobilization and delivery of aid show dramatically what immense good can be done when governments and citizens together recognize crises and act with concerted determination aided by organizations such as the UN and its agencies. If, collectively, we have managed to save whole populations from starvation—and we have—then surely in the same spirit we can improve our performance in easing the international economic predicament.

Mr. President, forty years ago, there was another blight upon this earth that took an incalculable toll of human life: remorseless epidemics of disease. Over the intervening decades, we have made huge strides in discovering cures and in combating those diseases. Today we stand on the threshold of another dramatic breakthrough.

UNICEF and the World Health Organization have set 1990 as the target for world-wide, universal immunization. If the target is reached, the lives of as many as five million infants and children will be saved every year. We have eradicated smallpox; through universal immunization, we must now do the same with diphtheria, measles, polio, tetanus and whooping cough.

Universal immunization is an astonishingly efficient health investment. On the eve of the Commonwealth Conference last week in Nassau, I confirmed Canada's commitment to this goal and announced a significant increase to Canada's international health care efforts. Canada will continue to collaborate with UNICEF and the World Health Organization as they coordinate this inspiring campaign. For us, the goal of mass immunization exemplifies, in large measure, what the United Nations is all about.

Finally, Mr. President, recent events compel me to address the scourge of international terrorism. By and large, Canada has been spared the ravages of terrorism. Today, this is no longer the case—we too have experienced its pain.

No one nation alone can combat terrorism; it demands concerted international action. We must exchange information, there must be nation-to-nation understandings, and we must have international conventions. Those who murder and maim innocent people, those who bring anarchy to civilized society can have no sanctuary, no comfort, no indulgence.

Canada joins with countries around the world in the search for a determined and effective response. We urge all states to support such practical measures as counter-terrorist conventions and the ICAO's drive to strengthen the security of international air travel.

Mr. President, Canada esteems the United Nations, its record and its potential. Our commitment to the principles of the Charter and to international co-operation is no fashionable pose. For four decades, it has been a motive force in our foreign policy. Time and again, on critical occasions Canada has offered its troops for UN-sponsored peace-keeping roles around the globe.

Canadians are united in one simple conviction: to better the human condition and to achieve international peace and security, nations acting together can always do much more than nations acting apart.

To be sure, we recognize the imperfections, deficiencies and limitations of the United Nations. That is why we work so hard to improve its functioning; that is why we so strongly support the Secretary-General as he strives to reform it from within. But all said and done, Mr. President, we must surely agree with the Secretary-General that where the United Nations is weak, it is almost always due to failure of political will.

That kind of failure is not easily reformed. It will change only when sovereign states realize that the principles of the Charter are the signposts that can lead us all towards mutual respect, collective security and lasting peace. Living by these principles offers the best hope for us all. To the fulfillment of these noble and timeless principles, Canada today renews its pledge of loyalty and support.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, November 6, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

TELEVISIONING OF COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, with the indulgence of the house, I would like to make a brief report on behalf of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Last evening, after the house adjourned, I returned to my office to find a letter from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation requesting the right to televise for broadcast the proceedings of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): What order of business are we dealing with now?

Senator Murray: Reports of committees. On the basis of some research that I asked to be done over the supper hour, I am satisfied that in the several precedents that exist, it is the Senate, this body, that has exercised the right to grant or to withhold that kind of permission.

Last night I convened a meeting to seek the views of the members of the committee on the matter, and after some discussion the committee instructed me to seek leave of the Senate today to present a motion to permit the televised broadcasting of our proceedings on Bill C-79.

I may say in passing that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which made the request, indicated an interest in beginning their broadcast coverage of the proceedings as early as this evening, when we will have as our witness Mr. Gerald Bouey, the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

The committee also instructed me, on its behalf, to satisfy myself that parliamentary customs in respect of broadcasting would be respected, that what I might call the spirit of the electronic Hansard would be respected by the broadcasters. I have entered into some discussions with the CBC on this matter and I am satisfied, on the basis of verbal and written assurances which they have given me, that it is their intention, if permission is granted, to respect the spirit of the electronic Hansard concept in the committee.

There is one other matter, however, that I should bring to the attention of the Senate. The request has been made by the CBC. I think senators would agree that any permission we give to one network would have to be given to all networks. This raises the question of whether the Senate would contemplate seeing not one but, rather, two or three, or, in the extreme, as many as five or six cameras in the committee room; or, alternatively, whether we could arrange some kind of what is called a pool arrangement. This, I am informed, would be possible, but would create some difficulties, at least in the early going, because there would be a considerable amount of equipment, not in the committee room, but in the corridors outside. That is my report to the Senate of the instructions that have been given to me by the committee and of my conversations today with the representative from the CBC. I rise simply to inform the Senate that at the appropriate time—that is, when Notices of Motions are called—I will, pursuant to instructions the committee has given me, ask for leave to present the motion to permit the televised broadcasting of the committee's proceedings.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the Fourth Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders respecting changes to the Royal Assent ceremony. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "A" p. 1469.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I move that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the Fifth Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders respecting the use of male and female genders in the rules of the Senate. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "B" p. 1470.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I move that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have the pleasure to present the Sixth Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders respecting responses of the government to committee reports. I ask that the report be printed as an Appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "C" p. 1475.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I move that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

THE HONOURABLE RICHARD B. HATFIELD

FIFTEENTH ANNIVERSARY OF BECOMING PREMIER OF NEW BRUNSWICK—NOTICE OF ENQUIRY

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Wednesday next, November 20, 1985, I will call the attention of the Senate to the Honourable Richard B. Hatfield's fifteenth anniversary as Premier of New Brunswick.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO PERMIT TELEVISION OF COMMITTEE'S PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Senate do empower the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to permit televised broadcasting of its public proceedings on the subject-matter of the Bill C-79, intituled: "An Act respecting the provision of compensation to depositors of Canadian Commercial Bank, CCB Mortgage Investment Corporation and Northland Bank in respect of uninsured deposits."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I ask that leave not be granted.

Senator Murray: That being the case, honourable senators, and Senator Kelly having availed himself of his undoubted right to withhold leave, I think the committee would expect me to give notice that tomorrow, Thursday, November 7, 1985, I will move:

That the Senate do empower the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to permit televised broadcasting of its public proceedings on the subject-matter of the Bill C-79, intituled: "An Act respecting the provision of compensation to depositors of Canadian Commercial Bank, CCB Mortgage Investment Corporation and Northland Bank in respect of uninsured deposits."

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a point of order, the question of whether or not leave is necessary for this motion, it seems to me, turns on whether it is a motion for an instruction to a committee under rule 45(1)(e), the rule the mover of the motion referred to when asking for leave. If it is such a motion—that is, an instruction to a committee—then it would clearly fall under rule 45 and would require one day's notice. But, the motion does not instruct the committee; it asks that the Senate empower the committee to do something and therefore that might be considered a formal matter under rule 46, not requiring any notice.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Argue?

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Austin, that the Senate do adjourn—

Senator Frith: I take it that the ruling has been made that Senator Murray's motion does fall under rule 45 and not under rule 46. Otherwise, if there is no ruling on it, the point of order will be left dangling.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, would it be in order for me to suggest that we give some time to the Speaker to consider this matter and perhaps he can report later this day?

Senator Frith: Agreed.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if we are to consider the point of order that has been raised by the Honourable the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, then we are all afforded the opportunity to help the Speaker make his decision in this respect.

My honourable friend, as I understood from listening to him, did not express an opinion as to what the correct rule should be.

● (1410)

I should like to offer my opinion that rule 45(1)(e) is the rule that applies because that, indeed, is an instruction to a committee. I believe that that is the rule that governs.

Having said that, I leave it to His Honour to decide the point.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, in fairness, and in the same spirit as Senator Roblin offered his advice, I should point out that the difficulty in deciding that it falls under rule 46(s) is that that rule states:

other motions of a merely formal—

One might get away with calling it “merely formal”:

—or uncontentious character.

I suppose the very fact that leave is refused indicates that it is contentious, but that, still, is a judgment after the fact.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS—MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER RULE 46(g) TO CONSIDER MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Austin, P.C.:

That the Senate do adjourn for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance, namely: the failure of the Government to announce its drought assistance programs and the necessity to immediately announce a program of aid to farmers in the drought area of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia in response to the urgent demand of farm organizations for the payment of $50 per seeded acre and $100 per cow.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Austin, P.C., pursuant to rule 46(g):

That the Senate do adjourn for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance, namely: the failure of the Government to announce its drought assistance programs and the necessity to immediately announce a program of aid to farmers in the drought area of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia in response to the urgent demand of farm organizations for the payment of $50 per seeded acre and $100 per cow.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on a point of order because I think there is a point of order that needs to be considered on this particular issue, I have no objection to my honourable friend making any speech he wishes to make. I realize my chances of stopping him are not very good anyway, so I might as well concede the point graciously. But I think it is important for us to know under what rule we are operating when my honourable friend brings in a motion of this kind.

What has long troubled parliamentarians with motions of this kind is the definition of “urgency”. The rule that is universally followed is that it must be urgent enough to deal with the matter at the particular point in time at which it is raised. It is not a question as to whether or not the subject matter is urgent, because those are a dime a dozen. There are all kinds of items the subject matter of which is regarded as being urgent. The question is: Is it urgent that the matter be discussed at this particular moment, so urgent that we should set aside all of the business that we have before us in order to deal with it?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): What business is that?

Senator Roblin: The order that stands in the name of the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition, and which has been there for weeks, with respect to Canada's position on the SDI, could be considered a matter of urgency, if my honourable friend wishes to stretch his mind that far.

So, I think there is business before the Senate, and the question, then, is whether it is urgent to debate this matter at this particular moment.

If it is not that kind of a resolution, then my honourable friend can give notice that he intends to debate the matter and we will do so tomorrow or on the next sitting day.

So, I think that we ought to ask the Speaker to decide on the meaning of the word “urgent”. We admit that it is an urgent subject, but the question is: Is it so urgent that the urgency warrants or calls for the making of the speech at this particular moment? If the Speaker should rule that it is in order—I think it is not—then I suggest there is another consideration. It is usual in most assemblies where it is contemplated to propose measures of this sort that the mover gives somebody notice that he intends to do this. I am not sure whether my honourable friend gave notice to the Speaker that he intended to move this motion. If he did not, I think it would have been wiser if he had done so, because it puts the Speaker in the awkward position of having to deal with it as a point of order when somebody like myself raises it here. I presume that he did advise the Speaker.

Senator Argue: He did not advise the Speaker.

Senator Roblin: Well, we see that that is the case. The usual policy is to provide whoever is expected to reply on the other side with a copy of the resolution. My honourable friend was kind enough to come over before the session started to tell me that he intended to do this, but I can hardly be expected, and none of my colleagues can be expected, to reply to the substance of a motion which we have not even read. It is customary, and, I think, appropriate in assemblies of this kind, first of all, to notify the Speaker so that he may consider the point of order and, secondly, to let those on the other side have a copy of the resolution so they will know what particular subject they are expected to deal with and can, if necessary, put their thoughts in order. I do not expect any lengthy notice and I am not likely to get it, but I think that making available a copy of the resolution would be in order.

Therefore, I ask the Speaker to take into consideration whether or not this motion is within the ambit of our rules; if it is we will proceed with it accordingly; otherwise, my honourable friend can take the other course that is open to him and deal with it as an inquiry for the house.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, speaking to the point of order and not to the motion itself, it seems to me there is something circuitous in what Senator Roblin has said. He says that the first question to decide is whether it is an urgent matter, and then, if it is an urgent matter, to consider the question of notice. Rule 46 provides that no notice is required in the case of an urgent motion, so it seems to me there is only one question to consider, namely, whether it is urgent or not, which brings us to the question of who decides whether it is urgent or not. I do not have a specific precedent. It may be in order for the Speaker to make a recommendation to the Senate as to whether it is urgent or not, but, of course, it is up to the Senate to decide finally whether it considers it an urgent matter or not. As with other rulings by the Speaker and also particularly with reference to a rule that is quite clear, rule 46 states:

No notice is required—
—of a motion—

(g) for the adjournment of the Senate for the purposes of raising a matter of urgent public importance—

If the Senate decides that it is a matter of urgent public importance, then no notice is required. It goes on to state:

—(which the mover shall state on rising to speak) before the House proceeds to the Orders of the Day;—

Therefore, everything is regular because Senator Argue has made the motion prior to the Orders of the Day. Once the Senate decides whether it is urgent or not, there is no further decision to be made about notice because the rules are very clear in that they provide that for such a matter no notice is required. If we are now going to debate whether or not it is urgent, then I suggest that the mover of the motion should be given an opportunity to tell us why it is urgent.

Senator Roblin: May I clarify a point, because Senator Frith picked up on something that I really did not intend to say? I do not think I said that notice was required. Notice is not required. I am simply saying that as a matter of convenience it is usual in some assemblies to let the Speaker and the government know that the motion is proposed because, first of all, not to do so makes it difficult for the Speaker to make a ruling when it is asked for and, secondly, it gives members of the other side of the house who may want to reply to the speech some opportunity to get their thoughts in order. I cannot make the claim that notice, in the sense stated by my honourable friend, is required.

● (1420)

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, speaking to the point of order that has been raised by the Leader of the Government, I think he knows—and, certainly, there are dozens of precedents which can be cited, although I do not have the books before me in this matter—adjourning the Senate to debate a matter of urgent public business does not, in fact, attempt to define what is “urgent public business” and what is not.

Whether or not there is urgency for debate is the question before the chamber now. Therefore, I think it is necessary to attempt to persuade your honour and honourable senators, if it goes to a point where the Senate itself decides, that this is in order, that the drought assistance program for farmers in western Canada is urgent.

As a matter of fact, I am sure that having listened to the Question Period over the last few weeks in this chamber, the Leader of the Government has acknowledged that there is an urgent, almost desperate, economic situation facing some of those farmers. There is no question about that, and I do not think the government is challenging that in any way.

We then move to this question of urgency of debate. Honourable senators, it is clear that we have been asking the government at least once a week, and usually more often, ever since the Senate reconvened in September to make an announcement about this matter. Even as late as yesterday, we were told that they expect to make an announcement soon.

Honourable senators, that is exactly the same answer we got five or six weeks ago. If people do not understand how urgent it is for the people involved to have some knowledge, after all this time has passed, of what their economic situation is going to be, then, of course, they just do not understand what it means to go without income, without the prospect of income, and not knowing what program may be set up for the entire year, as is the case for some of these farmers.

It is true that some programs have been announced by some provincial governments, but this federal government has constantly promised that a program will be announced soon. I know Senator Argue and I have asked the Leader of the Government on a number of occasions, “What does ‘soon’ mean?” That is why there is urgency of debate—to try to impress upon the government that these people are waiting and waiting and we are not getting any answers.

I admit that it is probably not the fault of the Leader of the Government that he is unable to make an announcement. I think he almost made an announcement yesterday and perhaps a week ago as well, because there was an indication that the government had considered the matter and, indeed, that cabinet had considered it. But they do not come forward with an announcement. They do not tell the people who are so urgently and desperately affected by this drought what the government program is going to be.

Therefore, I argue that the urgency of the debate arises because the fact that we cannot get answers from the government is well established. We need not mention any outside arguments; what has taken place on the floor of this chamber, I submit, raises the matter of urgency of debate.

I would, therefore, hope that Your Honour and honourable senators, as well, will take all of that into account and allow Senator Argue to go forward with his debate and that he will be supported by senators on both sides of this chamber because of the reasons that are well known and have been expressed here over and over again during Question Period for more than six weeks now.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, on the point of order, this provision for a motion for the adjournment of the Senate to discuss a question of urgent public importance is, as Senator Roblin has said, a well established rule. I have had the opportunity and the privilege on many occasions in the House of Commons to move the adjournment of that chamber to discuss a question of urgent public importance. The idea of sending a notice around to His Honour and to other honourable senators is not required by the rules, as Senator Roblin has agreed. In those days, in the other place, we may not have been as courteous as we should have been. We learn a little about courtesy in the Senate. I was, I suppose, accustomed to the practice of not disclosing something that was to be put forward as being urgent by giving everyone notice in advance. That practice may be changed, however.

I believe that it is completely clear that under our rules this kind of motion is entirely in order. It has been used in this chamber before. I have in my hand the Senate Hansard of March 7, 1978, when our distinguished colleague, Senator Molgat, made use of this motion—even in those days the rule was 46(g)—to discuss matters of urgent public importance: the strike of beef producers in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, the subsequent drastic reduction in cattle marketing, the layoff of employees in auction houses and in packing houses and the need for action to establish confidence amongst beef producers. At that time, the regular objections that one might expect to be made were made. After considerable discussion, however, the motion was ruled in order and the debate continued.

Senator Roblin, in my view, was really grasping at straws when he said that there are urgent matters on the order paper. We have to discuss Star Wars—I am sure that President Reagan is waiting for us to discuss the SDI. It is suggested that we had better hurry up and talk about it or the world will not unfold as President Reagan would like it to unfold. Well, that is not okay with me. As far as I am concerned, that is a matter of no urgency at all.

In any event, the motion I am proposing is that the Senate adjourn for the purpose of discussing the drought situation in our country. The urgent need for action is even greater today, in my judgment, than it was when the problem was first discussed. Farmers are going bankrupt. There is family stress which in some cases has ultimately led to suicide, as has been reported from time to time. It is alleged that this stress has to do with financial problems arising from very low income. It is high time that this matter was dealt with. The government has had in its possession for weeks a report prepared by Len Gustafson, and now is the time that it should be taken seriously and acted upon. I can think of nothing at this time that is more urgent than this debate, which seeks action from this very slow government. I hope that His Honour will have no hesitation in ruling this motion in order. I think honourable senators will agree that it is in order and that it is a proper way for the Senate to operate.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable Senators, I rise on the same point of order. Senator Argue has referred to a previous debate where I had moved such a motion, which debate took place on March 7, 1978. There was a subsequent case shortly after that when another motion was moved under the same rule. This motion was made by the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by none other than our present Deputy Speaker, the Honourable Senator Asselin. I have checked the record.

[Senator Argue.]

Senator Asselin: When was that?

Senator Molgat: That was on April 7, 1978. The record indicates—and this is certainly my recollection—that the Speaker is not involved in making a decision in that regard in this house.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Molgat: I have had the opportunity to discuss this matter of urgent public importance on many occasions, at another time and in another place, with the present Leader of the Government in the Senate; and certainly the rules under which we operated in the Legislature of Manitoba when we discussed it were in accord with what he was saying today. The custom was that the motion was presented to the Speaker beforehand; the Speaker ruled whether or not it was in order, and it was then referred to the house.

• (1430)

But our rules are not the same as those rules, and it is not the same situation. If honourable senators read the two debates to which I referred, they will find that the sole action of the Speaker was to ask the Senate, "Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?" The honourable senators then decided whether or not they wanted to adopt the motion and to proceed with the debate. In the case of the motion by Senator Phillips, there was a lengthy discussion, and the Speaker did not get involved again until the very end of the discussion. He asked:

Honourable senators, is it agreed that a debate should take place at this time on Senator Phillips' motion?

Some honourable senators said "Yes", and some honourable senators said "No". There was a vote, and the Speaker then said:

In my opinion the nays have it, but it is up to the honourable senators to decide.

So if the precedent means anything, the role of the Speaker in this regard is to ask honourable senators whether or not they wish to have a debate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I shall repeat the motion as moved by the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Austin, P.C., pursuant to rule 46(g):

That the Senate do adjourn for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance, namely: the failure of the Government to announce its drought assistance programs and the necessity to immediately announce a program of aid to farmers in the drought area of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia in response to the urgent demand of farm organizations for the payment of $50 per seeded acre and $100 per cow.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Do I understand that what we are being asked is whether we agree to debate it?

Senator Argue: If I may say so, I think the Speaker is proceeding in a proper fashion. He is putting the motion. He must consider it to be in order, otherwise he would not put the motion. We do not need an extra point of order.

Senator Frith: The point is that in the House of Commons, under their standing order, the Speaker, as Senator Molgat has pointed out, actually makes a ruling as to whether or not it is in order; and the question as to whether or not to debate it is then referred to the house. As Senator Molgat pointed out, our precedents indicate that the Speaker should simply say, "Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to debate the motion?" I just wanted to be sure that we follow those precedents.

Senator Argue: I thought that we were getting along nicely. Honourable senators, I make no apologies for having brought forward this motion. I believe there is a disaster in western Canada. I believe it is a grave economic emergency. It certainly has not been dealt with, because there has been no announcement at all on aid to the grain producers. There has been an inadequate announcement, with some inadequate provisions, so far as the beef producers are concerned.

I want to explain that I have included Manitoba because while it is not really a drought province this year, it is my information that there are a few patches of drought in that province. Sometimes we get into trouble by not including British Columbia, because there is a very substantial region in the Peace River that, I believe, suffered a very major drought this year.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, please give my colleague the opportunity to state his case, in a way that others, who, like myself, are interested in what he has to say, can hear it.

Senator Argue: Well, it is great to have friends. You never know where they may show up. I thank Senator Roblin for his contribution. Many people have now been involved for many months in this debate concerning the necessity for government action. It became clear in early July that vast areas of western Canada were facing a very major crop disaster. This was further aggravated by a grasshopper infestation. It was the worst crop failure and the worst grasshopper infestation since 1937. Aggravating the drought disaster was the fact that the grasshoppers were there, and farmers spent thousands upon thousands of dollars on spray in an effort to control the grasshoppers. They went further and further into debt, and eventually accomplished very little indeed.

I want to make it perfectly clear that this is a disaster not only for farmers. It is a disaster for every business person and every community within the affected area, because purchasing power has been drying up. The agricultural economy, and particularly the western agricultural economy is of sufficient importance to Canada that if we looked at the situation strictly from an economic point of view, the economic consequences that flow from the crop failure and the grasshopper infestation is such as to warrant major action by the Canadian government.

Asking the government to act was an exercise in which virtually every farm organization took part. Certainly every political party took part; and when we were on platforms together, talking about the drought and what action should be taken, while there was a different emphasis depending on the different speakers, every single person on the platform—including representatives of the New Democratic Party, the Liberal Party, and also cabinet ministers from the Saskatchewan government—acknowledged that there was a major economic disaster. And when the crowds proposed payments of $50 per seeded acre and $100 per cow, I say without fear of contradiction that there was not one single person, not one single cabinet minister from Saskatchewan, nor any other political figure, who said that the request was too much and should be scaled down—not one. They said "It is a disaster. We think action should be taken. We are looking at the proposals."

Mr. Len Gustafson, the member of Parliament for Assiniboia and Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister, has headed up a task force within the government bureaucracy, together with representatives from provincial governments, to bring forward a program. At every meeting he said that that was being done and that action would be taken. Every time he spoke he said, "I am in daily contact with the Prime Minister." I thought, by gosh, he does better than some of us used to be able to do in days gone by. He did not say that he was in daily contact with the Prime Minister's Office, but that he was in daily contact with the Prime Minister. So the sympathy was really oozing. I know that Mr. Gustafson is sincere and that he is trying hard; but apparently the recommendations are now beginning to fall on deaf ears. Apparently the government think that if they just procrastinate, postpone and delay, then somehow or other the pressure out there for action will go away.

I say that that is not the way it is at all. As we go into winter—and the cost of fuel bills for farmers will be high during the cold weather—and when spring arrives and the bills to put in a new crop are high, the pressure will become greater and greater, and will continue getting greater until action is taken.

The situation out there attracted to Saskatchewan some pretty important political personalities. Mr. Broadbent, Leader of the New Democratic Party came out and spoke in front of the legislature. Dr. Maurice Foster, the honourable member for Algoma and the agriculture critic for the Opposition in the House of Commons has been exceedingly active in promoting the interests of western agriculture and bringing the drought to the attention of the government and of the country. The honourable member for Laval-des-Rapides, Mr. Raymond Garneau and some of his colleagues in Parliament will be conducting a task force, I believe, this coming week, first in Manitoba then Saskatchewan and Alberta, to hear what the people have to say—

● (1440)

Senator Austin: Also in British Columbia.

Senator Argue: And in B.C. as well, to hear what people have to say about agricultural questions and, I am certain, about other economic questions. The Leader of the Opposition, a Member of Parliament from western Canada, went out to the west, to Saskatchewan in particular, a few weeks ago and put forward an agricultural program which includes, among other things, support for these demands to which I have alluded. He asked for amendments to the Income Tax Act to assist livestock producers and so on. I think he made a very important, indeed a major contribution by going to western Canada and putting forth concrete proposals for action to deal with the economic crisis there.

People ask, "How serious is it out there?" One could use all kinds of figures and put forward all kinds of witnesses, but the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool says that in their judgment there is need in Saskatchewan for an immediate infusion of cash to the amount of $500 million. That is a lot of money. However, I suppose if you attend a Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee meeting you would consider it to be a manageable or moderate amount of money in relation to some of the other costs that go with this government's handling of the banking situation. Mr. Avery Sahl, vice-president, is quoted as saying:

Even $50 dollars an acre will barely be enough to help the most drastically affected survive, particularly producers who spent thousands of dollars fighting grasshoppers this summer—

Some farm families are literally destitute in our part of the province.

He lives in southern Saskatchewan. He went on to say:

Others are not far behind, and the communities which rely on agriculture are severely strained.

In a major portion of the province, the whole rural economy is bordering on collapse.

That is pretty extravagant language, but you have to know just how serious the situation is to know that what he said, in fact, describes conditions as they really are. What can be done about it? What we need, and I hope that it comes into effect this session, is permanent disaster legislation. We need an immediate infusion of money; we need action now; and we need a system so that people in agriculture will know where they stand in times of disaster. For that we will have to have legislation in place to meet such disasters.

I could go on and detail certain things that should be done. Some people say, "Well, the Western Grain Stabilization Act will fix things up." However, another reference I shall refer to later indicates that whatever money they may pay out—perhaps it will be as high as $200 million—it will not really change the basic situation. The sad part is that because of the way the Western Grain Stabilization Act is structured, farmers who have had poor crops in recent years have paid smaller amounts of money because of the consequent lower yields, and thus they will receive a lower payment under the WGSA, even though they may need it more than others.

Crop insurance for farmers who have had a series of crop failures is rolled back from a maximum coverage of 70 per cent average yield to a low of 49 per cent. That is something that should be changed. Crop insurance, while helpful, covers, as a maximum, only 70 per cent of the statistical average yield. For many farmers that is much lower than their own average yield, and for farmers who need it most the coverage has been reduced to as little as 49 per cent.

In my province farmers with no available income have applied for payments under the Canada Assistance Plan and under the Saskatchewan Assistance Plan. It seems to me that that policy and those programs should be applied with the same rules applicable in rural Canada as are applicable in urban Canada. In the cities, payments depend upon the income one has to cover family living expenses. On the farms the rules are different. They say to one who applies in 1985, "Use your 1984 income." Of course, the reply is, "But it is spent." If one does not have current income to meet current expenses, the second option given is, "Sell your farm." And that is the end of that person's farming career. If that does not seem to work, then they say to the applicant, "Spend your crop insurance." This, even though the crop insurance has been pledged to local merchants who have provided groceries for the farm family, fuel for the tractor and fertilizer for the crops. Yet they say, "Take the crop insurance and don't pay your bills." Canada Assistance would pay a farmer with average sized holdings perhaps $1000 a month or more, which is somewhat less than in urban areas. Perhaps that is because the farmer might own his home. But $1,000 a month coming in under an appropriate program—and I believe that the farmer is fully entitled to it—would go a long way in helping some farmers stay on the farm, maintain their occupation and be there to seed a crop and, I hope, to harvest a crop in another year.

Economic conditions are tough. The very best farmers, the technically best farmers, the younger farmers, are very often the farmers who are in trouble. Before I came into the chamber this afternoon I read a letter signed by two persons who are farmers, a husband and wife, each with a degree in agriculture. Their farm is being threatened with foreclosure. They are technically the most competent farmers that their particular district has produced. They have taken on a debt load that, because of changing economic conditions, they find difficult to service. I think that they and others like them require action of another kind, but including a cash infusion to give them a chance to meet some of their obligations and to permit them to stay on the farm. Some people say, "Well, it is not all that bad out there. The farmer is not starving. This is not Africa." Of course, it is not Africa. But it is Canada, and they are in need because they are without a net income of sufficient size to maintain their families and their farming operations, and their debt load is very heavy.

The Farm Credit Corporation says that of 24,000 farmers in Saskatchewan almost 6,000 are in arrears. I learned the other day that there are approximately 430 foreclosures over the 120-day period in process in Saskatchewan under consideration by provincial authorities. They have 120 days to settle with the banks or with whoever it is to whom they will lose their land. These 430 families are completely apart and are excluded from the Farm Credit Corporation activities where there is a moratorium on foreclosures. This demonstrates to me that things are very difficult indeed.

[Senator Argue.]

Statistics Canada has been forecasting farm income. The Saskatchewan Wheat Pool research department has done some work on these statistics, and their conclusion is that the realized net income for Saskatchewan farmers in 1985 will be approximately $254 million, or an average net income of $5,000 per farmer. I ask anyone, how can a farmer maintain his family, put in a crop and meet his expenses for next year with an income of $5,000? It is obviously a very serious problem.

• (1450)

It is forecast that the 1985 net farm income in Saskatchewan will be 75 per cent lower than the 1984 income which was approximately $1 billion. I think that these conditions are very serious indeed and are crying out for action.

Honourable senators, I think we are doing our job in the Senate this afternoon in talking about this matter which, I think, is of urgent importance, particularly when one realizes that it is superimposed upon agricultural prices that extend from coast to coast. The price-cost squeeze is on; the debt load is heavy. But when you come into an area where there is virtually no crop for many producers, a crop failure coming after a number of crop failures, then it adds up to a very intolerable situation indeed.

Honourable senators, I hope that this motion will receive support from all sides of the house. I hope that members of this house supporting the government party will agree that this is a very urgent question and that tinkering will not be enough; that a tiny announcement will not be enough. This requires urgent, massive action by the government. I say that Prime Minister Mulroney committed himself to major action when he asked his parliamentary secretary to set up a task force. He should be acting now on that report, and I can tell him that people of all political parties in Saskatchewan, and agricultural producers generally, are virtually unanimous in support of the propositions that I have talked about today.

Senator Roblin: There is no doubt in my mind, honourable senators, that the observations of my honourable friend who has just spoken need to be carefully considered, and I hope to add something to that debate in what I have to say. However, I would take it as a kindness if he were good enough to send me a copy of the resolution, which I have not yet seen, in order that I can be precisely informed as to the proposition which he is laying before us.

Senator Argue: I apologize to my honourable friend and hand him a copy.

Senator Roblin: As I said at the beginning of the discussion on the point of order, if you expect to get an informed reply from those who deal with matters of this sort, it is reasonable to let them know the case that they have to answer, or at least the terms of reference of the resolution which is being discussed. My honourable friend seemed to hint to me that he wanted to keep the matter rather close to his vest so as to surprise us. That is, I suppose, a natural political gambit but it does not advance the debate very far.

It is an ill wind that blows nobody good. At least, it has not blown the Leader of the Opposition any good because he ought to be here this afternoon. He ought to be here to have heard this debate, because he is the man who is telling us that the Senate should adjourn for long periods of time; that it is not necessary for us to sit because there is nothing for us to do. Yet, the very day that he leaves us to our own devices, as he has done today, we have a resolution which I must admit covers an exceedingly important and pressing public matter, and I make no gloss with respect to that observation.

Senator Frith: Yesterday we were talking about government business; now we are providing you with some business.

Senator Roblin: And yesterday I was talking about the business of the Senate. The whole of my point yesterday was that there was not only government business that had to be considered but there was also the business of the Senate itself, and if I ever needed a concrete example of what I was trying to say, I have had it today. Enough said about that; it is an ill wind that blows nobody good.

Senator Frith: I think you should be thanking us for giving you some business.

Senator Nurgitz: Thank you.

Senator Frith: You're welcome.

Senator Roblin: If I were in my honourable friend's position, I could suggest lots more business.

However, let me try to get back to the point we are discussing here, and I hope that Senator Argue will not go too far away, because I want him to hear the extent to which I agree with his analysis of the situation. There is no doubt that the farmers of western Canada, and particularly those in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, are facing difficult times. The province of Manitoba, in most respects, has been saved from the worst impact of the ills that we have been discussing here. In fact, the position there is a more or less satisfactory one, but that is certainly not the case in certain areas of Saskatchewan and Alberta, particularly those parts of the country that are in the Palliser triangle.

We must, of course, remember that it is very difficult to make a sweeping statement about the agricultural industry, because one farmer may be doing quite well while another farmer is doing quite badly. However, the fact that someone is doing well really does not take the curse away from the situation of the fellow who is not having the same success. Therefore we have to remember that we have this position, and when I say that in my own province they are doing fine, it may be true as a general statement but I am sure that we can find farmers to whom that does not apply, just as in the other provinces where we say it is very bad, we can find farmers to whom that observation does not apply.

So it is a difficult question, and one has to admit from the word go that it is not likely that any government can do all those things requested of it by those who are in difficulty, having regard to the situation in which governments find themselves, whether it be this government at this hour or at any time or in dealing with any experience we have ever had. It is very difficult for governments to meet what others might consider to be the full extent of the deficiency or the full extent of the problem.

But there are many things that we can do. My honourable friend made a reference to 1937, and I thought it was apropos, because in those days we had a situation where things were very difficult indeed, and they were difficult because we did not yet have in place some of the instrumentalities we now have that, with experience and over time, we have learned governments can use to mitigate some of the effects of natural disasters. However, there is not very much we can do to mitigate the effect of bad judgment in respect of farming activities—and we are all free to admit that there is lots of that around. However, in terms of natural disasters and those hazards of both price and nature over which the farmer has no control, that is the area where we try to do something.

Senator Olson: You have not done anything.

Senator Roblin: I will come to that. I am not prepared to say that we can do all those things that are required, but let us take a look at some of the situations and how they have been approached. I do not make this recital by way of excuse, by any means, for any shortcomings that others in this house may find with the present administration. I simply want to place certain facts on the record because they are germane to the issues that we are discussing.

In the last crop year, 1984/85, the gross receipts of western agriculture were $5.4 billion. Those are gross receipts, not net. In this year that is now coming to a close, it is estimated that the gross receipts will be $4.8 billion, which is a shortfall from the previous year of $600 million—and the previous year was no great shakes as far as that goes. However, this gives you an idea, I think, in an over-all way of how the situation has changed from one year to the next, and it indicates something of the difficult problem that farmers are facing. Not only is their gross income declining, but the prices of what they have to sell are declining and their net income is declining. There is no way in which we can, nor ought we to try to ignore those salient facts in this issue, because they are important and they are the reason why the farming public in the west deserves consideration in this Senate.

Since 1937, one of the new measures that have been introduced to deal with the question of the vagaries of the weather has been the crop insurance system, and I take some pleasure in making that statement because my province was the first province in Canada to introduce crop insurance. In fact, in Manitoba, it has been so refined that it is specific to the farm. In other words, the crop insurance people will look at the record of particular farms in Manitoba in order to calculate the premium, the risk and all the elements involved. So, at least in that province the question of holus-bolus insurance premium rates has been, to some extent, mitigated. We are able to deal with the fertility and productivity of land on a realistic basis in Manitoba.

• (1500)

In this year of grace it is expected that some $600 million will be paid out in crop insurance payments to the farmers of western Canada. Those payments may not go to precisely the people that some of us are concerned about today, because I do not know whether they are insured or not, and not all products are insured, though most of the important ones are. But it is a matter for prudent management, I think, for a farmer to accept the advantage of crop insurance because so much of the cost is borne by the provincial and federal governments. The farmer pays part of the premium, but by far the largest portion is paid by the governments of the country. So, that is a good deal. One would like to hope that prudent management would call for the application of crop insurance by the farmers. We know that there will be some $600 million paid in crop insurance payments for this crop year.

But there is a great hole in the crop insurance system that we have today, and that hole is that it has not been constructed, so far, to take care of a run of bad years, of two or three years in a row, as we have had recently in some parts of the country. There is a problem that needs to be rectified, and the government is taking a very close look at the question of reform of the crop insurance system in order to make it more helpful in cases where there is a recurring cycle of bad weather, rather than having it apply on an annual basis. The details of that I am not in any position to announce to the Senate today, but I am able to say that the government recognizes this as a problem and it is prepared, in due course, to present measures to help deal with that problem. But, of course, it must be admitted right away that that will do nothing for the people who are in difficulty today, and I make no effort to ignore that fact.

Then, as the honourable senator has stated, there is the Western Grain Stabilization Act. This year, that will put some $700 million into the cash flow of western Canada.

Senator Olson: What was that amount?

Senator Roblin: During the past 18 months, $700 million has gone into the cash flow of western Canada, and there will be another payment made at the end of this year. I do not know how much that will be, but it will be substantial.

So, there is a considerable addition to the cash flow provided by the gross receipts in respect of what will be coming from the crop insurance program and what will be coming from the Western Grain Stabilization Act. Those additions are not to be ignored, because the moneys involved are substantial.

The problem in western Canada has been diagnosed, I think, as having at least two components, one being livestock, the other being grain. In respect of livestock, as the Senate well knows, the government has made a contribution of $48 million to assist livestock producers. I do not know whether the livestock producers find that perfectly satisfactory. I would be surprised if they did, and they would probably suggest something more. In terms of the overall situation, though, and the problem that we face, this is a contribution which, I think, should not be ignored. It is a reasonably important contribution and one that is reasonably acceptable in many parts.

There have been a number of moves made of a general nature, and I recall for the sake of the record the fact that the capital gains tax has been modified for farmers. That is not going to feed many people this winter, I am sad to say, but in looking at the overall picture, it is a factor that we ought to think about. The Advance Payments for Crops Act has been substantially improved—I think it has been doubled. The Minister of State (Canadian Wheat Board) the other day made an announcement about the provision of cash—$3,000 per farm—for grain drying equipment, which is an important subject on the prairies these days. There has been a fuel tax rebate so that the taxes on fuel are not as high as they otherwise would have been. So, there have been a number of measures taken that, on a global basis, helped to assuage the difficulty.

The problem, of course, is that even when one adds all of these things up—and I did—one gets an input into the cash flow of $1.3 billion from the crop insurance and the Western Grain Stabilization Act, and while those are substantial amounts of money, we are not entirely sure that they are—in fact, we can be quite certain that they are not—pinpointed to those most in need, and those are the people we should think about today.

Another thing we have to do—and I think this is important and we should give it some thought when we are thinking about avoiding these problems in the future—is to try to help young farmers in particular to understand the burden of borrowing and the burden of capital debt. One of the biggest problems in western agriculture is that the younger farmers do not remember the “dirty days” as well as I do back in the 1930s and the early 1940s. They are accustomed to continually increasing values of farm land and have seen favourable prices regularly, and have been borrowing money to support the enormous capitalization that is now required for the operation of a modern farm, and have been urged to borrow that money, no doubt, by many people. The result has been that when we reach calamitous times the burden of handling that debt is dreadful. That is why, of course, there has been a moratorium as far as the government is concerned in respect of those capital situations in the hope that by spreading out the obligations over time we may enable many of those people to see their way through.

I do not blame them for that. Smarter men than I have been caught in the bind of having too much debt. I do not blame anybody for that, but I simply say that we have an obligation to do what we can now and to point out the difficulty.

In the Carman area of Manitoba—certainly when I was there—there was a program of farm/business/management. We were successful in getting many of the younger farmers to attend those meetings so that they could learn about the complexities of finance. I say that because if one is trying to run a farm there are plenty of problems to be solved in the natural order without having to deal with the subject of farm financing, which is so pressing on some today. I think we have to look carefully at trying to spread the news, to share the wisdom of the ages, if one can put it that way, to explain what happened 30 or 40 years ago and to tell of the lessons learned then in the hope that they do not have to be learned all over again. This is a wide field and requires concerted attention from not only the federal government but also the provincial governments.

That is the big picture. I know that Senator Argue will hardly be satisfied with the big picture, and I am not critical of him for that, because he is trying to deal with individual cases that have come to his notice. Many of those individuals are not well provided for in the big picture; therefore, we have to do something else.

We have Phase I, which is the livestock phase, and Phase II, which is now being considered, and the complaint is being made that we are not moving fast enough on that. I am not going to say that we are moving fast enough; I should like to see us move faster, and I have said in the Senate—and I do not mind saying it again—that that is the view of the government. I can tell honourable senators without getting into detail that there are certain interests outside the federal level of administration which have a right to be heard in these matters and whose advice and consent is sought, and that means that we are not entirely in control of the agenda; we have to get these other extraneous matters cleared up as we go along.

I noticed that Senator Olson made an interesting reference to the etymology of the word “soon”. He is right in that it is an elastic phrase. As I have told this chamber on a number of occasions, the issue has not been lost sight of. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture and the member for Assiniboia have not forgotten their responsibilities in this matter. I can tell the Senate, as I have done before, that the matter has reached cabinet level, but there are these one or two extraneous matters to be clarified before the cabinet can deal with it finally. I am confident that I am going to be able to come here in the not too distant future—I am afraid to use the word “soon”—but to come here at some early date and tell the Senate what exactly is proposed. Let me give you this warning—I do not suppose it is going to meet Senator Argue’s standards.

● (1510)

Senator Argue: Fifty dollars would do it.

Senator Roblin: I am sorry but I am not making any forecast about what is going to be in this policy when it is developed, but experience has told me that hardly ever in the history of operations of this kind is government able to satisfy fully the expectations of politicians or, indeed, of some people in the farming community. Therefore, I expect to receive a certain amount of complaint from Senator Argue and others when the policy does come down because I know it is not going to make everybody happy.

I stated at the beginning of this discussion this afternoon that I had no real objection to Senator Argue's making his case. The house has decided that he has the right to make it. I do not quarrel with that at all. I think that it is advantageous to have these other, wider matters placed on the record because they are all part of the considerations that the government has to take into account when it decides what to do. Emergency measures have to be fitted into the regular policies that are in place.

What is more, I would be disappointed if there was not something in the government policy which looked beyond the present emergency and tried to propose some other measures that might be introduced to deal with the problems of western agriculture in such a way that some of the problems we perceive to be still outstanding on the agricultural support agenda are dealt with or are tackled. I think I can say that is the attitude of the government. They know they have to take measures to deal with the urgent situation, but it is their hope that we will also be able to ask Parliament to consider other measures which are more long-reaching in their character, which will deal with some of the long-term problems that we have seen and which will help agriculture continue in its vital role in the Canadian economy. I, by no means, downgrade the problem because it is there and we know it. I only hope that the measures government is able to take will prove themselves to be sensitive, responsive and go at least part of the way toward meeting a very real need.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I hope that honourable senators will realize that they and I have just heard one of the most remarkable speeches ever—a string of excuses and nothing more than that. Any of the farmers who were looking for the response today to, at least, give them some comfort, will go completely without because the Leader of the Government on almost every point that was raised by Senator Argue expressed a certain amount of sympathy—but we have come to the point where sympathy is not enough any more. The Leader of the Government expressed sympathy for all these problems. He does it every time in Question Period. He did it in September but today he gave nothing more concrete than what he gave then, except to say that he wants to teach these young farmers a lesson about being in debt. If the government wants to do that, that is up to them, but that does not buy groceries, it does not pay for gasoline, nor does it pay for any other expenses that they have. I hope there is fairly wide circulation given to the comments that he made about all these new young farmers that came into the business since the 1930s, that do not know anything about financial management, and so we have to let them suffer out there for a while until they learn all the things that he claimed people learned in the great depression of the 1930s.

That is no answer at all to the crisis that is facing them today. I think the urgency of the debate today is to try to get the government to make an announcement about what they are going to do. We have to remind ourselves once in a while that this is not the first year of the drought; it is the second year. There was an equally serious drought in essentially the same area of the southern prairies in 1984. There was a delay in the action that was taken then, although there was some taken long before November 6 in that year. Another point that has to be made is that the consequences of drought get worse year after year.

I do not know how we can impress upon the government and all the members from western Canada, who ought to be able to carry the message to the government, that these people are in a desperate situation. All we get is the government ducking and dodging. It is interesting to hear the Leader of the Government today advance some new excuses for further delay. I am not going to bring up the word "soon" any more either because I have given up on that word. What the government's interpretation or definition of "soon" is has no relation to any definition that was ever written in any dictionary. In fact, it is almost the opposite.

Today he said there is some further co-ordination with some other longer-term policies that are in place, or that might be in place, that has to be taken into account before we can get to announcing an assistance program for this year.

Honourable senators will recall if they listened—and I know that they did—that the first set of excuses that they got from the minister was that the crop was not all harvested yet. That started in the middle of September. He used that excuse for about three or four weeks until the nonsense that was involved in all of that was pointed out to him, and that due to inclement harvesting weather there were indications there would not be any harvesting completed this fall at all. However, the weather changed for the better in the last few days, so I think a higher proportion of the crop, even though it was damaged considerably, has now been harvested. Today we have a new set of excuses.

There was another set of excuses after the harvesting one, namely that they had to wait for the report from a task force. But we have not seen the report as yet although we have been told that the government has had it for weeks. What are we waiting for? We are waiting for a government that does not seem to understand that it is a serious matter and that there are people out there who have been waiting and waiting to see what they are going to do.

The Leader of the Government did not give any valid reason today for why they are waiting except that they cannot make up their mind. As a matter of fact, he volunteered that some part of the cabinet—I suppose it was the cabinet committee—has considered it but the whole government has not yet considered it or given it approval. That is what I read between the lines although he did not exactly put it in those terms. What are they waiting for? Today is November 6.

We know that there are people out there who have to make arrangements for further supplies of whatever they need to continue on, and they do not have any inventories or any income. I know that there are those who did manage to buy crop insurance and are probably going to get paid on that reasonably soon. What about all the others? He mentioned that there are some others and there certainly are. That is not going to meet the situation at all.

● (1520)

Honourable senators, the minister mentioned that, some time ago, $48 million was provided for the livestock industry. He failed to mention, however, that $92 million was taken away just a few days before that. First, there was a $42 million reduction in the budget of the Department of Agriculture, after which, in the main budget, there was the announcement of a further reduction of $50 million from that department's budget. As to the excuses that we have heard again today, while I admire the Leader of the Government for putting them all together over the past few days, it certainly was not the case that he had no prior notice. He is aware that Senator Argue and others have been asking for an announcement from the government. He continues to maintain that the government has been considering these matters. What we need, however, is an announcement. People are desperately waiting for the government to make that announcement. The Leader of the Government says that it needs to be substantial. I do not know what he means by "substantial", because if what they have done for the livestock industry—$42 million for the total area covered in the three provinces where the drought occurred—is considered to be substantial, then I think that constitutes a new meaning of the word.

The government leader mentioned a few things that I find interesting. He said that the gross receipts from last year are down. Then he acknowledged that last year was lower than the average for some time. It seems to me that that should have been an indication that there was some urgency to this matter. I can add to that and advise him, although he already knows, that last year, the first year of the drought, many of those farmers were selling off inventory that was produced in prior years. They no longer have that inventory. By the time all of the receipts are added up for that area of Canada, the total will be way below what it was.

One thing that the Leader of the Government did not mention is that part of the northern prairies had an excellent crop. If it were valued at the full market price, which it will not be because weather conditions have deteriorated the crop to some extent, there could be an increase in that area. But that will probably go into their inventory.

The government leader went on to talk about crop insurance. I am happy to say that the administration of the crop insurance, at least in the part of Alberta that I come from, was adjusted, and that, indeed, farmers have been treated generously. That is a good thing, because it did solve much of the feed problem. Let me explain for a moment that the crop insurance administration—which, by the way, is carried out by the provinces—did allow some of the farmers to cut their crops for livestock or winter feed. They raised the level at which that charge against their crop insurance would be made. In some cases, I think, it was raised to five bushels per acre. Under normal conditions, it would be somewhat lower than that. That was a generous move on the part of the provincial government that administered that program. That was a helpful step. But, honourable senators, that does not take from the federal treasury a cent which was not already committed under the previous government a long while ago. The commitment was that the federal government would pay 50 per cent of the premium. The minister indicated that he could take some pride in the crop insurance program because the province of Manitoba was, he said, the first one involved. I believe that is correct. I can recall when the all risk crop insurance program was put together, or, at least, modified to be similar to its present status. I had something to do with that, and I know that it is a reasonably good program, but it was never designed, as the honourable minister said, to deal with the sort of disaster that can come from two droughts as serious as those we experienced in 1984 and 1985. For a number of reasons, that program just does not meet the need at all.

Honourable senators, one other thing that is fairly annoying is that representatives of this government—the minister himself stated so right in this chamber—knew how they were going to treat people when they were members of the opposition, but they seem to have forgotten all of that. I suppose the government leader would say that that is the normal thing, that when you get over on the government side, there is such great responsibility and all of that sort of thing that they forget their sympathy for the people who are suffering. I see the Deputy Leader of the Government shaking his head. I am not sure whether he is shaking it up and down in agreement with me or sideways.

Senator Argue: What difference does it make?

Senator Marshall: It is certainly not in agreement.

Senator Olson: I want to emphasize, if I may, that the people out there, particularly some of the younger farmers, need to know whether there will be some sort of assistance program. Is the government going to help in this serious situation or is it not? We will not know until a program is announced whether it is substantial. The sort of promise that was given by the Leader of the Government this afternoon is about as valuable as the replies that he has given to questions over the past six or eight weeks; that is, they are not worth anything. They are promises; they are indications that something is being considered, but we never get to the stage where the government announces what it is going to do or who is going to benefit from the program that it has worked out. If we look closely at what the Leader of the Government said today, we could almost come to the conclusion that the government does not intend to help those farmers who had crop insurance or who will be receiving any other assistance from either the federal or the provincial governments. He said that we have to take all of those things into consideration, and then he pointed out that there will likely be a number of farmers who will not be the beneficiaries of any of those programs. That is an interpretation that I admit I am putting on what he said, but I would not be surprised if that is what happens in the end. It would be no surprise to me because that is the kind of action that I think the Leader of the Government was trying to prepare everyone for.

The Honourable Senator Fairbairn from southern Alberta mentioned time and time again that we need action under the stabilization program for sugar-beets. At the time the matter was first raised, the government was going to have a study conducted by the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. The government was going to do all kinds of things but, to my mind, they are merely excuses for the delay. I believe it was yesterday that the Leader of the Government threw the sugar-beet stabilization program in with the other assistance programs. There is no relationship at all between them. The government leader said that action under that program had to wait until the government determined what it would do with all of the other programs. At least, that is the impression I got. I think that this sort of confusion constitutes nothing more than delaying tactics so that the government can go from one week to the next without making known to the people who are affected by the drought and by the shutdown of the sugar-beet industry what will eventually happen.

Honourable senators, that is why this debate is so important. I hope that Senator Argue and every other senator who participates in this debate will be able to convey to the Leader of the Government that the people affected by the drought are getting sick and tired of the excuses that are being put forward by the representatives of the government. I hope that he will take the matter seriously and that he will be successful in conveying the message to his colleagues so that we can have an announcement and so that these people who expect, and who have every right to expect, some sympathetic assistance from this government will hear an announcement soon.

● (1530)

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I am very pleased that Senator Argue has raised this matter today. It is a matter that is of the utmost importance to farmers, ranchers and many Canadians. I do not wish to speak for very long because I think the situation has been adequately outlined by both Senator Argue and Senator Olson.

I was glad to hear in the initial remarks that British Columbia was included in those areas regarded as facing problems. There is a tendency to leave out the agriculture industry of British Columbia when we talk about some of the problems of the prairie farmers and the prairie ranchers. I would like to point out to honourable senators the fact that the problem is not limited only to the prairies. The ranchers, in particular, in British Columbia have been very hard hit by drought. A number of these ranchers in the province contribute in a very important way to the agricultural and economic life of this country. As a matter of fact, there are some 3,000 cattle producers in my province. In 1983 the cattle industry represented some $140 million in farm cash receipts for the province. I think that fact alone illustrates how the ranchers of British Columbia contribute a great deal to the life and economy of our province and this nation.

The federal and provincial governments have set aside some $4 million and provided $60 per cow to ranchers in need in certain areas. In British Columbia they included the areas of the north and south Peace, Prince George and Omineca. The amount of $60 is inadequate. As Senator Argue has said, at least $100 per cow is required. Unfortunately, this program did not include many other areas in British Columbia that have been hard hit by the drought. Representations have been made on behalf of these areas to both the provincial government and the federal government, particularly to the federal government. These ranchers have been told that there is no more money to help them. That is wrong. Again, at this point I would like to underline and underscore what has been said by Senator Argue. There is money. We seem to have been able to find the money to bail out the banks. We found a lot of it. We have to find some money for these ranchers, and I know that it can be done.

The areas about which I would like the Leader of the Government in the Senate to make representations to the Minister of Agriculture are areas in the Cariboo, particularly the west Chilcotin, the Anahim area, the south Okanagan area and the Kootenay area. I am told that if no assistance is forthcoming to many of the ranchers in these areas they will be forced over the next few months to sell down their herds even further. Farmers and ranchers have faced very difficult circumstances over the past few years and a number of the herds have already had to be sold down. These ranchers are at a point where they cannot afford a further sell-down of their herds. It would be a very serious blow to the cattle industry of British Columbia and a serious blow to the way of life of so many families in these areas—the Cariboo area, the Kamloops area, the south Okanagan area, the Kootenay area and the Peace River area. Farming and ranching in those parts of the province are a very important way of life and the people there make a tremendous contribution to the life of this nation. It would be very serious if they had to sell down their herds and go out of business.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I find this whole situation of the past few months extremely surprising. The Leader of the Government in the Senate has suggested that it is too bad that Senator MacEachen is not here to hear this very important debate, when just the other day he wanted to adjourn the house. I suggest that if the government had faced its responsibilities and brought important debates such as this one before the chamber we would not be requesting an adjournment; we would be quite happy to stay here five or six days a week. However, since there was nothing forthcoming from the government and since it was not prepared to face up to its responsibility, we decided to bring the matter up ourselves in an attempt to get something important done in this chamber for a change.

The honourable senators who have spoken have put forth many figures and statistics. However, what I find surprising is the almost absolute silence in the other place by all those representatives from western Canada and, equally, the almost total silence in this place by senators who represent farming areas in western Canada, as well as other parts of the country. The only time we hear anything is when Senator Roblin, in his capacity as the Leader of the Government, explains to Senator Olson, Senator Argue and others who bring up such matters, why nothing is being done and why nothing apparently can be done. After the last election there was tremendous optimism in western Canada.

Senator Roblin: I did not say that nothing could be done.

Senator Steuart: So far, nothing has been done. The honourable senator keeps telling us that something will be done, but in the meantime there are thousands of farmers out there tightening their belts and holding their breath in the hope that they will hear something. What has really disappointed them is what has happened since the last election when massive numbers of Conservatives were voted in. The majority of members elected in Manitoba and Saskatchewan were Conservative. All of the members elected to the House of Commons in Alberta were Conservative as were most of the members elected in British Columbia. A massive Conservative government came to Ottawa. There were these tremendous promises made from one end of Canada to the other, particularly from one end of western Canada to the other. To the farmers they said, "Now, if we could get rid of those dirty Grits, get rid of those Liberals, we would see action." Well, you got rid of the Liberals. You have the Tories and you have the promises, and that is all you have.

I can remember day in day out, week in week out, year in year out, not so much in this chamber because I was not here, but certainly in the other place, Conservative members along with their friends in the NDP heckling and badgering the then Liberal government about problems in western Canada and the plight of the farmers there. The plight of the farmers then was not nearly as serious as it is today. What has happened to those western representatives? Are they muzzled? Are they gagged? Certainly they have not been heard from, and the people whom they represent are, to say the least, disillusioned.

What has the leader said in the Senate so far? He has mentioned three programs. One dealt with crop insurance. Crop insurance began in Manitoba, then came to Saskatchewan, and then went to Alberta. However, let us never forget that the back-up for the crop insurance program was put in place by the federal government, and that it was done by a Liberal federal government.

● (1540)

Let us look at what else he has talked about, such as the stabilization program. That was put in under the auspices of Otto Lang and a Liberal government. Let me remind members opposite that the Tories in the other place, and I presume in this place—I was not here—fought that tooth and nail. Yet he has the nerve to stand up now and take credit for that as being one of the few things that is helping the western provinces. It is, but no thanks to the Tory members of this place or of the other place then or now.

That is why this debate is important at this time. Surely we have a responsibility as senators to try to wake up the government, to try to wake up those members who represent Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, and all other members who represent the farmers of western Canada, because I do not know what they are doing aside from sleepwalking. As I said, they have been either muzzled or gagged, but they are strangely silent. It was claimed there was alienation in western Canada before—when they said that they were not represented, they needed an elected Senate, they needed someone to give them a voice—my God, they now have hundreds of voices in the other place, but they are strangely muted, and I think that that is a disgrace and a shame.

The Leader of the Government mentioned one thing I found amusing. He said that they put in a system to help farmers dry their grain. We have no problems in western Canada drying the grain; we have problems with drying the land. That is where we need the help.

So, I think what we have tried to do today is to wake up the government. We hope that the Leader of the Government will talk to his colleagues in cabinet about this urgent matter. I know he is sincere. I know that when he was the Premier of Manitoba he did his best for his constituents. Our plea to the leader today is that he go back to his cabinet colleagues and to the members of Parliament and get them to show some of the spirit and guts they showed when they were in opposition, when they fought so hard for western farmers. What has happened to that fight? What has happened to that courage? What has happened to those ideas? They have grown strangely silent, and I will tell you something, the farmers of western Canada are not going to forget this.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I should like to participate in this important debate. First of all, I should like to thank Senator Argue for introducing the motion. I think people in the agricultural sector will be happy to see that they have such an energetic and dedicated spokesman. That is not to take away at all from the comments made by other senators, including the Leader of the Government, who, I guess it would be fair to say, expressed regret at the fact that we have not yet had an announcement from this government on its proposed program to deal with the drought in western Canada.

The comments of other senators, however, have been critical of the government. I should like to join with them in expressing alarm at the fact that this government has not moved on this important issue, and in fact has not moved on any number of important issues involving the agricultural sector, which has severely exacerbated problems in that seriously distressed industry.

A lot has been made of the importance of a timely announcement of policy and program. In the case of the agricultural sector that is involved in the drought, that is important, because they have, as other senators have said, plans to make for next year, plans to make for the remainder of this year and plans to make to service their debt and other things. I do not particularly want to dwell on that because I think that has been adequately covered, but I should like to talk about another level of government which is also involved in the problem. I refer to the provincial governments. I also refer to the failure of this government to bring forward a program by November 6 when we knew very well what the problems were in mid summer. They have done nothing, with the exception of the $48 million program to assist cow-calf producers in western Canada. That lack of announcement has left us with a serious gap, and the serious gap is that the provincial ministers of agriculture are unable to co-ordinate programs with the federal government.

I am from Alberta, and the Government of Alberta has announced programs which over the next two years will amount to expenditures of almost half a billion dollars, that is between $400 million and $500 million. That government has found it necessary to implement unilaterally the recommendations of the Hall Commission report because the federal government has not dealt with it, and it has been before it for months now. That government found it necessary to implement a stabilization program which mimics the program that the federal government has said it would introduce to compensate and make up for lack of action on the part of the federal government.

It was the provincial governments of Alberta, Saskatchewan and, I believe, Manitoba—although I am not sure—that made up the difference in the crop insurance program that has been so important this year. Those were the governments which made up the difference that beneficiaries under the insurance will receive between 1984 and 1985, and which rolled back the bad experience that 1984 had on crop insurance premiums. They were the governments which set the zero crop at five bushels rather than three bushels. The federal government has really done nothing in this area. Members of the federal government have talked a great deal, but have not done anything. It is extremely important in terms of federal-provincial relations, in terms of co-ordinated policies of those two levels of government, that they actually implement the policies they have talked about and that the government come forward with its drought assistance program. I have no doubt that there are negotiations going on between the two levels of governments, but that is not good enough because that excludes the most important player in the game, and that is the producer.

The other thing I should like to bring forward in this debate is a criticism of the government's agricultural policies in general. With the exception of the minister's support of marketing boards in the free trade negotiations, I have heard little from this government that gives me any encouragement. The promises of the Conservatives to eliminate capital gains tax on the sale of agricultural land, to do away with section 31 of the Income Tax Act and the promise of assistance in the nature of an agro-bond for agricultural producers were not kept. As well the industry was insulted by a white paper put out by the Department of Finance.

We did get half a million dollar capital gains tax exemption, but I do not think that is a good expenditure of public moneys. I think there are many other things that the tax revenues that will be forgone as a result of that measure could have been spent on, and which would have done a great deal more for agriculture. It really, as someone said, encourages people to get out of the business and does not help in any way the people who are most important to us, those who want to stay in the business, or those who want to enter the business.

[Senator Hays.]

Finally, I am distressed at this government's lack of concern for agriculture as reflected in the budget cuts; $50 million a year from here on out of the agricultural budget is something that this industry does not need at this time. On top of that, as Senator Olson observed, a year ago November 4 there was a cut of $48 million from that budget.

Honourable senators, I join with other honourable senators in urging this government to bring forward immediately its drought assistance program for western Canada, or if there is no such program, to say so, and take the electoral responsibility for that.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, my participation in this debate will be brief, but I must say that regardless of political affiliation, any senator from Saskatchewan—indeed any senator from western Canada—should support the motion proposed by Senator Argue. I think that Senator Argue brought forth his proposition that we debate this urgent issue because of the absolute frustration due to lack of action on the part of the government. My comments are not of a political nature. I have the greatest admiration and respect, and I think most of the people on this side do, for the Leader of the Government in the Senate who, I am sure, is doing the best that he can.

• (1550)

Let me quote what he said on September 18 during Question Period after some discussion with Senator Argue. He said:

I will use my influence in the cabinet to reinforce the desire of that body, and of the Members of Parliament for western Canada, to make sure that the treatment accorded to the Saskatchewan situation is the best possible. I have no hesitation in saying, however, that it will not be possible to save everybody harmless.

That is true. You are not going to solve all the problems. Then he concluded by saying:

There are just not enough resources to enable us to do that, but we can and, I think, we will do our best to mitigate the hardships, as far as we can.

As to the Government of Saskatchewan, I have to confess that I have no influence there whatsoever.

That was on September 18, and despite a barrage of questions over the weeks since that time, and with all due respect to the Leader of the Government who sits in the cabinet, it is becoming very obvious that he is not getting very far as far as the pledge that he made on that date is concerned.

I want to say to members of the government that things are very tough in Saskatchewan, and I can speak for my province. Although the drought affected only about half the province, and for a while there was a reasonably good crop especially in the northeastern part of the province, we had very poor harvest conditions. The result was that the grain that was produced was damp and had to be dried, and 50 per cent of the crops were rated in the top two grades compared to 80 per cent in an average year. This means a very substantial drop in income to the farmers who produced grain in Saskatchewan.

It is all very well and good for many of the government supporters in Saskatchewan—I am talking about the provincial government—to indicate how important our mining and manufacturing industry is—and they are coming along—but let us remember that the basic economy of Saskatchewan relies on agriculture, namely the production of grain, the breeding of cattle and associated interests. What is happening is having its effects throughout the nation.

We read yesterday in the financial newspapers that Massey-Ferguson is closing down its combine plant because the sale of combines has literally disappeared. I am not quite sure if it is 1,200 or 1,500 people who are going to lose their jobs in Ontario. This affects not only Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia and Manitoba but most of the provinces. I do not think we should ever forget the importance of that agricultural industry.

I am not going to use a lot of statistics. You all remember the old gag about the fellow who used statistics the way a drunk uses a lamp post—more for support than for illumination. That is probably true of both sides, but I think that the objective of the debate today—and I congratulate Senator Argue on proposing it—is to impress upon the government the importance of a drought assistance program, that many people are suffering and that these delays cannot be tolerated for any length of time. As a matter of fact, it seems to me that Senator Argue's proposal should have the unanimous support of all the members of this house if only to impress on the Prime Minister and the cabinet, since they make the final decision, that this is a matter of importance and that it has to be dealt with.

In conclusion, I should like to express to the Leader of the Government, who is absent, that I am sure he is doing everything he can. I do not envy him his job in trying to bring to fruition the proposals that I am sure he and others are putting forward but, as yet, have not been found acceptable. The objective of this debate is to focus on the decision-making process and to report as soon as possible to Canadians, and especially to western Canadians, that there are some solutions that will alleviate the very great suffering that is going on.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have hung back a bit in this debate—which I, too, would like to thank Senator Argue for bringing forward—partially because honourable senators in this chamber on both sides are far more expert than I am on the enormous question of drought and its effect on the economy of western Canada. Their expertise is personal. Senators like Senator Hays and Senator Olson participate in the agricultural industry and they know first hand the highs and the lows and the cycles which make it a challenging, exhilarating and, sometimes, an agonizing way to make a living.

Perhaps what a great number of Canadians know about agriculture is what they see in the marketplace. Their personal concern is usually what the cost is of products necessary to feed their families. To a great segment of Canadians the word “drought” is a strange one in this country, and meaningless in a sense, except that it does convey an anxiety somewhere in the system. Yet, there is a visible face to drought, and to an extent we have seen it thanks to our national television network in recent weeks and months. I am glad of that because sometimes visual presentations can convey a great deal more than words can ever do.

Canadians have seen via television the drought through the lifelessness of the land it has affected. The land has turned to dust. On television they can see the dust sifting through the hands of the farmers or, indeed, through the hands of the Minister of Agriculture when he visited the western provinces this summer to take a first hand look. If there is a wind, as there all too often is in southern Alberta, the dust blows away so the topsoil is gone and you cannot reach out and grab it back. Indeed, the Department of Agriculture monitoring system has indicated that this is the worst year for loss of topsoil in our part of the country since the 1930s. In a place like Lethbridge in an important growing month such as June where the norm is three inches of rain there was about one third of an inch.

We have also seen through television the face of the drought from the crops. They cannot really be called crops in a drought area. There is no greenness, there is no blowing wheat; there is just stubble, like straw. At best, it can be used for cattle feed; at worst, you forget it. We have seen farmers selling off, in whole or in part, their herds, partially because feed is either scarce or too expensive. What a herd of cattle is to a farm family is almost impossible to describe because those people have simply put their lives into it.

● (1600)

We have seen, on the news and on “The Journal”, the face of drought in those people who have attended farm meetings in Saskatchewan or those people out in the fields in Alberta—faces of distress, of anxiety, of bitterness. We see the faces of men and women who can barely keep back the tears or anger.

The autumn came, school opened and there was no money. The other day in this chamber, while speaking of these realities, Senator Argue drew to our attention the almost astonishing generosity shown by people from other provinces to farmers in Saskatchewan. At this point, honourable senators, I would like to pay tribute to Jean Argue, who is out there in the front lines, dealing at first hand with the distribution of various things that, surprisingly enough in this day and age in Canada, some of our people in the western provinces simply do not have.

One thing we do not see through television or through any other means is the extent to which the drought affects not just the farm family but the entire agricultural community. The results are not isolated. The ripple effect that comes from these disasters is tragic — tragic for implement dealers, for the chemical industry and for the wholesale and retail segments of the small communities in western Canada who sell clothing, food, small luxuries and bare essentials. This is an element which cannot be statistically measured. It is not possible to put a price on this kind of loss.

Finally, what none of us can really see is the personal stress that is created within the families of those farmers who are affected—the stress upon the marriages, the stress upon health, the psychological stress upon not just the parents but the children as well. This is a cost to our society that we can ill afford.

At this point, I would like to say that I listened carefully to Senator Roblin, for whom I have a great deal of respect. I do not for one moment discount the concern and sympathy that he articulated. Indeed, as I have said more than once in this chamber, I hang my hat on Senator Roblin in terms of the degree of understanding and compassion he can bring to this sort of discussion around the cabinet table. I have confidence that he is one minister who really does understand. I hope that he will convey the deeply felt anxiety of other honourable senators to the next cabinet meeting, which I understand will be held tomorrow.

One element that he mentioned, and I think it is an important one—although not an immediate one such as those dealt with by my colleagues in terms of cash injections to help solve the problem—was the effort to somehow set up a system for the future by which natural disasters of this kind can be dealt with. A drought ought not to be dealt with by a one-man task force but by a procedure that is triggered by the event. There must be some sort of fund or process with which to set the wheels in motion quickly. That sort of thing exists within government now in the form of emergency planning processes. If there is a mud slide in Quebec, flooding in British Columbia or a twister in Barrie, there is a federal-provincial trigger which sets off an almost immediate reaction, which brings relief and assistance in terms of money and other kinds of help. Because of the experiences of the past two years in western Canada, the same sort of process should be in place in the event of another drought. I know that my friend from New Brunswick is aware of problems in his area which are also extremely severe.

Honourable senators, I could not possibly sit down without mentioning sugar-beets.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Senator Fairbairn: As honourable senators are aware, I have talked a lot about sugar-beets over the past weeks and months—some would say too much. I have read with interest one of my former colleagues in the press gallery, who has noted with astonishment that I should even be discussing sugar-beets because, in recent years, my life has been physically far removed from that part of the country. However, I grew up with sugar-beets. Anyone who has grown up in southern Alberta knows them as a fact of life. We always knew that, in places like Taber and Picture Butte in southwestern Alberta, life chugged on and had been chugging on for 60 years because the farmers there grew one of the most stable crops on the market. Indeed, when I visited Picture Butte this summer, I noticed that the sign in front of the town which welcomes people to the community says “Heart of the Sugar Beet Country”, and has a great big sugar-beet right on it. It is a bit ironic because that “heart” has since gone into cardiac arrest. There were no sugar-beets grown anywhere in Alberta this past year. This has caused and will continue to cause extreme hardship because that crop has been an economic anchor in that part of our country. That particular crop generates $170 million in that area.

I will bore honourable senators once again to repeat that we are pleading that the stabilization payment for 1983 to sugar-beet farmers in Canada be assessed and paid, and that this be done separately from a national sugar policy and separately from drought assistance. This arrangement was entered into in good faith by the farmers in 1982 and 1983. It is a payment that many of them desperately need right now in order to make their plans for the coming year. I spoke to one farmer today and I know that there are 20 young farmers who, without this stabilization payment, will have to walk away from the industry altogether. If there are 20, honourable senators, there must be more. The plea I make once again is one which echoes that of my fellow senator from Alberta. First, this is a matter of announcing a policy; second, if there is no policy, let us erase the doubts—let us know.

In conclusion, I should like to say that yesterday one of our colleagues, with absolutely no intended criticism of any sort, asked whether this matter of the drought is not exaggerated. He asked whether some of the things that Senator Argue and others have been talking about were not exaggerations. I suppose the answer is: In Canada a majority of farmers are not personally affected by the drought. However, a minority of them are, and they are affected very badly. It seems to me that our system is not set up purely for the purpose of supporting those who are prosperous. It is not simply there to reward success, as our Minister of Finance sometimes says. Our institutions—and this Parliament is one of the most important ones—have developed on the basis that they are here to defend and protect minorities who need help, as and when they need help. At this moment there is a minority among our farmers in western Canada who need help badly and I would urge again that the Leader of the Government do everything possible to ensure that this help is forthcoming, particularly by the time we come back from our week off.

• (1610)

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I was waiting in the hope that we would hear from someone else on the government side on this very serious issue in addition to the speech—albeit a good one—by the Leader of the Government. I had sincerely hoped that other Conservative senators would become involved in this most serious question.

Senator Roblin: They are all in committees.

Senator Molgat: I want to make it clear at the outset that I do not hold the government responsible in so far as the subject matter is concerned. I do not think the government is responsible for the drought in parts of western Canada and I do not think that the government is responsible for the grasshoppers. However, there is absolutely no question as to who is responsible for the need to discuss this matter today as one of urgent public importance. That responsibility lies solely and clearly with the government, a government that simply cannot make up its mind on this matter. We on this side have been asking for some weeks now for a decision. Many of my colleagues have indicated the seriousness of the situation. What do we get? Evasive answers, delays, and, "We can't answer your question." What did we get today? Well, we got a great speech from the Leader of the Government, but what is he doing? He is defending the indefensible. I really feel sorry for him in this regard, but the facts are that this government cannot make up its mind on this subject.

Let us face it, this government has billions of dollars for the banks, but not a damn cent for the farmers in need. My honourable friend rose and gave us, I will admit, a great piece of oratory. I respect his abilities in this regard. He even took us off on a little tangent about the Leader of the Opposition not being present. It did not have much to do with the subject matter, but it was a good little touch to get us off on a tangent.

Senator Frith: I did not think so. It was a bit mean, I thought.

Senator Roblin: I'm sorry, I was not attempting to be mean.

Senator Frith: A bit uncharacteristic perhaps.

Senator Roblin: Devious, perhaps, but not mean.

Senator Molgat: The government cannot make a decision on this subject, which has been brought up a number of times. And yet, I have here a press release dated October 16 headed, "Advance Payments to Tobacco Growers Increased."

Agriculture Minister John Wise today announced that he has made $90 million available to Ontario flue-cured tobacco producers under the Advance Payments for Crops Act, compared to $23.4 million last year.

Senator Roblin: How much was that?

Senator Molgat: Ninety million. How was it that the minister could make this decision? Was it because they had not produced a crop? Was it because they had had two years of drought? Was it because they had just faced a plague of grasshoppers? No.

—he took this action recognizing the critical marketing situation these producers are now experiencing.

There is no problem of no crop. It is simply that they have a critical marketing problem. Then he goes on to say:

This step demonstrates his concern for the future of the tobacco industry and the communities the industry supports.

He ought to come and see some of the communities in western Canada and the state in which they are right now, where businesses are going bankrupt and closing up. The government can take action in this regard and increase payments to people who are not in dire need but who are facing marketing problems.

My honourable friend said in his speech that the situation in Manitoba was more or less a satisfactory one. He could not have travelled down to Melita and Deloraine for some time, because I can assure him that the south-west corner of the province has suffered from serious drought, as has southern Saskatchewan and southern Alberta over the past two years. However, in fairness, our situation in Manitoba is better than that of southern Saskatchewan and southern Alberta. That does not mean that we do not have any problems. We have some very serious ones.

Senator Roblin: I agree with that.

Senator Molgat: The situation is not simply one of what is happening right now, or what has happened in the past year, or in the past two years. The situation has been building for some time in so far as the whole of the agriculture industry is concerned.

I would like to refer to a document which has just come to my desk. I am sure that Senator Roblin will commend my source because another document indicates that he has been a director for Manitoba on the Canada West Foundation. I am referring to a Canada West Foundation Report entitled "Farm Finances in Western Canada." That report says on page 3:

The Farm Credit Corporation estimated that in 1984 nearly 30,000 farms in the four western provinces were under severe stress—These were farms that met at least one of the following criteria:

1. total debt expenses (principal plus interest) exceeded 40 per cent of farm sales.
2. total borrowings during a single year exceeded 110 per cent of total new investment in that year or
3. net worth was less than 15 per cent of total assets.

The severity of the farm financial problem can be gauged by considering that nearly one-quarter of all farms in western Canada fell into one or more of these severe stress categories. The situation has become even worse during the first half of 1985. Agriculture has not experienced such severe financial problems since the depression and drought of the 1930s.

A little further on in the same document under the headline, "Why the Current Situation?" It says:

Product prices on the prairies are lower now than they were in 1981, even in nominal terms—In the case of wheat, its real price now is less than half what it was in 1973.

So when you couple that very serious situation with the particular problems to which Senator Argue has referred about drought and grasshoppers in southern Saskatchewan and southern Alberta and that corner of southern Manitoba, you realize that it truly is a crisis situation. That is why we have been pleading here with the Leader of the Government, the person in this chamber who is a member of the cabinet, for a decision in this regard. I hope that this debate today will assist him in making the case in cabinet.

Senator Roblin: I hope so, too.

Senator Molgat: Let us have a decision on the matter and let us not continue to defer it. I commend Senator Argue for bringing this matter before the chamber today as a matter of urgent public importance. I repeat, this situation has been created by the lack of decision by this government.

MOTION WITHDRAWN

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, I wish to say that we have had a very pertinent and useful debate in the Senate this afternoon. There have been major and important contributions made by all senators who have taken part in the debate. Senator Marchand brought a dimension to the debate that was very useful, namely, the importance of the cattle industry in British Columbia, and the need for further attention by governments at this time to that industry.

Senator Fairbairn, if I may say so, brought us a very moving message which informed all of us of some of the personal trials and tribulations that people are going through in the drought area at this time. That is a dimension that is very difficult to measure. When one talks about individual difficulties and individual stress, someone will say, "You are exaggerating." But for those people who are suffering that distress, there is no way one could exaggerate the difficult experience through which they are going. An announcement—a sizeable one—would certainly be an important factor in helping alleviate that kind of distress.

On the other side of the coin, we have had a reference by Senator Molgat to the Canada West Foundation study. That is a learned institution. We know that when they come out and take a run at the Senate, as they have done in the past, it makes it difficult for us. I thought that that institution brought forward a very important report that does, in a detailed way, measure the very difficult debt situation that currently exists. I enjoyed listening to the honourable Senator Roblin, as I always do. I agree with other senators who have said that his heart is in the right place. We think that the fact that he has a seat in the cabinet is most important for the Senate, and we wish him well. We support what he is doing and would like to see him being more effective. We would like to see him delivering the goods, and delivering them more quickly.

I disagree with Senator Roblin's remarks regarding the debt situation and how the major theme should be somehow to teach the younger farmers—

Senator Roblin: That is in the Canada West document that Senator Molgat read.

Senator Argue: That deals with the dangers of going into debt. I agree that a farmer cannot get into debt unless he signs a document. I agree that he is part of the process, but I say that he is only part of it, and that somebody else must have the money and someone else must be willing to saddle that farmer with a debt, and somebody else must be a better salesman in convincing the farmer that the best thing he could do is have a large debt. It is a two-way street, but banks load up the farmers with debt, and as soon as the farmers run into trouble they head for cover, and the learned thinkers, the Ph.Ds, the research types and all of the authorities who recommended they get into debt, are the same people who then say: "By God, they bit off more than they could chew and were too greedy and they have to learn their lesson."

That is all baloney; that is all bunk. I have had some personal experience with bankers. I can say that when you need the money and you have a good proposition, you probably will not get the money. But bankers wake up to economic conditions a few years late, and when they say it is time to let you have the money, you had better run away from them. If you refused a loan when it was offered to you, but did your best to get that banker to say "yes" after he had said "no" to an application, I am sure you would be a winner in almost every instance.

In 1971 and in 1974, some farmers were refused loans. Back then, $100 of capital investment yielded $11.36 in realized net income, but in 1983, when the bankers were shovelling out the money, $100 of capital investment returned $2.32. Conditions have not improved since 1983, so it is probably similar to that figure now, and certainly it is not a satisfactory one. I am sure that that figure would be very low today.

The Royal Bank has a new farm package. It is an umbrella package and is advertised on television. I can tell you what they have; they have a debt trap set for the applicant, and they will spring the trap probably within 24 months after the loan has been made and they will take over the farm. That is precisely what they have been doing and that is precisely what is going on at the present time.

There are people who will say that $50 an acre is too much, that the government should not be expected to pay that. A section of northeastern Saskatchewan, a few years ago, had a series of no crops because of floods. The farmers could not seed the land because it was flooded. Some of us made speeches and fired up governments back then, and when I was in the cabinet, whether I should have been doing it or not, I was firing up the demand, and the demand came forward and the previous government announced that it had a policy for the flooded area of northeastern Saskatchewan under which the federal government paid $20 per acre, the Province of Saskatchewan paid $10 per acre, for a total of $30 per acre on 80 per cent of the cultivated acreage. That translates to $24 for cultivated acres.

If you go to the most severe drought area of Saskatchewan and Alberta, it is basically half summer fallow, 50/50. With the change in the value of the purchasing power of the dollar since the $24 per acre figure was announced, I guess $48 on half of the cultivated acreage would translate to about the same amount. So, what I am saying is that a precedent by way of that announcement by the Right Honourable John Turner government is on all fours with the request that is being made now for the $50 an acre. The only thing that has changed is the government. They had all of the friends of the western farmer on their side and cut John Turner's $20 down to Mr. Mulroney's $10. But in any event, something did happen and some money was paid, $20 an acre on 80 per cent of the acreage. That was well received, and was, I think, of substantial importance.

The government is delaying its response and is continuing to delay that response. I tell you what I fear now; I fear that the government has now decided to wait until after the First Ministers' Conference, which is scheduled for the end of November—November 25 and 26, I think. I get that feeling because out in Saskatchewan the Premier called an agriculture conference in which farm leaders did not take part, but the academics were out in force, and they once again told farmers how to make money.

Senator Roblin: Watch out for those academics!

Senator Argue: That's for sure. They say, "pump more inputs, pump more fertilizer, have more continuous cropping." I do not know. I question the wisdom of that.

However, that is not the main point I am trying to make; the main point I am trying to make is that that conference was called and the Premier of the province said he wanted it called so that he could get ready for the First Ministers' Conference. He did not need any time to get ready for the First Ministers' Conference. The Premier of the province must know what agriculture requires; he must have known what he was going to propose at that conference. But what troubles me is that I think he was setting the stage, along with the federal government, for further delays in this announcement. I hope I am mistaken and that the announcement will be made quickly. I agree with others who have said that we really do not see much clout on the government side of the House for western Canada even though they have a large representation.

● (1630)

I think that this debate has been of high calibre, if I may say so. I believe it is time spent by honourable senators in a very useful manner and I hope it will have much influence on the government, reflecting as it does the views of those who think that this kind of program should be forthcoming.

Therefore, I ask that the motion to adjourn be now withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

YOUTH

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Jacques Hébert, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Tuesday, November 19, 1985, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, may I ask for clarification of the time of the meeting? There is some discussion concerning this meeting, and the fact is that the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology will also be meeting on November 19. This may create a conflict for members on this side who are members of both committees. I understood from the deputy chairman that the committee would not be meeting until after the adjournment of the Social Affairs Science and Technology Committee. Before giving consent, I would like clarification.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: I am not sure if I understood the beginning of the remarks of the honourable senator, but if he is asking why we are going to sit on that day, the reason is that as a result of consultations with those involved we found it was the only day that was available in the coming weeks to meet. As you know from my notice of motion yesterday, we are already late in our schedule and we seek a delay of a month and a half in order to present our report. The Christmas recess is close at hand, so that left us with that date. As you know, we have discussed the matter and because the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee meets from 9.30 to 11 o'clock we postponed our departure for Meach Lake to 11 o'clock in the morning in order not to conflict with that committee and we will work until 10 or 11 in the evening. It is very important that we hold this meeting outside of this building.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO PERMIT TELEVISION OF COMMITTEE'S PROCEEDINGS—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I should like to make a ruling on Senator Murray's motion. Rule 77(7) reads as follows:

Except as provided in these rules, a select committee shall not, without the approval of the Senate, adopt any special procedure or practice that is inconsistent with the practices and usages of the Senate itself.

Therefore, rule 45(1)(i) would apply in this case. I believe that honourable senators should take Senator Murray's motion as notice for the next sitting of the Senate. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

THE BUDGETARY PROCESS

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY DOCUMENT ON PROPOSALS FOR IMPROVEMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders be authorized to study and report upon the Document entitled: "The Canadian Budgetary Process—Proposals for Improvement" issued by the Minister of Finance, tabled in the Senate on May 28, 1985.

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGSCENTRE BLOCK—REMOVAL OF PORTRAITS OF BRITISH PRIME MINISTERS—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Inquiries:

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Hicks, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(2), I give notice that tomorrow, Thursday, November 7, 1985, he will call the attention of the Senate to the removal of portraits of former British Prime Ministers from the sixth floor of the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On Orders No. 3 and No. 4 being called:

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like the indulgence of the Senate to make a comment on Orders No. 3 and 4.

Senator Nurgitz is prepared to proceed today with both orders standing in his name, but following consultation with him we concluded that it would probably meet the wishes of the Senate if he were to wait until tomorrow in view of the extensive debate we had this afternoon. I want honourable senators to know that we were prepared to proceed.

Senator Frith: We get the point!

YOUTHSPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—ORDER OF REFERENCE AMENDED

Hon. Jacques Hébert, pursuant to notice of November 5, 1985, moved:

That the Order of Reference of the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth be amended by deleting the words "28th November, 1985," and substituting therefor the words "27th February, 1986"; and

That Honourable Senators authorized to act for and on behalf of the Senate in all matters relating to the internal economy of the Senate during any period between sessions of Parliament or between Parliaments, be authorized to publish and distribute the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX "A"*(See p. 1448)STANDING RULES AND ORDERS*FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

WEDNESDAY, November 6, 1985

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

FOURTH REPORT

During the past few years there has been considerable discussion in both Houses of Parliament with respect to possible changes to the Royal Assent ceremony. On May 10, 1983, the Honourable Senator Frith presented to the Senate an inquiry regarding the advisability of establishing alternative procedures for the declaration of Royal Assent to bills. On March 26, 1985, the Special Committee on the Reform of the House of Commons recommended in its Second Report that a new Royal Assent procedure be adopted. The matter has also been raised in the Senate during Question Period during the present session.

Pursuant to Rule 67(1)(f), your Committee met on May 28, June 18, June 25 and October 24, 1985 to consider the question of changes to the Royal Assent ceremony.

Your Committee recommends the following:

1. That the present formal procedure of Royal Assent be retained and that it be used (a) at the request of the Governor General or of either House of Parliament and (b) at least once a session, for example at the prorogation of a session.
2. That, in addition to the present practice, a simpler procedure be established based on the following principles: (a) that the procedure involve representation from both the Senate and the House of Commons, (b) that it be public, and (c) that the declaration of Royal Assent be subsequently reported to both Houses of Parliament.
3. That representatives of the Senate meet with representatives of the House of Commons to draft a resolution for a joint Address of both Houses to be presented to Her Excellency the Governor General praying that she approve such changes to the Royal Assent ceremony as described in this Report.

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT,
Chairman.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

WEDNESDAY, November 6, 1985

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

FIFTH REPORT

Pursuant to Rule 67(1)(f), your Committee met on June 25 and October 24, 1985 to review the Rules of the Senate in order to ensure that they better reflect male and female genders.

Your Committee recommends that the proposed amendments to the Rules of the Senate outlined in the appendix to this Report be adopted.

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT,
Chairman.

APPENDIX TO REPORT

PRESENT RULE

5. (e) "Government Leader in the Senate" means the senator occupying the recognized position of Leader of the Government in the Senate or a senator acting for him;

9. Whenever the Speaker, from illness or other cause, finds it necessary to leave the Chair during any part of the sitting on any day, he may call upon any senator to take the Chair and preside as Speaker during the remainder of such day, or until the Speaker himself resumes the Chair before the end of the sitting for that day.

10. Whenever the Senate is informed by the Clerk at the Table of the unavoidable absence of the Speaker, the senator chosen by the Senate under Rule 66 to preside as Speaker pro tempore, or, if he is absent, any senator chosen by the Senate, shall preside during such absence and shall thereupon have and execute all the powers, privileges and duties of the Speaker until the Speaker, or the Speaker pro tempore, as the case may be, resumes the Chair.

11. Every act done by any senator, acting as aforesaid, shall have the same effect and validity as if the act were done by the Speaker himself.

17. If at any sitting of the Senate, or in Committee of the Whole, any senator shall take notice that strangers are present, the Speaker or the chairman (as the case may be) shall forthwith put the question, "That strangers be ordered to withdraw", without permitting any debate or amendment: Provided that the Speaker or the chairman may, whenever he may think fit, order the withdrawal of strangers from any part of the Senate.

25. A senator desiring to speak in the Senate shall rise in his place and address himself to the rest of the senators.

26. When two or more senators rise to speak, the Speaker shall call upon the senator who in his opinion first rose in his place; but a motion may be made that any senator who has risen "be now heard" or "do now speak".

28. A senator shall not speak more than once to any question or other matter before the Senate except in explanation of a material part of his speech in which he may have been misunderstood, and then he shall not introduce new matter.

37. A senator called to order by the Speaker shall discontinue his remarks and may not speak further, except on the point of order, until the point of order has been decided.

39. A senator considering himself offended or injured in the Senate, in a committee room, or in any of the rooms belonging to the Senate, may appeal to the Senate for redress.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT

5. (e) "Government Leader in the Senate" means the senator occupying the recognized position of Leader of the Government in the Senate or a senator acting for that senator;

9. Whenever the Speaker, from illness or other cause, finds it necessary to leave the Chair during any part of the sitting on any day, the Speaker may call upon any senator to take the Chair and preside as Speaker during the remainder of such day, or until the Speaker resumes the Chair before the end of the sitting for that day.

10. Whenever the Senate is informed by the Clerk at the Table of the unavoidable absence of the Speaker, the senator chosen by the Senate under Rule 66 to preside as Speaker pro tempore, or, if that senator is absent, any senator chosen by the Senate, shall preside during such absence and shall thereupon have and execute all the powers, privileges and duties of the Speaker until the Speaker, or the Speaker pro tempore, as the case may be, resumes the Chair.

11. Every act done by any senator, acting as aforesaid, shall have the same effect and validity as if the act were done by the Speaker.

17. If at any sitting of the Senate, or in Committee of the Whole, any senator shall take notice that strangers are present, the Speaker or the chairman (as the case may be) shall forthwith put the question, "That strangers be ordered to withdraw", without permitting any debate or amendment: Provided that the Speaker or the chairman may, whenever the Speaker or the chairman may think fit, order the withdrawal of strangers from any part of the Senate.

25. A senator desiring to speak in the Senate shall rise in the place where that senator normally sits and address the rest of the senators.

26. When two or more senators rise to speak, the Speaker shall call upon the senator who in the Speaker's opinion first rose; but a motion may be made that any senator who has risen "be now heard" or "do now speak".

28. A senator shall not speak more than once to any question or other matter before the Senate except in explanation of a material part of the senator's speech in which the senator may have been misunderstood, and then that senator shall not introduce new matter.

37. A senator called to order by the Speaker shall discontinue speaking and may not speak further, except on the point of order, until the point of order has been decided.

39. A senator considering himself or herself offended or injured in the Senate, in a committee room, or in any of the rooms belonging to the Senate, may appeal to the Senate for redress.

43. (1) When a senator wishes to give notice of an inquiry or a substantive motion, he shall reduce the notice to writing, sign it, read it from his place during a sitting of the Senate, and send it forthwith to the Clerk at the Table.

(2) A senator who intends to make a statement or raise a discussion on an inquiry shall as part of the notice under this rule give notice that he will call the attention of the Senate to the matter to be inquired into.

(3) Notice under this rule may be given by one senator for any other senator not then present, with the permission of the absent senator, by inserting the name of such senator on the notice in addition to his own.

44. (b) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General not merely formal in its character;

45. (2) Where a senator wishes to correct irregularities or mistakes in an order, resolution, or other vote of the Senate, he shall give one day's notice, and a correction shall not be made unless at least two-thirds of the senators present vote in favour of such correction.

49. (4) A senator is not entitled to vote on any question in which he has a pecuniary interest not available to the general public. The vote of any senator so interested shall be disallowed.

50. (1) A senator shall not vote on any question unless he— is within the Bar of the Senate when the question is put.

(3) With leave of the Senate, a senator may, for special reason assigned by him withdraw or change his vote immediately after the announcement of the division.

60. A senator shall not speak at a conference with the House of Commons unless he is one of the committee.

64. When the Senate is put into Committee of the Whole every senator shall sit in his place. A senator who desires to speak shall rise and address the Chair.

66. (5) The notice referred to in subsection (4) shall be signed:

- (a) with respect to Government members, by the Leader of the Government in the Senate or any senator named by him, and
- (b) with respect to Opposition members, by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate or any senator named by him.

68. The Leader of the Government in the Senate, or, in his absence, the Deputy Leader of the Government, and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, or, in his absence, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, are members ex officio in addition to the number of appointed members, of the Committee of Selection and all select committees of the Senate.

43. (1) When a senator wishes to give notice of an inquiry or a substantive motion, the senator shall reduce the notice to writing, sign it, read it during a sitting of the Senate from the place where the senator normally sits, and send it forthwith to the Clerk at the Table.

(2) A senator who intends to make a statement or raise a discussion on an inquiry shall as part of the notice under this rule give notice that the senator will call the attention of the Senate to the matter to be inquired into.

(3) Notice under this rule may be given by one senator for any other senator not then present, with the permission of the absent senator, by inserting the name of such senator on the notice in addition to the senator's own name.

44. (b) for an address to Her Excellency the Governor General not merely formal in its character;

45. (2) Where a senator wishes to correct irregularities or mistakes in an order, resolution, or other vote of the Senate, the senator shall give one day's notice, and a correction shall not be made unless at least two-thirds of the senators present vote in favour of such correction.

49. (4) A senator is not entitled to vote on any question in which the senator has a pecuniary interest not available to the general public. The vote of any senator so interested shall be disallowed.

50. (1) A senator shall not vote on any question unless the senator is within the Bar of the Senate when the question is put.

(3) With leave of the Senate, the vote of a senator may, for special reason assigned by the senator be withdrawn or changed by the senator immediately after the announcement of the division.

60. A senator shall not speak at a conference with the House of Commons unless the senator is one of the committee.

64. When the Senate is put into Committee of the Whole every senator shall sit in the place assigned to that senator. A senator who desires to speak shall rise and address the Chair.

66. (5) The notice referred to in subsection (4) shall be signed:

- (a) with respect to Government members, by the Leader of the Government in the Senate or any senator named by that Leader, and
- (b) with respect to Opposition members, by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate or any senator named by that Leader.

68. The Leader of the Government in the Senate, or, in the absence of that Leader, the Deputy Leader of the Government, and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, or, in the absence of that Leader, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, are members ex officio in addition to the number of appointed members, of the Committee of Selection and all select committees of the Senate.

75. (2) Subject to subsection (1), a senator on whose motion any bill, petition or other matter is referred to a special committee may, if he so desires, be a member of the committee.

83. The Clerk of the Senate is authorized to pay every witness invited or summoned to attend before a select committee a reasonable sum for his living and travelling expenses, upon the certificate of the clerk of the committee attesting to the fact that the witness attended before the committee by invitation or summons.

83A. (1) A committee that has been empowered by the Senate to incur special expenses in respect of any matter referred to it by the Senate, shall not incur any such special expenses until the chairman of that committee, or a senator acting for him, has presented to the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration a budget setting forth in reasonable detail estimates of its proposed expenditures for a specific period of time, and until the said budget has been approved in whole or in part by the latter committee.

(3) The Chairman of the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration or a senator acting for him, shall, as soon as that committee has reached a decision concerning any budget or supplementary budget presented to it pursuant to this rule, report to the Senate giving the substance of the budget concerned and indicating the nature of its decision thereon.

87. (2) Petitions for private bills when received by the Senate shall be considered by the Examiner. When a petition is without defect, the Examiner shall so report to the Senate. When a petition is defective, the Examiner shall so report to the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders stating that in his opinion the petition is defective and specifying the nature of such defects, which shall be taken into consideration, without special reference, by the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. The said committee shall study the report of the Examiner and report thereon to the Senate and shall recommend to the Senate the course to be taken in consequence of any defect.

104. (2) If the Senate grants leave, an officer, clerk or servant of the Senate shall attend before the House of Commons or a committee thereof, and a senator may attend if he thinks fit.

104. (3) Without such leave, a senator, officer, clerk or servant of the Senate shall not, on any account, under penalty of being committed to the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod or to prison during the pleasure of the Senate, go down to the House of Commons, or send his— answer in writing or appear by counsel to answer any accusation there.

112. The Clerk of the Senate shall lay before the Senate on or before the thirty-first day of May or if the Senate is not then sitting within fifteen days after the commencement of the next session, a detailed statement of his receipts and disbursements for each fiscal year.

75. (2) Subject to subsection (1), a senator on whose motion any bill, petition or other matter is referred to a special committee may, if the senator so desires, be a member of the committee.

83. The Clerk of the Senate is authorized to pay every witness invited or summoned to attend before a select committee a reasonable sum for living and travelling expenses of the witness, upon the certificate of the clerk of the committee attesting to the fact that the witness attended before the committee by invitation or summons.

83A. (1) A committee that has been empowered by the Senate to incur special expenses in respect of any matter referred to it by the Senate, shall not incur any such special expenses until the chairman of that committee, or a senator acting for the chairman, has presented to the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration a budget setting forth in reasonable detail estimates of its proposed expenditures for a specific period of time, and until the said budget has been approved in whole or in part by the latter committee.

(3) The Chairman of the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration or a senator acting for the chairman, shall, as soon as that committee has reached a decision concerning any budget or supplementary budget presented to it pursuant to this rule, report to the Senate giving the substance of the budget concerned and indicating the nature of its decision thereon.

87. (2) Petitions for private bills when received by the Senate shall be considered by the Examiner. When a petition is without defect, the Examiner shall so report to the Senate. When a petition is defective, the Examiner shall so report to the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders stating that in the Examiner's opinion the petition is defective and specifying the nature of such defects, which shall be taken into consideration, without special reference, by the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. The said committee shall study the report of the Examiner and report thereon to the Senate and shall recommend to the Senate the course to be taken in consequence of any defect.

104. (2) If the Senate grants leave, an officer, clerk or servant of the Senate shall attend before the House of Commons or a committee thereof, and a senator may attend if the senator thinks fit.

104. (3) Without such leave, a senator, officer, clerk or servant of the Senate shall not, on any account, under penalty of being committed to the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod or to prison during the pleasure of the Senate, go down to the House of Commons, or send an answer in writing or appear by counsel to answer any accusation there.

112. The Clerk of the Senate shall lay before the Senate on or before the thirty-first day of May or if the Senate is not then sitting within fifteen days after the commencement of the next session, a detailed statement of the Clerk's receipts and disbursements for each fiscal year.

113. If for two consecutive sessions of Parliament a senator has failed to give his attendance in the Senate, the Clerk of the Senate shall report the same to the Senate and the matter of such vacancy shall be heard and determined by the Senate with all convenient speed.

113. If for two consecutive sessions of Parliament a senator has failed to give attendance in the Senate, the Clerk of the Senate shall report the same to the Senate and the matter of such vacancy shall be heard and determined by the Senate with all convenient speed.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

WEDNESDAY, November 6, 1985

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

SIXTH REPORT

On October 9, 1985 a suggestion was made by the Honourable Senator Godfrey that your Committee consider an amendment to the Rules of the Senate whereby the government would table a comprehensive response to a committee report, if requested to do so by the Committee.

Pursuant to Rule 67(1)(f), your Committee met on October 24 to consider the matter.

Your Committee recommends that the Rules of the Senate be amended by adding, immediately after Rule 78(3), the following:

78. (3.1) Within 120 days of the presentation of a report from any committee of the Senate, the government shall, upon the request of the committee, table a comprehensive response thereto.

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT,
Chairman.

THE SENATE

PRIVATE BILL

EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN CANADA—FIFTH REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, November 7, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

FIFTH REPORT

Your Committee to which was referred Bill S-5, intituled: "An Act to provide for the creation by amalgamation of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, October 29, 1985, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

NATHAN NURGITZ
Deputy Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

THE ESTIMATES 1985-86

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1986, tabled in the Senate on 7th November, 1985.

Motion agreed to.

EXCISE TAX ACT EXCISE ACT

NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY
SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-80

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That notwithstanding Rule 67(1)(l), the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-80, intituled: "An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, the reason for moving that this bill be referred to the National Finance Committee rather than to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee is the heavy schedule now before the latter committee. By convention these tax bills are normally referred to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee and that is what is provided in our rules. The workload of that committee is such at the present time that it might be difficult to get this bill and Bill C-82 before it. The National Finance Committee has agreed to accept these bills and to do pre-studies on them. These bills are technical in nature and I am sure that honourable senators would like to have them pre-studied before we are submerged in the Christmas rush of legislation from the other place.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Doody consulted with us on this and we support his motion. Perhaps there has been a renumbering in the rules, but I understand the motion refers to rule 67(1)(l) while I would have thought that it would refer to rule 67(1)(k), which sets out the mandate of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

Senator Doody: I have been informed by the Table that there has indeed been a change in the lettering because an extra committee has been inserted, having the effect of moving all the letters down one.

Senator Frith: Then I guess we can expect a new sheet to insert into our rule book.

Senator Doody: I will refer that to the chairman of the Rules Committee. Is there a new sheet in transit?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: That is absolutely correct. A new committee has been inserted and the lettering is no longer accurate. The committee has been dealing with the reprinting of that page and we should have new sheets for you soon.

Motion agreed to.

PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX ACT INCOME TAX ACT

NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY
SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-82

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That notwithstanding Rule 67(1)(l), the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-82, intituled: "An Act to amend the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act and the Income Tax Act", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, the same explanation applies to this bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps Senator Doody could explain to us why he picked the National Finance Committee instead of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee for this particular bill.

Senator Doody: I picked the National Finance Committee because the bill deals with taxation, and it seemed to me that a study by the National Finance Committee would be more appropriate than a study by the Energy and Natural Resources Committee. Obviously, that point is debatable. I am a member of both committees, so I have no prejudices. It is just that I thought the National Finance Committee would be more appropriate.

Hon. Lowell Murray: I do not know whether it applies to these particular bills, but I think the Senate should be aware that over the years the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has obtained budgetary authority for and has engaged the services of a tax lawyer and a chartered accountant to assist the committee on more complicated bills that come before us. If the services of those people are required by the Standing Committee on National Finance on these bills, some arrangement will have to be made either to transfer the budgetary provisions or to transfer the personnel to that committee for that purpose.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Murray's point is well taken. I assume that one of the hurdles, if there are any hurdles to doing so, will not be an objection from the Chairman of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee to the transfer of those budgetary figures.

Senator Murray: Absolutely not.

Senator Doody: You are a very co-operative gentleman and we appreciate your offer very much indeed.

Senator Frith: We are touched.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, November 19, 1985, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g):

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday—

I have two dates here, November 19 and November 26.

Senator Doody: November 19.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker:

—November 19, 1985, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I thank his honour the Acting Speaker for unwittingly giving me a good introduction to a comment that I would like to make on the motion. The motion provides for our returning on the Tuesday that follows the return of the House of Commons after the break it normally takes in November, and is taking this year, pursuant to its own rules.

We do not have any specific rules matching those in the House of Commons, but we have traditionally adjourned for the week that they take and also the following week. The rationale has been that since the House of Commons is off for that week—and honourable senators will recall that according to their rules, they also take two or three weeks in December and January, with another break in February, and still another at Easter. In all of those cases, as I recall, when I was responsible for the adjournment motions in such circumstances, we always took the following week as well because of the fact that the House of Commons would not be producing any legislation for the Senate during those two weeks.

I hope that my proposal that we adjourn until November 26 will be isolated from our discussions concerning sitting only when we have a block of work to do. That is an ongoing discussion. We have had private discussions about it and we have debated it, and I believe we will continue to discuss and debate it.

What I am proposing now has no connection with those suggestions. It is based rather on the tradition that we have followed since the House of Commons has adopted those rules. It is my recollection that we have always done what I am now proposing, but rather than leave it to my recollection, I have asked that the decisions that we have taken in the past be researched, and I hope to have them shortly.

May I suggest that we stand this motion until the end of today's proceedings, and if I am able to produce the precedents and thereby persuade honourable senators that an adjournment to November 26 would be both feasible and traditional, we can then deal with the motion and perhaps amend it to read to November 26 if honourable senators are persuaded that it would be acceptable to do so.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: May I ask the Deputy Leader of the Opposition whether he wants to adjourn the debate until later this day?

Senator Frith: My only hesitation is that I am not absolutely sure of my ground on the debatability of a motion to adjourn. Therefore I would rather suggest that we continue our comments later and that the item stand rather than have it appear that I am adjourning the debate.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, that seems to be the most reasonable approach. If Senator Frith can show us that there is, indeed, a precedent, I am sure that honourable senators would be reluctant to refuse the opportunity to take another week off. I am reluctant to suggest it because we do have some legislation on the way.

Senator Frith: It is to uphold tradition.

Senator Doody: Yes. Far be it from me to fly in the face of hallowed tradition, and I am sure that honourable senators would agree with that step. I trust that we are not establishing or defending a principle that we are entitled to a week longer than the House of Commons—and that may very well be a tradition as well.

Senator Frith: No one would interpret it in such a malicious way.

Senator Doody: I am certainly glad to hear that. We have a substantial amount of work before the committees, and I have been told by several chairmen that they have a full schedule planned for the week of November 19. Whether or not we decide on November 26 as the date on which we return, I want to remind honourable senators that these committees will be working whether the Senate sits or not. These discussions that we have been having from time to time about the sittings of the chamber in no way interfere with or detract from the committee system which will be working full time during that period.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that this motion stand until later this day?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion stands.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

EFFECT OF BUDGET REDUCTIONS

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate arises out of recent reports of statements made by the President of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to the effect that the budget cuts provided for in the last federal budget, amounting to $60 million in 1986-87 and $200 million more in the next four years, may destroy the CBC. The President of the CBC said that while the $60 million cut alone may not destroy the CBC, it would certainly damage it very seriously. These reports remind me of statements made by Mr. Masse, the former Minister of Communications, at the time of earlier cuts in the CBC budget announced by the government, to the effect that he would press for allocations from departmental budgets to be spent in the cultural area. Mr. Masse said that these would assist in government allocation of spending on cultural policy.

My question is: Is this still an initiative of this government under the auspices of the Acting Minister of Communications, Mr. Bouchard, and has anything transpired in this area in terms of allocation of departmental budgets to assist in the development of cultural matters, and by that I mean programming on the CBC?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can give my honourable friend the figures that have already been quoted in relation to government support for the CBC. The amount is $850 million in the current fiscal year, while it was $825 million in the previous fiscal year. Therefore, there is a substantial degree of public support already being provided. I agree with those who think that Mr. Juneau's apprehension is, perhaps, exaggerated.

I would remind my honourable friend that there is a special study being made of the CBC under the chairmanship of Mr. Gerald Caplan and an associate co-chairman, whose name escapes me at the moment. This study will be dealing with the very matter that he describes. I would like to withhold any positive comment on that until we are a little further along in the process.

Respecting the direct question he asked me, I have to tell him that I do not have that information.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. I understand why the Leader of the Government might not have the answer to the specific question. Is it a correct inference that he will try to get an answer for us as to whether that policy announced by Mr. Masse is, at least, still alive and has not been changed? It is a rather interesting proposal and an important policy declaration by the government and is one that I support, that is, the idea of other departments who benefit from the CBC allocating part of their budget to the CBC. It may be that the Leader of the Government can tell us that it is open and that it is under consideration by the committee, which would then link the two parts of his answer quite satisfactorily, in my view.

• (1420)

Senator Roblin: Yes; that is, the statement made by the former minister is still the policy of the government. But I rather got the impression from my friend that he wanted to know what has been done about it. That is the point on which I do not have the information. I will make some inquiries and perhaps I can get some further information. However, I think that it is probably now influenced, at any rate, by the Caplan report we expect quite soon.

Senator Frith: Could the Leader of the Government remind me of one aspect of the Caplan committee's mandate that I have forgotten? The government, quite understandably, is dealing with questions relating to the CBC in particular and to broadcasting in general by reference to the study that this committee has undertaken. Is there a date set—I hope that the government leader will not say “soon”—for the committee's report? If not, can the government leader give us a more general idea of when that committee expects to report?

Senator Roblin: In the vocabulary used in answers to questions, the term “soon” is appropriate in this case. My recollection is that the committee will report before the end of the year.

Senator Frith: Has it completed its hearings?

Senator Roblin: I think that it has and that the members are writing their report, but I must confess that I am relying on my memory. I will try to provide a more exact answer to my friend's question soon.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, the Prime Minister is reported to have made a statement recently in Edmonton to the effect that there would be an announcement about a program to deal with the drought in western Canada “soon.” I think he qualified that statement by saying that it would be made as soon as matters are worked out with the provinces. Could the Leader of the Government add some precision to the bare bones that we have been given from the news media to indicate the nature of the proposals that are being worked out with the provinces?

The reason I have asked my question in that way is that the provinces have already announced that they are administering some programs with respect to this matter. We would hope to avoid the problem that Senator Argue discussed a few days ago; that is, that after the provinces had announced the assistance program to retain brood cow herds and invited the federal government to participate in it, they simply took the money into their treasuries. I am not sure how much money was involved, but I think it was $30 per cow; I do not know what was done with it, but the provinces did not increase the payment to the producers by the amount that the federal government had offered to contribute to that program.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am interested that my honourable friend has raised the point. I thought that it had been beaten to death yesterday, but evidently it had not. The Prime Minister was able to say what I did not feel easy about saying, and that is that part of our problem with the announcement has been the fact that other levels of government are concerned. It is necessary to concert our effort with theirs if we expect them to co-operate, and that is what we have been doing.

To the best of my knowledge, the plan, which is in its final stages, I am glad to say, will be in addition to whatever else is being done by anyone else. That is my information at the present time and I believe it to be correct. The Prime Minister's use of the word "soon" is, perhaps, a little closer to the mark than mine was a month ago, because I think it will be, indeed, soon.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for clarification. The Leader of the Government has said that whatever financial assistance is offered by the federal government will be in addition to what the provinces have announced. Does this mean that, if there is a federal brood cow support program offered to the province of Alberta, for example, it will be in addition to the $75 per head that has already been offered by that province?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, my friend is really trying to encourage me to say what is in the plan, and of course that I cannot do. I must wait until the plan is made public.

Senator Olson: Perhaps the Leader of the Government could help us a little, though. He did already offer, I think, that the Prime Minister's use of the word "soon" was probably a little more accurate than his was six or seven weeks ago. Could the Leader of the Government be a little more precise than that? Are the producers to be expected to wait another week, two weeks or a month, or can he help us to interpret what the Prime Minister means by the word "soon"? I hope it indicates a little shorter period of time than he had in mind when he used that term in September.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend had a glorious opportunity yesterday to furnish us with his views on this entire matter, and I want to assure him that his opinions have not escaped my notice.

NATIVE PEOPLES

TREATMENT OF LOUIS RIEL AND MÉTIS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the fact that November 16 next will be the 100th anniversary of the hanging of Louis Riel, is it the intention of the federal government to issue a statement on that occasion and to announce any steps that it may be taking to redress any wrongs that were committed against Louis Riel and against the Métis people, especially in connection with the lands along the Red River and the Assiniboine River which were granted to them under the Manitoba Act of 1870?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I shall not attempt to debate that very interesting question in the context of the Question Period.

AUDITOR GENERAL

REPORT FOR FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1985—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Inquiries:

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Wednesday, December 4, 1985, I will call the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Auditor General of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1985, tabled in the Senate on November 5, 1985.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SEVENTY-FOURTH ANNUAL CONFERENCE, OTTAWA, AND SPRING CONFERENCE, LOMÉ, TOGO—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, the 19th November, 1985, I will call the attention of the Senate to the Seventy-fourth Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union which was hosted by Canada in Ottawa from 2nd to 7th September, 1985, as well as to the spring Conference which took place in Lomé, Togo, from 25th to 30th March, 1985.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Fourth Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, which was presented on Wednesday, November 6, 1985.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, yesterday when I presented the reports of the committee, I presented three separate reports. At that time I asked that they be printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and you will find them in your Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of today. The reason that the committee recommended that we make three separate reports, rather than one, was that they thought it would be better if the Senate had the opportunity to debate each item separately since each was a report on an entirely separate subject. In that way, the Senate could express its opinion separately on each one. You will, therefore, find the one under debate now at page 790 of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

• (1430)

Before I proceed with my comments insofar as this particular report is concerned, may I encourage honourable senators to read in particular the next report—that is, the fifth report—regarding the use of the genders in our text. This is a rather complicated subject and there are some problems as between the French text and the English text. I hope that honourable senators will give that careful reading so that when we finally adopt those gender changes and have them printed in the Rules of the Senate we will have an updated and appropriate consensus of what it is that the Senate wants.

Dealing now with what is before us, honourable senators will recall that we had a debate on the Royal Assent ceremony some three years ago, but we did not come to any conclusions at that time. There were some excellent speeches made, but no final decisions were arrived at.

More recently, the House of Commons, in a study of its own rules, made specific recommendations to keep the current structure and to implement a new structure. Our committee looked at those recommendations carefully, and also looked at the historical context.

Historically, of course, the reason there is Royal Assent is clearly set out in the Constitution Act, 1982, which, in this case, repeats the British North America Act, 1867 which sets out in section 9 that:

The Executive Government and authority of and over Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

Then, in section 17, under the heading “Legislative Power”, the following appears:

There shall be One Parliament for Canada, consisting of the Queen, an Upper House styled the Senate, and the House of Commons.

Clearly, there are three levels of authority at the legislative level. Royal Assent then emanates from that, but the only other references to Royal Assent come in sections 55, 56 and 57, where the statement is made that “Bills must receive Royal Assent.” But nowhere is there any statement as to how Royal Assent is to proceed. There is no law, no act; it is merely a customary practice that we follow. The practice that we follow, as all honourable senators know, is that it is always held here, always in the presence of Her Majesty, or Her representative, the Governor General, or the Deputy of the Governor General, which is the normal case.

The proposal that has been made is that we not abandon the current procedure but that we find an alternative procedure, one which would be simpler. That, in essence, is what the committee recommends.

The committee recommends a set of principles largely based, by the way, on the speeches that were made in the Senate some three years ago on this subject. The basic principles are that it be an alternative method; that the present method be used at least once each year so that it will not fall into disuse—so there would be forced retention; that either method could be used in any case at the request of either house or at the request of the Governor General; that in general terms the new procedure always involve representatives from both houses; that it be public, on the principle that this is the final enactment of the law and the citizen has the right to be present if he so wishes; and that the subsequent declaration of Royal Assent be reported in both houses. That would then complete the cycle.

Then the problem, of course, arises as to how we accomplish these changes. Senator Frith, in his comments of some three years ago, set out clearly various options that were before us in this regard. The first option was an amendment to the Constitution. The second option was the passage of an act which is, by the way, what was done in Great Britain where they now have an alternative system. The third option was a joint resolution of both houses, and the fourth option was to simply let it happen, which is apparently what happened in Australia where the formal system has fallen into disuse.

Your committee, on looking at this, recommends that it could be done by resolution of the two houses. Your committee, in the process of discussions, asked me to meet with Her Excellency, the Governor General, as a matter of courtesy so that she would know that these discussions were taking place because she is, after all, an essential party to the process. I did visit with her. I informed the Leader of the Government in the Senate at that stage of the recommendations of the committee, and I did meet on two occasions with Her Excellency, the Governor General, to outline the thinking of the committee so that she would know about the subject. I did not ask her for a decision because that was not my role; that was purely a courtesy the committee asked be extended to her. So, the Governor General is aware of the discussions.

The suggestion, honourable senators, is that we adopt the report—the principles are broad enough, I think—and that we then proceed to establish a committee or an individual to commence discussions with the House of Commons. Their proposal is somewhat different from ours, but I think that there is enough common ground that we can arrive at a suitable compromise so that we can make this change, recognizing the importance of the historical procedure which would be retained, but permitting a new and more modern, more rapid procedure, which could be used at other times.

I recommend the adoption of the report.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wonder if I can have some clarification of the recommendation in paragraph No. 3, in which reference is made to representatives of the Senate meeting with representatives of the House of Commons to draft a resolution covering the subject. At the end of that sentence, it says, referring to what was proposed, “as described in this Report.” It seems to me that you are limited to what is described in this report, yet we know now that the House of Commons may not have exactly the same plan in mind. This means, I suppose, that it will be necessary to come back to the Senate if there is any variation from the report, or does the committee consider that the language is sufficiently broad to enable the committee to come to some understanding with the House of Commons with respect to the matter so that a final report could be submitted to both houses when an agreement is reached?

Is that possible, or will you need another reference from the chamber in order to accommodate any differences of opinion?

Senator Molgat: If I interpreted correctly the views of the members of the committee—and a number of them are present—on the matter of the three principles outlined in paragraph No. 3, senators were of the view that those were established principles, and that they did not want deviation from the principles in those cases. That is what the words “as described in this Report” mean.

The same view was not taken with regard to the method by which it might be done; that is, whether it might be done by joint resolution. That was not as fixed, but regarding those other three items, my recollection is that if there were to be variations then the committee should come back to the Senate for a further reference.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend because he has interpreted it as I have read it. I think that is the meaning of the report, but, in view of that fact, I should like to move the adjournment of this debate so that the wording may receive further consideration.

● (1440)

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, before the motion for the adjournment of the debate is put, may I have an opportunity to make a few remarks?

Senator Roblin: I would be most happy if any other senator who wishes to speak today would do so.

Senator Hicks: Frankly, I am not all that happy with this idea that we should abandon the traditional process of granting Royal Assent to bills. It seems to me that the ceremony of calling the members of the other place to the bar of the Senate, propounding the legislation and then giving Royal Assent to it is not a bad idea at all, and I do not think we should abandon it lightly.

I think, when it comes to voting on the acceptance of this report, I will probably vote against it.

Perhaps I am old-fashioned, but I do think there is a good deal of value in traditions that have governed our proceedings for more than 100 years. I do not think the inconvenience of the procedure of Royal Assent which we now follow is great enough to warrant changing it and having a couple of people call at Rideau Hall so that Royal Assent may be given. I think we should carefully consider whether we want to abandon a practice which makes a rather nice ceremony, one which I, for one, have always enjoyed and which even such a distinguished member of the House of Commons, who is so antagonistic to the Senate, as Stanley Knowles has always been faithful in attending. Frankly, I do not see the necessity for all this fuss at all.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask Senator Hicks if he understands that, when he uses the word “abandon,” he realizes that the recommendation is not the abandonment of the traditional but the availability of an alternative.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Hicks: I listened carefully to what Senator Molgat said and I realize that the traditional procedure would still be available, but I suspect that, if we make a change, that procedure will not be resorted to very often. It seems to me that we will lose a ceremonial tradition which I, for one, appreciate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I find myself in agreement with Senator Hicks.

Traditionally, as the law and the Constitution state, there are three parts to Parliament. It is true that, for one reason or another, the House of Commons is becoming more and more dominant in that triad. It would be unfortunate if the role of Her Majesty in the Constitution should be reduced inadvertently.

If someone wants to propose that we have a well-ordered republic in Canada, then that is considerable; but, we are not talking about that. We are talking about incremental change which is all in one direction, in the direction of a unicameral republic, and I think there are many senators who would not applaud that direction.

Consequently, I agree with Senator Hicks, especially when I read that Royal Assent is given at a “ceremony.” That is the word used in the report. I realize that it has a distinct ceremonial aspect, but, surely, we have not yet reached the point where it is merely a ceremony.

Therefore, I will be joining with Senator Hicks. I hope we will not be standing alone.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Le Moine: I hope we will have further opportunities to discuss a matter I think is a very serious one, especially in the light of what was said by Senator Stewart. It represents an erosion of the constitutional monarchy by which we are governed. It is an erosion of a ritual I still consider to be essential, because our psychological make-up has not developed to the point where we can do without.

I would like to know whether we will have another chance to discuss the matter.

[English]

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, if we are to accept the statements that have been made during the past year or so with regard to the possibility of Senate reform, then I think we should not start making reforms piecemeal, and that is what is being proposed. Really, this is a minor reform of the functions of the Senate.

I think it would be logical for us to adopt a policy of waiting until the major reforms are introduced, and, at that time, we can consider, debate and, possibly, adopt what is now being proposed. At any rate, we will be dealing with it one way or another.

I suggest, therefore, that this be postponed until we know what is going to happen with regard to major reforms of the Senate.

On motion of Senator Roblin, debate adjourned.

[Later]

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I may have missed something. Did Senator Molgat move the adoption of the sixth report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I requested the standing of both the fifth and sixth reports because the fifth report is somewhat complicated. There are some problems with translation, and there is a problem of how we deal with the question of gender. I wanted to give the committee a little more time to study this.

With regard to the sixth report, Senator Godfrey, who was very much involved in proposing this, is not here, and I would rather make the presentation when he is in the chamber.

Senator Roblin: I have something to say about that one, too.

THE ESTIMATES 1985-86

ADOPTION OF NINTH REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A)

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Ninth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Supplementary Estimates (A) 1985-86), which was presented in the Senate on 29th October, 1985.

On motion of Senator Leblanc (Saurel), report adopted.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

CONSIDERATION OF THIRD REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Third Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments (Statutory Instruments No. 30), which was presented on Tuesday, October 29, 1985.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I trust I will not keep you long in the consideration of the third report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. I thought I would just take a brief moment to remind honourable senators that this report is unlike the report of any other committee in Parliament in that every other committee comes to tell you about its successes. This committee only reports its ultimate failures. That is the only purpose of the report. Let me begin by saying that when the committee considers that there is something wrong with a regulation, because it does not meet any of its 15 criteria which have been approved by Parliament, it attempts to deal with the department concerned. When it fails in that, it attempts to deal with the minister or the head of the agency and if it still fails to succeed, it has only one means at its disposal and that is to table a report in Parliament, a form of embarrassment or exposure to the light, if you like, of the problem the committee saw. This committee has virtually hundreds—I was going to say thousands but that might not be right—of successes every year in convincing departments and/or ministers that there are errors in their ways.

The committee's purpose in presenting these reports is not to tell you about its hundreds of successes but to attempt to clean up regulations which we all know the bureaucracy of this and every other government loves to use as a law making authority. So we come to you with these reports only to indicate that something is wrong and that we cannot get it corrected.

One of the matters that has appeared for some time and on which we have been unable to obtain a correction is the one dealing with the Patents Act, which is the subject matter of the third report. This particular report deals with the keeping of the register of patent agents, those persons entitled to represent applicants for patents before the patent office. In addition, there are the various rules to be complied with in order to gain qualification as a patent agent. The Patent Act clearly outlines in subsection 15(2) that the Commissioner of Patents is to make regulations governing the registration of patent agents. That is the delegating authority in the act. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has concluded that the enactment of certain rules by the Governor in Council, not the Commissioner of Patents, is ultra vires. That is, it has been made by someone other than the person who rightfully exercises Parliament's delegated authority. Having brought this to the attention of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the minister of that department has advised us that the Department of Justice has given to him an opinion indicating that sections 153 to 156 of the Patent Rules were validly enacted and, accordingly, intra vires.

According to our committee that is not so. Without taking the time of this chamber to explain the various legal opinions expressed, first, in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs then in the Privy Council Office and ultimately in the Department of Justice, the committee was still of the view that this matter was ultra vires of the authority and, accordingly, the minister, refusing to act, left your committee with no other alternative but to report this matter to both houses of Parliament. The subject of this third report is a small matter to some but a matter of considerable principle to the committee.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak to this order, it is considered debated.

CONSIDERATION OF FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Fourth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments (Statutory Instruments No. 31), which was presented on Tuesday, October 29, 1985.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I will be even shorter in dealing with the fourth report than I was in dealing with the third report. The process is the same as I described in dealing with the third report, namely, that up to the present moment the joint committee reviewing the regulation and coming to the conclusion that the regulation was ultra vires in this case of the Canada Shipping Act, had no other alternative but to report the matter to both houses of Parliament. I should also mention that, although both the third report and the fourth report deal with regulations that in the opinion of the committee are ultra vires, there are other criteria, such as breach of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and other reasons, for refusing to pass on the instrument or the regulation.

With regard to the fourth report, about the Canada Shipping Act, the process involves several years of dealing with the department and ultimately with the minister. The purpose of this regulation is to restrict the quantity of oil that may be carried on board oil tankers in the waters within Head Harbour Passage, New Brunswick. The joint committee was of the view that it was not within the power of the statute to limit this regulation to a particular body of water. That is, there is authority to pass all kinds of regulations saying how much or how little can be contained in a single vessel, but the statute indicates that it can only be passed in very general terms and cannot specify particular areas; the purpose being that otherwise there would be a discrepancy in various regulations passed. Without getting into the detail, the Shipping Act clearly indicates that regulations made thereunder are to apply to all Canadian waters south of the 60th parallel of north latitude and to all Canadian waters north of the 60th parallel of north latitude that are not within the Shipping Safety Control Zone prescribed pursuant to the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act. There are some other exceptions that do not apply to this particular case.

I should point out that there is tabled in the other place Bill C-75 which would significantly alter the existing legislation and would probably, if passed, alleviate the need for this report. In fact, we would not make the fourth report if the bill were passed into law. However, the bill is not law at the moment and the joint committee believes that it could not in each instance wait for corrective legislation, that it was still necessary to point out to Parliament what the committee believes to be an ultra vires regulation.

Another very fundamental problem raised by the fourth report is one that arises from time to time, and that is the disclosure of a legal opinion given to a particular department or minister. In this particular case, on each occasion when the joint committee requested the legal reasoning for the use of regulation in this matter, both the former minister and the present minister responded by saying that he was not obliged to disclose a legal opinion given to him by the Department of Justice. The joint committee is of the view that a mere statement that a minister or department is acting within its rights is supported by an opinion of the Department of Justice is not satisfactory. The joint committee cannot operate and carry out its function without knowing the reason or reasons for any particular course of action.

As honourable senators will note, the fourth report of the joint committee explains an understanding that was reached in 1977 between the Minister of Justice of that day and the committee of that day, in which a particular minister would be required to give a reasoned position, and it was certainly believed that such could be done, without disclosing the precise legal opinion of the Department of Justice. That in essence is a brief summary of the fourth report.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak to this order, it is considered debated.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

"LEST WE FORGET"

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, since this is the last sitting before Remembrance Day, may I be permitted to pay tribute to our veterans?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, on Remembrance Day many of us will meet before big city cenotaphs and village monuments. This will happen all across the country. We will have the opportunity to honour the memory of over 110,000 Canadians who are buried in graves in far-off places, places where once fierce battles raged.

It is now 70 years since the first of our veterans died serving their country. In 1915 our young troops, newly arrived in Europe, were called upon to hold the line at Ypres and St. Julien. It was a bloody baptism. Over 6,000 Canadians were killed within 48 hours. Like all armies, we were to learn that such slaughter was routine in the First World War.

Later came the battle of the Somme, the glorious Canadian victory at Vimy Ridge, Arras and Passchendaele. The Canadian Corps earned such a high reputation that it was selected to lead the Allied attacks in important battles. Above them, Canadian pilots proved that the aircraft indeed had a place in warfare, and out of the top 21 Allied aces, 10 were from Canada.

It is significant that at this present moment we are defending the heroism of Billy Bishop, on a motion presented by Senator Molson, which indicates that so many years after the wars we still hold dear the heroes of our country.

Remembrance Day became a treasured date in the calendar in tribute to the many millions who died in the First World War. Canada had much to commemorate. One tenth of our population joined up in the three services. Over 66,000 men and women were killed. Many returned home badly disabled, nearly 2,000 were blind, and another 3,500 had lost an arm or a leg.

The National War Memorial in Ottawa was erected in their honour, to honour those Canadians who had fought in "the war to end all wars".

Regrettably, other generations of Canadians were also to be asked to defend freedom around the world. Again, in the Second World War, almost one in ten Canadians put on a service uniform. From Dieppe to Hong Kong, Canadian soldiers were in the thick of the heaviest action. Our sailors escorted the convoys on the perilous North Atlantic runs, and our airmen flew in the Battle of Britain and distinguished themselves on unceasing bombing missions.

Again, the human cost of war touched all parts of our nation, when some 45,000 Canadians were killed and another 55,000 were wounded.

Almost before the country had time to relax in the joys of peace, the call for volunteers went out again; and this time Canadians served under the United Nations in the 1950-53 Korean War, when over 26,000 Canadians fought to preserve international order and 516 of them died doing so.

Today, honourable senators, there are roughly 675,000 Canadian veterans, and there are less than 25,000 survivors of the First World War still alive in Canada. The average age of our Second World War veterans is over 65.

November 11 is a day to remember their faith and courage. They risked their lives so that strangers in other lands could have the chance to decide their own future, and they made sure that repression and dictatorship never reached our shores.

Honourable senators, our government is continuing to erect memorials in the national parks of Canada, and I believe it is significant to end up with these words that are inscribed on those monuments:

They will never know the beauty of this place, see the seasons change, enjoy nature's chorus. All we enjoy we owe to them, men and women who lie buried in the earth of foreign lands, and in the Seven Seas.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, it would be presumptuous and unnecessary for me to try to add to the eloquent remarks that Senator Marshall has placed on our record, but I believe that someone from this side should indicate our total agreement with the sentiments that he has expressed; and I rise to do that. Earlier this year I had the opportunity, at the time of celebrating the anniversary of the liberation of Belgium, of visiting battlefields in Belgium, Holland and France. The sacrifices of our men and women were displayed to us, and I should pay particular tribute to the Newfoundlanders, so many of whom gave up their lives in what must have been one of the most futile military operations since the charge of the Light Brigade. Certainly Newfoundlanders can be proud of their sons who fell, but we should be ashamed of the kind of military command that brought about that catastrophe. I commend what Senator Marshall has placed on our record.

● (1510)

[Translation]

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: On this occasion, honourable senators, I think it would be fitting to say a few words in French in this chamber.

So many Canadians served to protect their country and their fellow citizens! They were not all killed, they were not all wounded. A good many of them devoted three, four or five years of their life which would otherwise have been spent serving their fellow Canadians in a common cause.

Remembrance Day. Let us all say: "I remember." Each passing year there are fewer and fewer of us who had the opportunity and duty to serve under such circumstances.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I too must rise today to pay tribute to the valiant Canadians who died on the battlefields.

Like many of my colleagues I have had several opportunities to visit our World War I and World War II military cemeteries in Europe.

A few months ago I took my family there and I must say that I am deeply touched by the emotion expressed by Canadian youths who did not have to live through such harrowing and hellish moments.

In his considerate remarks, Senator Marshall referred to the Bill Bishop incident. I would like to draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that attempts are being made to do away with chaplain services in veterans' hospitals and replace them with contract personnel, if I may put it that way.

At least that is the news we heard last night on television. I think it is a bureaucratic proposition which borders on indecency, and I will tell you why.

Those people were wounded in wartime, they lived through the hell of armed combat and the adverse circumstances which such human conflicts bring to mind, and they will forever be deprived of what little hope they may have on earth.

Those chaplains probably are their most precious link with faith. What else is left for them in this world? Some gave their life, others their limbs and the best of themselves. Some may think that the spiritual needs of veterans can be adequately met by providing for someone to visit them from time to time.

I strongly object to this kind of proposition. Military chaplains and others who serve our veterans know very well the concerns of those generous Canadians.

I think we would break the most basic rules of civility if we deprived our veterans of the spiritual advisors they need so very much to stand the sometimes cruel reality of their lives.

Now, more than ever before, they probably need these spiritual advisors who have supported them all during their lives.

As we are nearing Remembrance Day, I ask the Government to reconsider the action it is about to take and to keep the services of these chaplains, so that in their later years these veterans do not feel singled out by an insensitive bureaucracy.

I do not deny that, on many occasions, DVA employees have gallantly fought for the rights of veterans, but on the issue I am raising today, I think they are wrong.

Let us spend the week-end and Remembrance Day thinking about this issue.

LOUIS RIEL

HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF HANGING—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, November 5, 1985:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the 100th Anniversary, on November 16, 1985, of the hanging of Louis Riel.

He said: Honourable senators, I wanted to draw your attention today to the 100th Anniversary on November 16 of the hanging of Louis Riel, since the House of Commons and the Senate will not be sitting next week.

A knowledge of our country's history is essential if we are to understand the present and plan intelligently for the future. How can we, as a people, know where we are going if we don't know where we come from?

Those who take the trouble to study our history will discover a continuity and a sense of direction: the will to remain true to ourselves and to take the path that leads to full fruition of our nation.

The year 1985 marks the 100th anniversary of a major event in history that must be considered in any analysis of the development of French Canada, from the time the yoke of confederation was imposed on us in 1867, and I am referring to the hanging of Louis Riel in Regina on November 16, 1885.

Riel, our brother, died as a victim of his dedication to the cause of the Métis, whose leader he was, and as a victim of fanaticism and treachery.

Why do the words said nearly 100 years ago by Honoré Mercier, a future Quebec premier, still arouse certain feelings in us, the words he spoke at what has been described as the biggest demonstration in the history of Canada? What was it at the time that made nearly 50,000 people, in a city of less than 150,000, gather on the Champ-de-Mars in Montreal? Why did the execution of an outlaw, thousands of kilometers away, arouse in the hearts of people known for their respect for established authority, a surge of anger that upset a political team, invulnerable up to then, and that was a portent of its imminent fall from power? Why has Louis Riel remained the kind of figure whose hanging 100 years ago we cannot forget?

Riel was not one of those men who are successful and honoured during their lifetime and who are remembered after their death by subsequent generations. He was neither prime minister of Canada nor premier of a province, he was not a governor or a famous archbishop or a captain of industry. He is described in our history books as a rebel and a recidivist. In other words, an outlaw. He stood in the way of progress in the West, and his life ended ignominiously on the scaffold. In a country where considerations of peace, order and good government have always had the upper hand, those were not exactly the best qualifications for becoming a national hero. In that case, what mysterious solidarity caused a future prime minister of Canada, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, to say in the days following the execution of the rebel:

If I had been on the shores of the Saskatchewan River, I too would have taken up arms!

What institutional guilt caused the Canadian Government to issue a stamp honouring Riel in 1970, when the then Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau said solemnly:

We must never forget that in the final instance, a democracy is judged by the way it treats its minorities. Louis Riel's struggle has not yet been won.

Riel became the symbol of a linguistic and cultural minority whose rights to survive were for a long time ignored and are still threatened; a symbol also of pioneers anxious to keep their freedom and their intimacy with nature, and struggling to prevent civilization from upsetting their way of life. Riel was certainly not a saint. His mental stability and political judgment have rightly been questioned. If we celebrate his memory, it is nevertheless because the fight to which he devoted his whole life largely remains ours today.

Louis Riel was born on October 22, 1844, in the Red River Settlement. He was baptised by Bishop Provencher on the same day in the Saint-Boniface Cathedral. His father and namesake, as well as his mother Julie Lagimanière, were both French Canadians, but Riel inherited Indian blood from his maternal grandmother. He was the first born in a family of 11 children.

Son of a local community leader, the young man quickly gained the attention of Bishop Taché of Saint-Boniface, who obtained from Lady Masson de Terrebonne the money needed by the young man to study for the priesthood at the Petit Séminaire de Montréal. The death of his father in 1864 seems to have traumatised him. He interrupted his studies and went to work, first for a Montreal legal firm, then in Chicago, and finally in St. Paul, Minnesota. He returned to the Red River Settlement in 1868.

At that time, the traditional balance of the colony was being threatened by external factors. The previous year, the British North America Act had created the new Dominion of Canada, whose leaders cherished the ambition of extending the Canadian realm from sea to sea. The Manitoba colony quickly whetted their appetites. It was owned by the Hudson's Bay Company and administered through a governor and the Council of the Assiniboine, both appointed by the company. At the time, Ottawa was worried about the annexation aspirations of some Americans. The simpler solution was therefore chosen. Macdonald negotiated directly with the company the purchase of Rupert's Land, totally ignoring the wishes of the local population who from then on had the feeling that they had been sold off like cattle.

The population of the colony, estimated at about 12,000 people, was far from homogeneous. There was a majority of French-speaking Catholic Metis whose partly Indian blood made them prefer a life of buffalo hunting on the vast western plains to a sedentary life on the farm. There were also English-speaking Anglican Metis, who lived by farming, as well as Presbyterian Scottish settlers. These groups, with different languages, religions and ways of life, had learned to coexist in a bilingual society. However, the territorial ambitions of Ottawa and the attitude of some of the newcomers would disrupt this delicate balance.

The land surveys undertaken in July 1869 at the initiative of Federal Minister McDougall made the situation even more explosive. The Metis saw in this action confirmation of their worst fears in view of the relationship between McDougall, appointed Lieutenant-Governor of the colony, and a group of land speculators from Ontario, one of whom had denounced the way of life of the Metis in a series of contemptuous articles.

Riel, who was young, educated, eloquent and bearer of a famous name, immediately emerged as a natural leader. Under his leadership, the Metis soon prevented forcefully the carrying out of the land surveys. In October 1869, the National Committee of the Metis demanded direct negotiations with the Canadian Government on the terms of annexation. However, in spite of his efforts, Riel was unable to convince the English-speaking people of the area to join his cause. His program included the representation of the region's inhabitants in the Canadian Parliament and bilingualism in the provincial Legislature as well as in the higher echelons of the judicial system. This program attracted the sympathy even of the English-speaking residents.

However, it soon became apparent that the strategy of the extremists from Ontario, led by Dr. Schultz, was to provoke a civil war in the colony and blame it on the Metis to destroy their political influence. Riel succeeded in winning his military battles against them, but he fell into their trap. On March 4, 1870, he had young Thomas Scott tried and sentenced to death. The prisoner, an associate of Schultz who had been unable to escape, had, throughout his captivity, provoked his guards by his insults and ignored all warnings about the consequences of such an attitude. While they agree that Scott was a greedy and bigoted hot-head, historians consider that Riel made a serious error in his case, probably because he wanted to strengthen his authority by showing his willingness to use repressive tactics. The outrage caused in Ontario by Scott's execution made a dangerous rebel out of Riel. However, Riel's delegates negotiated with John A. Macdonald and George-Étienne Cartier the terms of a settlement that became the Manitoba Act in 1870. The new territory was given provincial status, but with no control over its natural resources. Some 1.4 million acres of land in the Northwest were set aside for the Metis. Bilingualism was guaranteed before the courts, in the provincial legislature and in official documents. That settlement was approved by the Metis in June of 1870. But Riel had committed rebellious acts and his negotiators could not secure his amnesty.

● (1530)

It soon became apparent that the Canadian Government, urged on by the Ontario press, was in no mood to forget. Riel told Bishop Taché:

Whatever happens now, the rights of Metis are guaranteed by the Manitoba Act. This is all I wanted. I have achieved my goal.

While the Government and the legislative bodies were being set up in the new province, Riel had to leave.

During the following years, Riel's destiny was to depend on the interplay of complex forces. In Ottawa, Minister Cartier redoubled his pressures in support of Riel and the Metis. The latter expressed their gratitude by allowing him to get elected in a Manitoba constituency after his personal defeat in Quebec in the 1872 election. Then Cartier died in May 1873, which deprived the Metis of their main support in the federal Cabinet. Riel who, on Bishop Taché's request, had withdrawn his nomination the previous year to make room for Cartier, ran in the by-election held following the latter's death, and was elected by acclamation in October 1873. He refused to sit in the House, however, for fear of being assassinated, or indicted for Scott's murder. During the 1874 general election, he was re-elected. Having come to Ottawa and having signed the Members' register, he was thrown out of the House on April 16, on a Conservative Member's motion. Re-elected in September of that year, in the by-election called after his own expulsion, he was once again expelled from the House. In February of 1875, Prime Minister Mackenzie obtained the House's consent to Riel's amnesty following a five-year banishment. Riel went back into exile.

It was at that point that the signs of Riel's mental unbalance became more acute. Having taken literally a letter he received from Bishop Bourget, Riel became obsessed with the idea that he had been entrusted with a heavenly mission as the guardian of the Metis welfare and even as the prophet of a new form of Christianity. Occasionally, he suffered from fits of hysteria. In March of 1876, friends of his secured his admission, under a borrowed name, at the Longue-Pointe Hospital, which generations of Quebecers have come to know as Saint-Jean-de-Dieu, now the Louis-Hippolyte-Lafontaine Hospital. From there he was transferred to the Beauport asylum. In 1877, his doctors allowed him to leave the asylum, and advised him to live a quiet life.

But the demon of politics was not to leave Riel alone for all that. In his exile in the United States, he continued to be concerned with what was happening to his fellow countrymen in the Northwest, and was involved in the 1882 American legislative elections. He even obtained his American citizenship the following year.

He had entered a new career as a teacher, when the Northwest Metis asked him to take up their leadership. Several Metis had sold their lands to Winnipeg real estate speculators and had gone into exile in the Northwest Territories of that time, namely in Saskatchewan, where they found other Metis and Indians living their traditional, nomadic life. But progress had caught up with them. The relocation of the Canadian Pacific main line had caused a collapse in land values around Prince Albert. The settlers held no undisputed title to the lands on which they had settled three years earlier. The scarcity of buffaloes compelled them to turn over to farming. The first ones to arrive were entitled to lots located near the rivers. However, following a survey made by the federal Government in 1882, the Métis settlers were compelled to resettle on square lots and the federal Government refused to undertake a new survey in the area. The Métis pressured the federal Government and sought Louis Riel in the United States to act as their leader. However, Riel had no longer the support of the clergy who accused him of mixing religion with politics. In December 1844, a petition summing up the Métis' grievances was delivered to the Secretary of State Chapleau but Macdonald rejected it.

Riel was showing more frequent signs of mental unbalance. Devoting most of his time to prayers, he broke off with the local clergy and started preaching his own theology. He gave new names to the days of the week: he declared that Saturday would be the Lord's Day, he suggested that Mgr. Bourget and Mgr. Taché should become the new pope and rejected all submission to Rome. On March 18, 1885, it was rumoured that 500 RCMP officers were proceeding towards Batoche and this set fire to the powder keg. Riel and 60 or so partisans of his took up arms. Riel announced the fall of Rome and set up a provisional government of which he was the political leader while Gabriel Dumont took charge of military operations. The first encounter took place near Duck Lake on March 26 and ended with a victory for the Métis who were in greater number than the 100 RCMP men. At the same time, the Indians were rebelling and on April 2, they killed nine people at Frog Lake, Alberta.

The Government of Canada elected to resort to force to subdue that rebellion against its authority and Major General Middleton, Commander in Chief of the Militia, was entrusted with that mission. Riel decided not to follow the advice of Dumont who was advocating guerilla warfare rather than a conventional attack in the field. On May 9, the 800 men of Middleton encountered some 200 Métis at Batoche. The fight ended with the complete defeat of the latter. Dumont took refuge in the United States, Riel gave himself up and was soon transferred to the Regina jail.

Many indications show that the Riel trial took place in the worst circumstances for him. It was first decided that the case would be tried in Winnipeg. Twelve jurors were to bring in a verdict, and there was a fair chance that half of them would be Francophones; the court would be bilingual; as a provincial judge, the Superior Court magistrate who was to preside would have had his independence guaranteed by law and current practices. However the Macdonald Cabinet ordered a change of venue to Regina. There were to be six jurors and, in all likelihood, none would be Francophone; court proceedings would be in English only and the territorial magistrate would be subject to recall at the discretion of federal authorities. According to historian Lewis Thomas, there is irrefutable evidence that the intention of Macdonald was to make Riel bear full responsibility for the drama, and have him condemned and put to death as soon as possible. Riel was entitled to what one might call "frontier justice".

[Senator Guay.]

Riel's trial began on July 29, unilingual Justice Hugh Richardson presiding. Federal Justice Deputy Minister G. W. Burbridge and Quebec's future Attorney General Tom Chase Casgrain were among the Crown prosecutors. Riel's defence was conducted by François-Xavier Lemieux and Charles Fitzpatrick, among others, who eventually had brilliant careers on the bench and in politics. Riel was accused of high treason pursuant to the provisions of an English statute dating back to 1352, a crime for which the death penalty was mandatory.

Riel pleaded not guilty, so a trial by jury was required. Only one of the 36 prospective jurors spoke French, but an accident prevented him from attending the hearing. The Crown challenged the only Catholic on the list, so Riel was judged by a jury made up exclusively of English-speaking Protestants. The main defence argument was that the accused was suffering from megalomania and was mentally ill, and that his revolt could be explained by the injustices done to the Métis. Quite plausible though it may have been, this line of defence was weakened by Riel's obstinate denial that he might be suffering from religious insanity. The jury came out with a guilty verdict on August 1, but recommended mercy. Judge Richardson sentenced him to death. Appeals to higher courts were denied.

The verdict was followed by a double flood of petitions. Indeed, the federal Cabinet could recommend that the Governor General exercise his royal prerogative and grant a pardon. Ontario insisted that Riel should pay with his life; French-Canadians from Quebec, Manitoba and Massachusetts insisted that he should be pardoned. Macdonald's francophone colleagues obtained that three physicians re-examine Riel's mental state: the two anglophone physicians felt that he was mentally fit, while their francophone counterpart felt that the accused was unable to distinguish between right and wrong in religious and political matters. The consultation remained secret. In 1886, when the department made public after the fact the subject matter of that consultation, the francophone physician's opinion was tampered with to appear to support those of his anglophone counterparts. Faced with this dilemma, the government assessed the number of seats it was likely to lose one way or the other during the forthcoming elections. Pardon was refused and Riel was hanged in Regina on November 16, 1885.

Posterity may have rehabilitated the Métis leader and the long term political consequences of his execution may have been far worse than those of a possible pardon. For Riel personally and for his community, the benefits of a posthumous rehabilitation, although welcome, would be only symbolic.

As francophones, our duty is to fight for Louis Riel's memory. His cause was our own. He felt that our community should be treated with justice in order to develop freely. The decision which the Supreme Court of Canada has rendered in the Forest case represents a victory for us and a basis for the possible extension of our rights. We should not forget that we owe this victory in part to Louis Riel, the rebellious patriot.

I should like to conclude on a personal note; I should like to add that Louis Riel's "poésies religieuses et politiques" were registered in St. Vital, Manitoba, on January 12, 1886, in accordance with the Parliament of Canada Act, by my grandfather, Abraham Guay, who was not a Métis. I urge you to read this most interesting document.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

CENTRE BLOCK—REMOVAL OF PORTRAITS OF BRITISH PRIME MINISTERS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Henry D. Hicks rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, November 6, 1985:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the removal of the portraits of former British Prime Ministers from the sixth floor of the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings.

He said: Honourable senators, on October 15 I asked a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate relating to the removal of the photographs of former British Prime Ministers from the sixth floor corridor leading to the Parliamentary Restaurant. I regret I was not in the Senate when the Leader of the Government answered that question. He answered it by pointing out that while renovations were being made to the Parliamentary Restaurant and the corridor the photographs were removed. The Parliamentary Spouses' Association, which was asked to suggest paintings for the Parliamentary Restaurant, recommended that prints of Canadian Prime Ministers be put up in the corridor in place of the photographs of the former British Prime Ministers.

I love my wife as much as any man loves his wife. I have the greatest respect for Parliamentary spouses—

Senator Frith: We know where the real power is now!

Senator Hicks: —but I do not think that that decision was any business of the Parliamentary Spouses' Association at all.

In any event—

Senator Murray: You tell them!

Senator Hicks: —the answer then goes on to say:

Plans are now being made to have prints of the Canadian Prime Ministers hung in the corridor and a suitable location for photographs of the Prime Ministers—that is, of the United Kingdom—will be found.

I thought that that row of photographs was exceedingly interesting. I thought they related to our history in a way that all of us could be proud of. I must admit that during the Trudeau years I wondered if at some time the French Canadian dominated government would decide to remove those portraits of former British Prime Ministers, even though our parliamentary system is derived from the Mother of Parliaments. It appears that our francophone Canadians had a greater understanding and appreciation of the British traditions of our Parliament than does our current Irish dominated government.

I was worried at one time that the portraits of the former British Prime Ministers would be replaced by portraits of the American Presidents, or as one former senator said to me the other day, 52 different portraits of President Reagan, but I am glad that apparently this is not going to be done.

In any event, I think that those portraits are part of our history. I do not like Canada to be placed in the same position as many of the former colonies have placed themselves. For example, I used to be a member of the Board of Governors of the University of Guyana. They thought they had achieved something great by toppling in their park a statue of Queen Victoria.

We should not try to turn our back on our heritage; we should be proud of the origins that have enabled us to create the institutions that belong to us today. That does not mean that we are, in any way, subservient to the British Crown, or to the Parliament of the United Kingdom, or anything like that. We should not turn our backs on the fact that those institutions have influenced us mightily.

I think it is a pity that those portraits have been removed. I close by quoting from that great Canadian, a Nova Scotian, Joseph Howe. This quotation was last made in this chamber by the late Senator Grattan O'Leary, and I think it applies to what I have to say today:

A wise nation preserves its records, gathers up its muniments, decorates the tombs of its illustrious dead, repairs its great public structures and ever fosters love of country and national pride by perpetual reference to the sacrifices and glories of the past.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO PERMIT TELEVISION OF ITS PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Lowell Murray, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, November 6, 1985, moved:

That the Senate do empower the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to permit televised broadcasting of its public proceedings on the subject-matter of the Bill C-79, intituled: "An Act respecting provision of compensation to depositors of Canadian Commercial Bank, CCB Mortgage Investment Corporation and Northland Bank in respect of uninsured deposits".

He said: Honourable senators, let me say at the outset that I am not and never have been an ardent advocate of the televising of the proceedings of this house or of its committees. In rising to speak to this motion, I do so, first, because my committee has adopted a motion instructing me to place its views on this matter before the Senate and, second, because, while I do not believe that the Senate or its committees need to be televised, nor does the public need to have the Senate or the Senate committees televised, I can think of no valid reason for not allowing the television cameras in if the media wish to have the television cameras there; provided always, of course, that arrangements can be made which are consistent with the proper functioning of this place, with the dignity of the institution and with the rights and responsibilities of honourable senators.

The situation before us is as follows: The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is conducting a pre-study of Bill C-79. On that matter, we have been meeting since October 9. We have had 11 meetings, heard nine witnesses, and have spent some 31 hours on the subject. The day before yesterday we were discovered by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. They asked permission to televise the proceedings for broadcasting.

I consulted the committee. The committee indicated its agreement with the proposition made by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, but it is the consensus of the committee members that this is a matter for the Senate and not for any committee to decide. There is some disagreement on that point, but, frankly, the evidence seems to me to be pretty conclusive that it is the Senate that has the right to decide whether or not to grant such permission.

I will not take honourable senators through the precedents on this matter, but I will mention the two most important ones—and perhaps the only two precedents that are really applicable. There was one in February 1975 when the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs was granted permission by the Senate to allow the televising of certain of its hearings on a particular bill; and, again, in 1980, when the Joint Committee on the Constitution sat, and it required a motion of both the Senate and the House of Commons to permit the television cameras and radio microphones to broadcast and televise the proceedings of that committee.

The committee, as I told this chamber the other day, also instructed me to satisfy myself that the ground rules, which have evolved over the years in respect of the broadcasting of parliamentary proceedings, would be respected. This I have done. I have obtained verbal and written assurances from the CBC, as well as from the Parliamentary Press Gallery, that what I may call the "spirit" of the electronic Hansard concept will be respected.

If the Senate passes this motion, it is my intention, on behalf of the committee and on behalf of the Senate, to insist that a pool arrangement be made with the interested networks so that we are not faced with a large number of cameras and crews and with a lot of paraphernalia in the committee room and in the corridors when the committee is meeting.

If these verbal and written assurances prove to be insufficient or if my confidence in the good faith of my journalistic interlocutors proves to have been misplaced, then you will hear from me and so will they.

[Senator Murray.]

I close by saying that it would be preferable for the Senate, soon, to address itself to a set of guidelines or ground rules to cover these situations so that we do not have to negotiate and renegotiate on each occasion, even if we have to come to the Senate for the basic permission to have the proceedings of a committee broadcast or televised.

With these few words, I commend this motion to honourable senators for their support.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, generally speaking, I am opposed to televising the proceedings of Parliament or even the committees of Parliament. I certainly am opposed to the motion contained in Order No. 11 on our order paper, which we stood today, which would, perhaps, lead to a general authorization of televising the proceedings of the Senate and its committees.

Perhaps it is not a bad idea, however, to let this one committee, in this one specific circumstance, try out the procedure of televising. I do not think I want to say any more about it, but I would ask, if the motion is adopted, that it be recorded that it is adopted on division.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Kelly:—harkening to one of my colleagues close by, he did announce that the applause meter did not go up too high.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Kelly: My position is well known, but I will try to explain it in a little more detail.

My reasons for pushing, certainly, some further discussion on this motion are simple. At the outset, honourable senators, I want to make it very clear that I do not have any argument with the rights of the general public to have full and complete opportunity to hear and to see the performance of the government and to hear discussions surrounding government decisions, important decisions on current issues such as the CCB and the Northland Bank, which are now before the committee in question, the committee into which it is being suggested we permit television cameras.

Senator Hicks has suggested that we should try an experiment. I believe, however, that on these particular issues, a great deal of coverage is already available. We are rotating witnesses through the House of Commons committee, the Estey Commission and the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Senator Frith: Are they televised?

Senator Kelly: The Estey Commission is, yes. I am not sure whether or not the Commons committee is. However, my point is that to add an additional opportunity really adds nothing that is not already there. The issue to me is not particularly: Do people have the right to see or not to see these things? It is very important that that be understood.

● (1600)

However, I want to deal for a moment with the question of this chamber, and particularly with a committee of this chamber, and most particularly the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. This particular committee has developed, and quite deservedly developed, over the years a reputation of the highest order, as a forum where deliberations were carried on, in my opinion, in the best traditions of the Senate, virtually without partisanship—I believe that is very important—where sound and thoughtful discussion took place with total objectivity. Witnesses knew that while they would be examined closely and listened to, they would not be used as ham for political sandwiches. I think that has been an important element and has imparted great strength to the work of that committee. As a result, that committee, over its term, has had no difficulty in obtaining the appearance of the best people available to help shed light on the issues of the day. It was considered an honour to be invited to appear before the committee, and, as a result, the committee has a long history of excellent reports and good advice to government.

In recent times, in my opinion, this has changed. Performance has become, in my opinion, increasingly partisan, and I feel, as a result, that the currency of this committee has eroded in the process, to the point where I dare to predict that in the not too far distant future, if this trend continues, witnesses will appear before that committee only in response to subpoenas. That may be all right, but I think that this particular committee would lose a great deal if that should occur.

It has been suggested that there is a crisis of confidence in our banking system, due to the recent failure of two banks. I think that is perhaps true. But I believe that this is due in no small part to the way in which politics have so heavily entered into the mix as an analysis is made, and efforts are made, to determine what happened, why it happened, and what is being suggested. We have had a reference on Bill C-79. Today Bill C-79 was finally mentioned by name: we have heard 11 witnesses, and held many meetings.

We have not yet really got to the core of what the committee was to do, notwithstanding that the committee was free to range far and wide to try to inform itself on how these things occurred. I do not deny that. But I am suggesting that the heavy pall of the political atmosphere is inevitable in the other place. It is the nature of the other place. But I am not sure that it needs to be as much the nature of this place as it has become, or of the nature of that committee as it has become. Certainly the play by the media—and sadly I would mention this chamber—has added to the erosion of confidence in a banking system which, in fact, is the envy of the whole world, notwithstanding two bank failures.

Honourable senators, on the motion to permit television cameras in this particular committee session, I believe that we have to ask ourselves one simple question: Will the presence of television cameras assist this committee in its work on this particular issue? Will witnesses be more forthcoming? Will questions be more searching? For my part, I cannot think of a way of answering “Yes” to any of those questions. On the negative, I believe the question we have to ask is: Will this stimulate further momentum to the playing of partisan games, and therefore greater erosion of the public confidence in our banking system? To that I say “Yes”.

Honourable senators, I believe that it is time that we took a stand on what we are here to do, and on the most appropriate way, in our opinion, for us to do our job most effectively. Therefore I urge a vote against the presence of cameras at the meetings of the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, as a general rule I am ferociously opposed to televising our deliberations in the Senate. It must be understood that if this motion is passed, it will not create a precedent, because the deliberations of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs were televised back in the late 1970s when the committee was discussing the problem of the drug cannabis.

Because of the importance of the matter that is to be discussed by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, and because of the fact that a request was made by the CBC to televise the deliberations, I see absolutely no objection to the committee's proceedings being televised; and I am going to vote in favour of the motion. However, I must say that I disagree with my friend, Senator Kelly, when he said that politics may be injected into that committee. I do not believe so. I think that the members of that committee, be they Liberal or Conservative, are sufficiently mature that they will dig into the facts in a very able and capable way without allowing political matters to diminish the quality of the discussions. As a matter of policy, I am opposed to television in this house, but I believe that our work is done in committee, and that should be televised if the media wishes to televise those deliberations.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a couple of points on this motion. I believe that we should support the motion. On the question of the precedent, and whether the Senate or the committee should make the decision, I believe, in the first instance, that the precedents are strong that it should be decided by the Senate—and, in a sense, that is academic, because I believe it is desirable that that be done.

I agree with Senator Robichaud that it should not create a precedent—and I do not believe it does. It is following the precedents already set that require confirmation and approval by the Senate before it is done. In other words, it does not create a precedent leading, or relating to, or in any way influencing the disposition of the order to which Senator Hicks referred, and which is of more general application.

I believe that the chairman of the committee has quite properly insisted that the chairman of the committee and the steering committee should have complete control over the mechanics and, as he called them, the ground rules.

My second last point is to underline the fact that we are dealing here only with authority for a committee to televise proceedings relating to a particular matter before it, namely, Bill C-79. For that to have any meaning, we must deal with it today, because the proceedings on the pre-study of Bill C-79, according to present schedules, will probably finish within the next two weeks. Since the motion was introduced—and leave was not yet granted—two witnesses have appeared; but, of course, those proceedings were not televised.

In general, I would like to comment that I believe, with Senator Robichaud, that when we consider how often we complain that the Senate is ignored, that its work is not appreciated—and those occasions underline how proud we are of the work that our committees do—and when we consider the work that this committee is doing and the detail and professional interest being shown in the matter before it—namely, the pre-study of Bill C-79—then I believe that we will be very pleased with the results; and that we will increase the awareness of the public of the good work done by the Senate, particularly if its future proceedings continue as well as they have proceeded to date. For those reasons, I think that we ought to support this motion. Certainly, if the proceedings of the Estey inquiry are appropriately televised because they deal with matters of public concern, then the proceedings of a Senate committee can also be televised. The main reason for my support of the motion is that I think it would be a great opportunity to show the good work the Senate does in its committees.

● (1610)

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, speaking as a person with some years of television experience, there is little I can say that will assuage any fears or apprehensions honourable senators might have with respect to this motion, which I assume will be agreed to. I think that Senator Hicks and Senator Robichaud put their fingers on it when they said that, after all, it is a test. I do not think that, in the normal course, many people would line up to pay a lot of money for the rights to televise hearings in this chamber or in Senate committees. The matter before the committee is one which has apparently seized the public interest. For that reason, the networks want to televise the hearings.

I disagree with my honourable colleague, Senator Kelly. I realize that in the other place public interest centres only around the theatrics that go on there between 2 o'clock and 3 o'clock in the afternoon, which really are an exercise in agility and point scoring. There is no public interest in the routine business of the house, nor is there any interest in the committees of the other place. Honourable senators, this is a special occasion. I hope that we will agree to the motion.

I pray that this motion will not suddenly cause us to break out in some exercise of posturing, partisanship or any nonsense of that sort. I also hope that the chairman of the committee will not impose upon its members any restrictions, in terms of time allowed for questioning, other than what is necessary to ensure that the meetings run smoothly. In other words, let the television cameras reflect exactly what goes on. Obviously, this footage will be used in some documentary they are preparing, and I say that that is great. We have talked about it long enough—let's give it a test.

[Senator Frith.]

Hon. Jean Le Moyné: If I may be permitted, honourable senators, I will ask a question of Senator Murray. Is this motion good for one occasion only?

Senator Murray: The motion is that we would permit television coverage of the proceedings of the committee while it is studying Bill C-79. As it happens, we have but one witness left to hear on that reference.

Senator Le Moyné: Is the chairman not afraid that he will be creating a star witness where none is needed?

Senator Murray: The witness in question is the Minister of State (Finance), who would be a star witness with or without television.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: I have a question for Senator Murray. Could he give us the assurance that this measure will not result in any expense to the Senate and that all costs will be paid by the television channels concerned?

Senator Murray: As far as I know, no expenses will be incurred by the Senate as a result of this measure. I will check, but I am almost certain the Senate will not pay anything.

Motion agreed to, on division.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, to facilitate the discussion of the adjournment motion, Senator Frith was going to do some research on precedents that have been set by the Senate respecting recesses. After hearing from him, we will see whether we can safely take that extra week without running afoul of public opinion.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, research in this regard was not as easy as I had thought it would be. I will present what I have been able to turn up.

The House of Commons changed its standing orders about recesses in December of 1982. Therefore, the first operative year, according to that plan, was 1983. In 1983, the Senate recessed from February 17 to March 1, some 12 days. I could find no data on the recess taken by the House of Commons. The Easter recess that year was from March 30 to April 19, which is some 20 days, and, according to my best information, it was one week longer than the recess taken at that time by the House of Commons. The autumn, 1983 recess of the Senate was from November 3 to November 14. That recess was of 11 days' duration, but that month Parliament prorogued on November 30, and since that prorogation might have had some sort of effect on the recess, that is not a particularly good example.

The first Senate adjournment in 1984 was part of the Christmas recess, which was taken from December 21, 1983, to January 16, 1984. The Senate recessed for four weeks that year, while the House of Commons recessed for three weeks. The Easter 1984 recess was from April 17 to May 8, one of three weeks' duration. My information is that the House of Commons recessed for 10 days. In the autumn of 1984, the general election had been called. Parliament opened on November 5, so the practice that year would not really be relevant to our discussion.

The first recess in 1985 was that following Christmas of last year and was from December 20, 1984, to January 22, 1985. I believe that the House of Commons returned on January 14. Again, the Senate adjourned for an extra week. In February of this year, there was another anomaly because we were dealing with Bill C-11. My notes indicate that we adjourned for only a few days.

Senator Roblin: We met during the time the House of Commons was on vacation.

Senator Frith: That is correct; that is exactly what my notes indicate. We may have adjourned for one day longer than we normally would have. In April of this year, the adjournment was from the 4th to the 21st, a recess of 17 days. I believe that the recess of the House of Commons was for 12 days. I cannot give uniform evidence of the Senate's adjourning for one week longer than the House of Commons, but, from the information I have gathered, it seems that there is good precedent for it.

For that reason, honourable senators, I ask that the Leader and the Deputy Leader of the Government consider amending the motion, to provide for our return on November 26. It seems to me that in the absence of any particular reason for our return, we would be following a trend, a reasonably well documented tradition, by taking that extra week. I say this anticipating that the House of Commons will not have any additional bills for us.

● (1620)

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I was hoping that Senator Frith would be able to give us the history of the Remembrance Day recess and whether we adjourned for one or two weeks in the past.

Senator Frith: It happened by a fluke; there were times when there were special circumstances.

Senator Doody: With that in mind, I think that we should perhaps take that extra week, but keeping in mind that we have three bills before us now and with the extra week that we take it will give the House of Commons, in all probability, time to send us more legislation. I would like to think that we would deal with that quite expeditiously when we resume. The legislation on the order paper now is not of any great consequence and I feel that we can deal with it fairly quickly. I would like to think that the same would be true of some other bills that might come to us. I have no objection to having that extra week under these conditions. Also, there is the condition that the committee work go ahead as we had planned.

I always worry that the longer the adjournment the more temptation there is for honourable senators to go elsewhere and perhaps attendance at committees would not be as great as it would be if we took a shorter adjournment, but I have no evidence to support that, and I hope that I am wrong. I would very much regret it if the committee work were to be neglected, because the attendance has been absolutely tremendous during this particular session and I would like to see it continue that way.

If Senator Frith cares to comment on what I have just said, we can probably make the amendment as necessary.

Senator Frith: I see nothing in the legislation before us or the anticipated legislation of the non-controversial type that will cause any difficulty for us in the chamber. Certainly Bill C-64, which deals with plant breeders' rights, can be referred to committee, so I do not see any difficulty with that one. I can give you assurance that insofar as I am aware and in light of the reports I have had, and the advice I have received from those on our side who are responsible for these bills, I do not see any difficulty in processing them expeditiously here.

We must remember also that we are always subject to recall by the Speaker if, in his opinion, it is in the public interest that we return.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to add a cautionary word to the observations made by the Deputy Leader of the Government. In the week that we might be absent there might be some financial bills cleared in the other place. While I am not attempting to impose any absolute conditions in respect of those matters because I do not think that that would be appropriate, I would like the honourable gentlemen opposite to reflect on the fact that if we do get such bills from the House of Commons during the week we are not here, we would like to make sure that they will be dealt with expeditiously when we return. I assume there would be no substantial difficulty in that matter.

Senator Frith: I do not know about the specific bills, but insofar as I am aware there would not be any reason to anticipate anything but our usual co-operative approach to that legislation.

Senator Roblin: Last year I remember a bill called Bill C-11 which was proceeded with in a way which caught me by surprise, I must confess. That is a lesson that I have not forgotten, so I want to be clear about my expectation that financial bills will receive due consideration. I am not interested in pushing things through without due consideration, but we should be careful to respect the expectations of the other house that we would deal with these measures with reasonable diligence and expedition.

Senator Frith: I think that the Leader of the Government is quite right in underlining the fact that it is our duty, as a general rule, to give special attention to money bills and financial bills. I believe that they are an exception to the general rule and should be treated accordingly. I think we have to remember, in looking at the history of our dealing with those bills in the chamber, that Bill C-11 was an exception to our usual experience.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion for adjournment amended to read "26th November, 1985" instead of "19th November, 1985," at two o'clock in the afternoon?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, November 26, 1985 at 2 p.m.

OFFICIAL REPORT

CORRECTION—QUALITY OF TRANSLATION

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order regarding the official report, Debates of the Senate, of Thursday, November 7 last.

At that time I delivered a speech commemorating the 100th Anniversary, on November 16, 1985, of the hanging of Louis Riel. I chose to deliver my speech on November 7, as the following week the House of Commons and the Senate were not scheduled to sit.

The most important point I wish to raise is the fact that Debates of the Senate of November 7, 1985, referred to me as "Louis-Philippe" Guay, which is an intolerable mistake, especially in light of repercussions that I experienced in my own area. Also, the question was raised by many people as to what type of qualifications a translator has and the salary a translator receives.

After being in the Senate for seven and a half years you would think that those responsible would, at least, know my name. The same typographical error was evident in the English translation. I should also like to mention that the translation is very poor. Rather than citing examples, I refer honourable senators to pages 1486, 1487 and 1488 of Debates of the Senate of that day.

Honourable senators, I have no alternative but to bring this matter to the attention of this chamber, and I would request that this matter be pursued by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration and also that it be referred to the Commissioner of Official Languages to determine and establish the appropriate ways and means of avoiding such intolerable mistakes in the future. To those affected and responsible for the final printing of Debates of the Senate I must honestly say that they are lacking—and lacking very badly—in efficiency; otherwise, with a proper revision of the translation before it is sent to the printer, no such mistake would have resulted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, I shall bring this matter to the attention of the committee.

MARRIAGE (PROHIBITED DEGREES) BILL

REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Joan Neiman, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Tuesday, November 26, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

SIXTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill S-2, intituled: "An Act to amend and consolidate the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, December 19, 1984, examined the said Bill and has agreed to report it with five amendments:

1. Page 1, subclause 2(1): Strike out line 7 and substitute the following:
"related by consanguinity, affinity or adoption are not"
2. Page 1, subclause 2(2): Strike out lines 11 to 14 and substitute the following:
"if they are related
(a) lineally by consanguinity or adoption,
(b) as brother and sister by consanguinity, whether by the whole blood or by the half-blood, or
(c) as brother and sister by adoption."
3. Page 1, subclause 3(1): Strike out line 17 and substitute the following:
"guinity, affinity or adoption is not invalid by reason"
4. Page 1, subclause 3(2): Strike out line 21 and substitute the following:
"2(2)(a), (b) or (c) is void".
5. Page 1, clause 3: Add immediately after line 21, the following subclause:
"(3) Subsection (2) does not affect the validity of a marriage entered into prior to the coming into force of this Act by persons who are related in the manner described in paragraph 2(2)(c)."

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN B. NEIMAN,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall the report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Neiman, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

SEIZURE OF EGYPTIAN AIRCRAFT

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

All Canadians and the whole of the free world was shocked by the tragic events at Malta on Saturday and Sunday last.

In light of the fact that this act of terrorism was perpetrated by fundamentalist terrorists, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform us as to the action that is being taken to protect Canadians and Canadian airports against this new type of terrorism?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, at the time of the Air India disaster measures were taken by the Department of Transport to review security operations at Canadian airports with a view to seeing how they could be strengthened and improved. I have no word at the moment as to the findings of that study. My honourable friend's point is well taken, and I will find out for him what I can about what is proposed.

Senator Sinclair: A supplementary question. In view of the fact that this act of terrorism took place in the Mediterranean area, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform us as to the basis on which the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Joe Clark, came to the conclusion that the action taken by the Egyptian commando force was the correct one?

Senator Roblin: I am afraid I shall have to let the Secretary of State for External Affairs speak for himself. I am not aware of the considerations he had in mind in making that decision. I think it fair to observe that it is the policy of this government that we should take concrete steps to deal with terrorism in a way which offers the best prospect of reducing it if not eliminating it. The fact that some of these efforts may have led to a deplorable loss of human life does not mean that we are not under some obligation to pursue those means. It was in 1976, I believe, that the same government, the Egyptian government, dealt with another hijacking incident very successfully. So there were some grounds to think that they were able to handle the situation.

I think that I would approach the matter on the basis of principle. The question to be answered is: What does one do about terrorism? I think the answer is that one does whatever is necessary to discourage it.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, the fact of the matter is that because of the action taken, about 60 per cent of the people on the aircraft were killed. My question is: If it can be properly described as being the best decision that could be taken, or—and here I quote: “It was based on the best information available in the circumstances”—what kind of evidence does this refer to? What is this evidence? Surely before the minister made a statement like that, he had some evidence that negotiations were not the way to go—and apparently an all-out attack, without proper backup, was undertaken.

Senator Roblin: I do not really see the point of my honourable friend's question on an event that took place in another country, under the auspices of another government. The point he seems to be making is that he wishes to complain about an opinion that one of our ministers has expressed with respect to the matter.

Senator Frith: He is not complaining. He is asking for the basis for the decision.

Senator Roblin: The plain fact is that several governments in the world, including ours, felt that this was the best course that could be followed in the circumstances; and when one considers the circumstances—at nightfall, on a foreign aerodrome, with five terrorists inside an aircraft—how can anyone sitting here do anything more than pass a general opinion as to what course is best to be followed? We had no effect on it; it was nothing to do with us; we did not order it, and I do not see why my honourable friend is so critical of an opinion expressed by the minister. If he does not like the minister's opinion, that is his privilege.

Senator Frith: That's not what he is saying. Listen to him.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, my criticism, if it is so described, is merely expressed in an effort to search for the facts that led the minister to say that the Egyptians took the best decision they could, or that it was based “on the best information available in the circumstances.” Given that that is the situation, if a similar situation were to occur in Canada, could we expect that similar action would be taken?

Senator Roblin: I do not think that my honourable friend can draw that conclusion.

Senator Sinclair: Would the Leader of the Government try to ascertain for us what kind of information was available to the government, if any?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am quite willing to let the minister's opinion stand on its own two feet.

Senator Frith: That is not what he is asking.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether the federal government has offered the bereaved Canadian family any assistance to bring the bodies home to Canada.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I thank my honourable friend for that question, because it is a very humane one. I will try to find a specific answer to it. My opinion, judging from what I have heard so far, is that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been in touch with the family and I believe he has offered the good offices of the government insofar as they would be useful to them. Concerning the specific point that my honourable friend speaks about, I will try to find the answer.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I realize that the Leader of the Government has dismissed the possibility of a similar situation ever happening in Canada—

Senator Walker: He did not say that at all.

Senator Flynn: Come on!

Senator Stewart: If, then, there is the possibility of such a situation developing in Canada, has the government established rules or guidelines, together with a suitable task force, for dealing with a similar or somewhat similar situation?

• (1420)

Senator Roblin: I should like to correct my honourable friend. I made no assumptions as to whether or not such an incident could occur in Canada. Obviously, it could and, obviously, there are plans to deal with it, and I shall advise my honourable friend.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on the same subject, yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs made the point that Canada was pursuing other concrete measures to combat terrorism. I am delighted that there are other concrete measures, but would the minister tell us precisely what those other concrete measures are that are being put forward by the Government of Canada?

Senator Roblin: I shall inquire into that matter. I shall also express the reservation that it would probably not be advisable to give the publicity of the kind that a full statement to this house would provide to some of the measures the government might wish to take. However, to the extent that the information is available to the public, I shall make inquiries about it.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. Could he inquire as to whether the Canadian Armed Forces has the kind of personnel with the training and capacity to handle such a situation, if it should arise in Canada?

Senator Roblin: The Canadian Armed Forces has a very considerable military capacity. I am searching my mind for the right phrase to describe the organization that handles such activities which involve a commando type operation. We do have a commando force type of operation, and I am quite sure that they have contingency plans in place to deal with the possibility of a hijacking at a Canadian airport. The honourable senator has asked a question which is basically the same as that asked by the Leader of the Opposition, and I shall deal with it in the same way.

FINANCE

MEETINGS WITH DEPUTY MINISTER—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have a question on a different subject, if I may.

Senator Flynn: Good!

Senator Sinclair: I happen to think that no terrorist act is ever good, whether it is done in this country or elsewhere, Senator Flynn.

Last week a rather unusual occurrence took place in the city of Montreal. A man known to many by the name of David Angus held a dinner party. That is not unusual. What is unusual is that the reason for the dinner was to meet the Deputy Minister of Finance. Those of you who are not familiar with Montreal might not know who David Angus is, so I shall tell you.

Senator MacEachen: Please do.

Senator Sinclair: He is the main bagman for the Conservative Party.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Frith: It must be a case of mistaken identity.

Senator Flynn: Terrible!

Senator Perrault: That is shocking!

Senator Sinclair: My question is this—

Senator Flynn: You are very well known there, too.

Senator Stewart: They think it is a joke.

Senator Sinclair: Is there going to be a change of policy by this government, whereby instead of meeting the Deputy Minister of Finance in his office, you will meet him at dinners to which you receive the invitation from a man known as the—I guess “bagman” is a bad phrase—shall I say the person who assists the Tory Party in the political process—let me put it that way. I would like to know if the deputy minister is now going to attend that meeting in those circumstances.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend need not be a bit shy about using the term “bagman.” After all, there are a number of them in this house.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Frith: So Mr. Angus is coming here! The leak is out—Angus is coming!

Senator Roblin: For all I know, David Angus may be looking for a summons. I do not know on what grounds my honourable friend who has asked the question was summoned to the Senate.

Senator Perrault: Sheer ability.

Senator Roblin: I have no information about that.

Senator Flynn: We know now from the way he behaves.

Senator Roblin: I can only speak for myself, and I know why I am here.

Senator Doody: Raw talent.

Senator Roblin: However, I have to tell my honourable friend that there is no change in government policy. I am sure the government will continue to seek the advice of knowledgeable Canadians in every walk of life, of every political stripe and in various parts of Canada, no matter whether or not they voted Conservative.

Senator Sinclair: Perhaps the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate could assist me in this: If Senator Leo Kolber extended an invitation to meet with the Deputy Minister of Finance in Ontario, would the deputy minister be available? I understand that he would need to have more than 35 people.

Senator Roblin: Not only the deputy minister but the Premier of Ontario, I think, would be available.

Senator Sinclair: That does not matter, with all due respect.

Senator Roblin: It seems to me that it is not unusual for leading figures in political life to have consultations with people on various subjects. I think it is going a bit too far to read into that meeting some malevolent or improper activity. I reject that idea right out of hand.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I can well understand, and it is a well known fact, that leading political figures have off-the-record meetings with business people and so on. That has been going on since time immemorial. However, this is the first time I have ever heard of a deputy minister being referred to as a political person.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps if we amend the rules of the House of Commons in the way in which Mr. McGrath would have us do, they will be political persons.

The point I want to make, however, is that I have no knowledge of this particular meeting. I know nothing about it. I want to make that perfectly clear. It has not been unheard of, in the past, for deputy ministers to meet with people on various matters, nor is it unheard of in the case of Deputy Ministers of Finance. They meet in this town regularly with all kinds of people who come to call on them to discuss public matters. Why they cannot do so at a dinner in Montreal escapes me. My honourable friend, I think, is attempting to imply that there was something improper about this meeting. He is trying to say that these men were either attempting to influence the deputy minister or else were hoping that they might hear something from him that they would not hear in the ordinary course of business and in the normal course of public communication, and I reject that out of hand.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I am afraid the honourable leader in the Senate is not listening very carefully.

Senator Frith: That is nothing new.

Senator Flynn: I, myself, have been trying to listen.

Senator Sinclair: I will say it again, then, Senator Flynn.

It is certainly correct that people meet with the Deputy Minister of Finance, and with other deputy ministers, but the proper place to do that, and the usual place to do it, is in the office of that deputy minister. It is not proper to meet at dinners to which the invitation comes from a person who, to the knowledge of the community, is a person who collects money on behalf of a political party. That is my point.

Senator Flynn: Thank you for the advice.

Senator Frith: You are welcome. You finally got it.

Senator Roblin: I am sorry I did not get the full import of my friend's last remark, but he knows perfectly well that Mr. Angus and Mr. Hartt are not exactly strangers; they have been practising law together in Montreal for some time and I really do not find it all that strange that they should meet together with other people to discuss matters of common interest. I say to my honourable friend that if it is improper to do that kind of thing, we in political life are certainly going to limit ourselves a great deal as to who we can talk to.

I say to my honourable friend that you cannot disassociate a deputy minister from his minister because they form two parts of one operation. I say to him that I would not find it something that I would like to complain about at any length.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, it may be very interesting that Mr. Hartt and Mr. Angus once practised law together. However, Mr. Hartt has changed his vocation. He is no longer a mere practising lawyer; he is now a deputy minister. He is no longer a political figure.

Senator Roblin: But I think he is. If my honourable friend is alleging something improper, let him say so.

Senator Sinclair: I am not alleging anything improper on the part of the deputy minister except, honourable senators, for the fact of allowing a person who is known throughout the community as a bagman—and I will use the phrase the Leader of the Government wishes me to use—to extend the invitations to that meeting. That is what I am complaining about. Perhaps it is because he could not get anybody else to extend those invitations. Is that what my honourable friend is trying to suggest?

Senator Flynn: Rubbish!

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend may make his own suggestions but he must not impute anything to me.

Senator Flynn: Rubbish!

• (1430)

Senator Frith: Ah, that's the sign when you can't call it anything but that.

Senator Flynn: You know better!

Senator Frith: There is no better explanation than that.

Senator Flynn: I have heard from you too often.

Senator Frith: Welcome back.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order! Order!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has said there has been no change in policy. He has found nothing irregular in this situation where the Deputy Minister of Finance appears at a private meeting organized by the chief fund raiser of the Conservative Party.

Senator Frith: Shame!

Senator MacEachen: Is the Deputy Minister of Finance generally available to participate in fund-raising activities of other political parties? For example, I intend to address a fund-raising event in northern Cape Breton on Friday night and—

Senator Perrault: The deputy minister will be there.

Senator MacEachen: Would the Deputy Minister of Finance accompany me to have a private session with the businessmen of Chéticamp under the auspices of the chief fund raiser in that district for the Liberal Party?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Roblin: I have learned when answering questions raised by my honourable friend to examine the premise carefully.

Senator Frith: And not to answer it.

Senator Roblin: The premise of his question today is that this was a fund-raising dinner that the deputy minister attended. That has been denied by all concerned, so I do not think the point is one that needs any further response from me.

Senator MacEachen: I must say that the Leader of the Government has added a number of traits to his character in his performance in the chamber but I never thought he could be so naive as his response would indicate. I think all of us know what was happening, and the honourable leader ought to say it should not happen again because it compromises the office of the Deputy Minister of Finance.

Senator Roblin: I may be naive but I am not willing to impute motives to others for which I have no warrant.

Senator MacEachen: I just want to add that no motives have been imputed—none whatsoever.

Senator Flynn: Oh! Oh!

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government has made the astonishing admission this afternoon that he sees nothing irregular in the chief fund raiser of the Tory Party hosting a private dinner for businessmen in Montreal to which has been invited the Deputy Minister of Finance. That is fine. The leader says it is fine, but I do not think it is fine.

Senator Roblin: I am glad to know that no imputations are being made in this discussion. If I were the chief fund raiser of the Progressive Conservative Party in Montreal, I certainly would not invite this gentleman a second time.

Senator MacEachen: So you have concluded it is irregular.

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate to whom I have given partial notice pertaining to the efficient and timely operation and functioning of the National Parole Board. As the government leader knows, we have a bill before the House of Commons at the present time, which will be coming to this chamber in due course, to increase the membership of that board from 26 to 36, but I draw the attention of the government leader to the fact—

Senator Frith: Don't tell me there are a few Tories left who still don't have an appointment!

Senator Hastings: —that the need for these additional ten members, which is about a 50 per cent increase in the National Parole Board, does not seem authentic or necessary when one considers that there are three vacancies on that board at the present time which the government seems incapable of filling. One vacancy on the prairies has been in existence for a year; one vacancy in the maritimes has been in existence for five months; and one vacancy in the B.C. area has been in existence for five or six months.

In addition, there are 22 vacancies with respect to temporary board members and there are six vacancies with respect to community members. I fail to understand why you have to increase the membership of the board by ten when you cannot fill the existing vacancies.

This board is called upon to render very important decisions respecting both the offender and the public. It is overworked at the present time because of court decisions. It has to render approximately 15,000 decisions a year. I appeal to the Leader of the Government to consult with the Solicitor General and do what he can to see that these vacancies are filled before asking Parliament to provide another ten vacancies for the government.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend's appeal does not fall on deaf ears.

Senator Perrault: The war on unemployment continues.

Senator Hastings: While the Leader of the Government is discussing the matter with the Solicitor General, he might draw to his attention the need for experienced people on these boards. I make that remark in light of an observation by the chairman of the board to the committee in the other place when he said that it becomes particularly important that those persons who come to the board, some of them without a great deal of previous experience, should have the opportunity to be trained and experienced. In light of the decisions of the board I respectfully submit to the government leader that this should not be on-the-job training. This board is called upon to make very important decisions. There are many experienced people in the corrections sector of this country who could adequately fill the vacancies. My appeal to the Leader of the Government is to abandon the sordid patronage performance of this government when it comes to filling these vacancies and seek out experienced people in the corrections division of this government, in the parole board, in the parole sector and in the voluntary sector of corrections. These many experienced people would not need to go to the board to become trained and experienced.

Senator Roblin: I appreciate my honourable friend's sentiments but the government will have to reserve the right to appoint those people who, in its opinion, are well qualified to do the job. It would be easy for me to say that most of the people in this house are here because of the patronage principle so it cannot be all that bad, but I have to tell my honourable friend that we will do our best to get good people for the job although I do not suppose that will please him entirely.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to ask another one of my continuing questions of the Leader of the Government in the Senate about the possibility of an announcement by the government immediately regarding the drought assistance program.

As the Leader of the Government knows, the issue has been before the country for more than four months. The federal government is not showing leadership. Instead it is adopting a very weak position. Now we have provinces coming forward with their own programs and today the Saskatchewan legislature—as Senator Barootes is aware—is meeting and they have come forward with a mammoth, province-wide program of loans available to every single farmer in Saskatchewan, as I understand it, rich, poor, big crops, little crops or no crops. I do not know if it takes in lawyers and city dwellers but in the legislation that is being brought down—

Senator Barootes: Great government!

Senator Argue: —there is nothing for the people who suffered the drought. Those people are being offered a loan. What they want in their time of need is money from the government without strings attached. When is the federal government going to take action?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thought for a moment that my honourable friend was going to say something nice about the Government of Saskatchewan.

Senator Steuart: People in northeast Regina didn't.

Senator Roblin: That's right. They did not say anything nice about the Liberal Party either.

Senator Steuart: It went up 300 per cent.

● (1440)

Senator Roblin: Three hundred per cent of nothing is still nothing very much.

Senator Steuart: That is right, but you guys are on the way out.

Senator Roblin: We are not gone yet.

Senator Steuart: But you will be.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend had better not hold his breath because he will have to wait until there is an election there, and the people will decide. Neither he nor I will decide that election.

In answer to my honourable friend's question, I must say to him that the Government of Canada is not taking a weak position on the matter. We have made a proposal on this subject; it has been before the provinces concerned now for several weeks; and we are hoping that they will be able to find a meeting of minds on this subject.

It is simply our view that in the field of agriculture where there is a shared constitutional responsibility, we have to go as far as we possibly can in order to get an agreed policy on the matter. Our policy is clear. We have the proposals ready, and they are before them, but we are compelled to do everything we can to make sure there is a meeting of minds between the federal government and the provinces in respect of this matter.

I, for one, would not recommend charging in with a policy which is seriously objectionable to the provinces, no matter who is in office or where they are. It is necessary to do our best to find a meeting of minds, and that is what we are trying to do.

Senator Argue: There is an inference that what the Government of Saskatchewan is doing will meet the situation.

However, the producers in the drought area have asked for a cash payment of $50 per acre. Now they are being offered almost that amount but as a loan, repayable at 6 per cent, and that is not an answer.

The federal government's proposals in this regard have been publicized for almost four months, but there has been no action. What provinces are holding this up? Can the Leader of the Government tell us that? The rumour is that Manitoba and British Columbia are holding this matter up, and I should like to know if that is correct.

I put it to the minister that if we had strong leadership in the federal government there would be a program in place now.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: It is weak and ineffective.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has been in public life long enough to know that if he wants to know the position of the provinces, he should ask them; he is certainly not going to hear it from me.

I should also like to tell him that the move made by the Province of Saskatchewan does not deal with the question of drought relief which we have been talking about; that is another program entirely.

Our policy is still in place and we are still prepared to proceed with it at the earliest moment we can get the consent of the provinces.

Senator Argue: No co-operative federalism.

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—1983 STABILIZATION PAYMENT

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to follow on Senator Argue's question with a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate regarding the field of agriculture and, particularly, the federal sphere of agriculture.

After a two-week break, can he report on any progress with the 1983 stabilization payment on sugar-beets?

Senator Roblin: I am sorry, honourable senators; I have no further information on that point. I do not believe the question has been advanced as far as I would like to see it.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

GOVERNMENT OF QUEBEC—ATTITUDE TO SOVEREIGNTY

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have another question on a different matter. It has to do with a statement made in Toronto by the Prime Minister in which he told a group of business people at an open dinner attended by many to raise funds for the Tory Party, that those business people had no need to fear the Pierre-Marc Johnson government in Quebec.

I now find that Pierre-Marc Johnson, the Premier of Quebec, is reported as having said that he will not hold a referendum on sovereignty within five years. He then went on to say that he believes that Quebec will one day decide democratically to become sovereign.

Honourable senators, having been a resident of Quebec for many years—

Senator Flynn: Why did you leave?

Senator Sinclair: Because of the Péquistes, along with a lot of other people.

Senator Flynn: Are you going to go back?

Senator Sinclair: Many other people left for the same reason.

I want to know, in light of that statement by Pierre-Marc Johnson, whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate believes that people should have some fear of that government in Quebec.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): If my honourable friend wants to take part in a Quebec election campaign, then let him go there.

I believe that if we were asked about it, we would say that the people of Canada or the people of Quebec have nothing to fear from either Mr. Johnson or Mr. Bourassa. They are both well-motivated public men and will do what the electorate of their province will instruct them to do.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, it may very well be that my honourable friend does not want to answer my question. I asked him whether he felt that a person who believes that one day Quebec will become sovereign is a person to fear.

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend must learn the rules of the house. He should not ask me to express a personal opinion on a matter of this kind. I may have my personal opinion, but I am certainly not going to express it as the view of the Government of Canada.

We have been remarkably successful in the short time we have been in office in bringing Quebec back within the circle of Canadian provinces.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: We have done what, for 14 years, my honourable friends could not do and, particularly, the gentleman sitting there who had a great deal to say about it in those days. They never brought Quebec back into the circle of the Canadian provinces, and he left.

Senator Steuart: What are you talking about? We won the referendum. You guys were hiding under a bush.

Senator Flynn: You don't know what you are talking about.

Senator Steuart: We won the referendum.

Senator Roblin: Very good, and I give you credit for that. I take nothing away from the policy on the referendum. I am saying that we have brought Quebec part way back into the circle of the Canadian provinces.

Furthermore, I say that with any kind of luck at all, we will be able to develop the constitutional accord with that province that my honourable friends opposite were not able to bring about.

Sit down; I am not through!

Senator Steuart: You sit down.

Senator Roblin: I will not sit down; I am on my feet. You raised this point, not me.

Senator Sinclair: You do not know how to answer.

Senator Roblin: You do not know how to ask a question. My honourable friend does not know the first thing about parliamentary procedure. Perhaps he should ask his friend sitting next to him, because he knows something about it.

I am not going to prolong this interchange with my honourable friend because I have made my point.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate has had a lot to say about Quebec, but the fact is that what brought Quebec into Canada was the view of the people of Quebec and that of the people of Canada, not the Péquistes. They have always been for sovereignty. They still are, and their leader has said so. If my friend believes that is not something to fear, I am very much surprised.

Senator Roblin: I have the same confidence in the good sense of the people of Quebec as does my honourable friend.

They will stay within our confederation regardless of any transient opinion which might be expressed.

Senator Sinclair: Including that of the Prime Minister?

Senator Frith: A well-chosen adjective, I must say.

Senator Flynn: A very low blow. Undistinguished. Rubbish.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no delayed answers, but, in order to return the chamber to its usual calm and equable frame of mind, I can say that I will have some answers tomorrow.

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

SEIZURE OF EGYPTIAN AIRCRAFT—EXPRESSION OF OUTRAGE—
EXPRESSION OF CONDOLENCES—NOTICE OF MOTION

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Wednesday, November 27, 1985, I will move:

That the Senate express its shock and outrage at the recent terrorist attack on the Egyptian aircraft and urge that an international effort be made to strengthen security measures at airports to reduce the risk of this happening in future; and

That the Senate express sincere condolences to the families of all the victims.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND (LOTTERIES)—SECOND READING—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved the second reading of Bill C-81, to amend the Criminal Code (lotteries).

He said: Honourable senators, in June of 1985 the federal and provincial governments concluded an agreement concerning funding for the 1988 Winter Olympics that are to be held in Calgary, Alberta. Part of that agreement included proposals to amend the Criminal Code in order to clarify the law concerning lotteries and other permitted gaming activities. The bill which has now been introduced in this house is in furtherance of that agreement, as well as proposing a number of additional amendments that arose out of subsequent federal-provincial negotiations.

Currently, under the Criminal Code, all lottery, gaming and betting activities are illegal in Canada unless specifically allowed. However, there exist a number of statutory exceptions. Two of these exceptions concern, first, the operation of sports pools by the federal government and, second, the operation of lottery schemes and games of chance by either the federal or provincial governments and the licensing by the provinces of lottery schemes and games of chance that are operated by other persons, such as charitable or religious organizations.

These provisions in the Code are very complex—as complex as tax statutes, I might suggest—and at times their meaning must be discovered with the help of lawyers, if not the courts. For years there have existed uncertainties in the law. This has resulted in the launching of lawsuits in court by each government over the proper interpretation of the present law and the rights and responsibilities of each level of government concerning the operation of lotteries and other gaming activities.

Honourable senators may recall, respecting the last federal government lottery program when our colleague, Senator Perreault, was the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport, that the Quebec government brought injunction proceedings against the federal government with respect to a program brought in after a previous agreement. I raise this matter only to indicate some of the litigation it generated and not to get into the rights and wrongs of the case.

These legal battles led to ill feeling, I regret to say, between the federal and provincial governments, and diverted public resources to needless court battles. When this government took office it decided to put an end to unproductive federal-provincial wrangling and decided to embark upon a course of action that would achieve mutual agreement between the two levels of government for the public benefit.

The negotiations concerning funding for the Calgary Olympics provided an opportunity for achieving mutual federal-provincial reconciliation of these outstanding legal issues. Therefore, the agreement concluded last spring included proposals for both the out-of-court settlement of outstanding federal-provincial litigation in this area and the clarification of the legal rights, powers and responsibilities of each level of government.

I would like to detail, for the benefit of honourable senators, the exact nature of the amendments proposed in the bill that would achieve that clarification.

The repeal of section 188.1 of the Criminal Code would end the legal authority of the federal government, and the governments of one or more provinces which have entered into an agreement jointly with the federal government, to operate and manage sports pool betting. As honourable senators know, one of the first acts of the government when it took power was to kill and dismantle the administrative structure of the Canadian Sports Pool Corporation.

Senator Frith: Kill and dismantle?

Senator Nurgitz: Kill, dismantle and step on it.

Senator Frith: Catch the fish before you clean it.

Senator Flynn: That is quite noble.

Senator Frith: That is what I am saying.

Senator Nurgitz: In any event, this amendment would forever take away from the federal government the ability to start an unsuccessful casino operation; that is, that the authority to do it would be gone so that there would be no question as to whether or not it could be done well. It could not be done at all.

In 1979, during the brief period of the Conservative government, agreement was reached with the provinces—

Senator Flynn: “Brief”, he did not say “sweet”.

Senator Frith: Fairly sweet and very brief.

Senator Roblin: A lot can happen in nine months.

Senator Nurgitz: The then Conservative government agreed with the provinces that it would no longer operate federal lotteries. The proposed repeal of paragraph (1)(a) of section 190 of the Criminal Code would go further and statutorily prevent the federal government from restarting the operation of federal lotteries.

Honourable senators, these two amendments would thereby remove the legal authority for the operation of sports pools, lotteries and other gaming activities under federal jurisdiction. Such activities would only be permitted under direct provincial management and control or under the operation of other persons, such as boards of fairs or religious or charitable organizations, in accordance with a licence issued by any given province, if the province decided to have such legislation.

The proposed amendments in the bill would also clarify provincial licensing powers and would provide greater provincial control over accountability by operators in order to ensure that permitted gaming activities are properly regulated. For example, the amendment to subsection 190(2) provides that the terms and conditions of a licence issued by the provincial government may be imposed not only by the provincial government but by the provincial legislature, as well. While a series of amendments to paragraphs (1)(a) to (f) of the current section 190 would permit any person, for the purpose of the operation of, or participation in, a lottery scheme to do anything required for such purpose, the new subsection (3) of section 190 would create new and broad offences in respect of persons who do anything that is not authorized by or pursuant to the Criminal Code. The maximum punishment for an offence proceeded with by way of indictment would render a person liable to imprisonment for up to two years.

The proposed amendments contained in this bill also clarify what types of lotteries and gaming activities the provinces, and those persons acting under a provincial licence, may operate and conduct.

● (1500)

For example, the new paragraph 1(b) of section 190 would treat lotteries and other games of chance that are conducted by charitable or religious organizations at bazaars in the same manner as lotteries and games operated by the same organizations that are not conducted at bazaars.

Monetary limits currently exist in the Criminal Code in respect of both the amount permitted to be paid to play a game and the value of the prizes awarded at lotteries and games conducted at bazaars. The amendment would remove the monetary limits and would treat equally all charitable or religious lotteries and games. This will permit the provinces to set their own monetary limits.

The restrictive monetary limits with respect to lotteries and games of chance that are operated under provincial licence by persons at public places of amusement would, however, remain in the Criminal Code, since these lotteries or games could be operated for private profit.

The current statutory limit of a $100 prize limit and a limit of 50 cents that could be paid to play a lottery or a game were set in 1969. Due to inflation over the years, it is proposed to increase these limits to $500 for prizes and $2 for amounts permitted to be paid in order to play a lottery or game.

The new paragraph (1)(c) of section 190 would extend to the board of any fair or exhibition approved by the province the ability to conduct and manage a lottery scheme under a provincial licence.

At present, only agricultural fairs or exhibitions may be licensed. The current law, therefore, discriminates in favour of agricultural fairs and against other produce or industry fairs, such as those concerning fishing or lumbering, for example.

Surely, if agricultural fairs can operate lotteries and games of chance, then fishery fairs, such as lobster festivals, should be able to conduct similar activities.

It should be noted that not any type of fair would be permitted to obtain a licence. Rather, only those fairs or exhibitions designated and approved by the province would be able to obtain a licence.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Did you say fishery and lumbering fairs?

Senator Nurgitz: Yes. Under the current Criminal Code, the only permitted type of fair is an agricultural fair. Under the amendments contained in Bill C-81, there will no longer be that restriction.

Senator Frith: The proposed subsection 189(3.1) sets out the definition of “fair or exhibition”; it reads:

(3.1) For the purposes of this section, “fair or exhibition” means an event where agricultural or fishing products are presented or where activities relating to agriculture or fishing take place.

Senator Nurgitz: And I have added lumbering. I take your point.

Senator Frith: I do not see any reason why lumbering fairs should not be included. I simply do not see where it so states in the bill.

Senator Nurgitz: I am advised by the Deputy Leader of the Government that lumbering is a form of agriculture.

Senator Doody: Great big plants.

Senator Nurgitz: They just grow thicker and longer than the usual agricultural product.

Senator Frith: Tossing the caber at the Caledonian games, I suppose, could constitute a “lumbering” activity.

Senator Nurgitz: A series of amendments to section 190 would also permit provincial governments and approved fair or exhibition boards to operate a wheel of fortune. Currently, only licensed charitable or religious organizations and persons at a public place of amusement may operate wheels of fortune.

Since all of these activities would be subject to either direct provincial operation or provincial licensing control, there is no need to maintain the current discrimination.

I would also like to point out that the new paragraph 1(h) of section 190 would amend the present subsection (4.1) of section 190 to permit the manufacture and export of gaming and betting equipment to any place where it is lawful to use such equipment, or where a legal structure exists for the approval of the use of such equipment.

The current subsection 190(4.1) only refers to lottery tickets and cards and does not permit exports out of Canada. A number of Canadian companies that invent and devise lottery schemes and manufacture lottery tickets and other gaming material have achieved international respect for the quality of the products used in Canadian lotteries and games. The present law, however, prevents these companies from exporting the products of this Canadian expertise. The proposed amendment would permit Canadian companies to compete equally with companies of other nations in the international marketplace.

Subsection (5) of section 190 at present defines "lottery scheme" to include a game, and section 179 defines "game" to mean "a game of chance or mixed chance and skill".

This vague definition of "lottery scheme" has produced a number of legal disputes, both in and out of court, as to what types of gaming activities are legal under the banner of "lottery scheme."

Recent judicial interpretation has given the concept a very broad meaning. Combined with the non obstante clause in the opening words of section 190, this judicial interpretation could open up the scope of permissible gambling by provinces and licensed persons within provinces to include a broad range of betting and gambling activities, including the betting on the outcome of all sorts of events, whether athletic or otherwise. While the provinces have not chosen to jump fully into this area in any large way, it is certainly thought that proper legal limits should be established, with guidelines put in place in each province as to what is and what is not considered acceptable.

The proposed amendments would clearly provide in the legislation the authority for provincially operated or licensed activities that have been or are currently being undertaken. Clear legislative authority would be given to the provinces to operate, or to license the operation of, lotteries and other games of chance that involve betting, pool selling and pool system betting. This conduct is currently permitted under judicial interpretations of the present law.

In fact, some provinces are actually in the casino business. By way of example, the provinces of Manitoba and Alberta, on a given number of days in a year, permit the operation of gambling casinos. As a result, in such cities as Edmonton, Calgary and Winnipeg, we have casinos operated by the province, with the proceeds going, in part, to charitable organizations.

In the city of Winnipeg, for example, these casinos are conducted at the Winnipeg Convention Centre and involve such activities as blackjack, roulette and a lottery ticket scheme that is equivalent to slot machines.

Senator Frith: And these casinos are run by the provincial government?

Senator Nurgitz: They are run by the provincial government, yes. There is no magic to the system. In the case of the province of Manitoba, the Province takes 20 per cent of the take, with a charity or charities named to receive the remaining 80 per cent.

The amendments would, however, create some additional limits to those that currently exist in the law. The operation or licensing of certain types of activities would be prohibited. For example, the operation of a dice game, three-card monte, punch board and coin table would continue to be prohibited as under the present law.

In addition, the proposals would not permit the provinces or licensed organizations to conduct bookmaking, pool selling, or the making or recording of any types of bets, including pool or pari-mutuel betting on any race or fight or on a single sporting event or athletic contest.

Therefore, lawful lotteries or gaming activities operated or licensed by the provinces would be restricted to the results or outcomes of a combination of at least two or more sporting events or athletic contests, or to the outcome of any other contingency or contingencies, such as the drawing of numbers or cards, the spinning of wheels, et cetera.

The bill also proposes restrictions in respect of lotteries or other games of chance that are operated through computers, video devices or other machines that amount to "slot machines" within the meaning of that term in the Criminal Code. Only provincial governments themselves would be permitted to operate such devices. The provinces would not be able to license the operation of such devices by other persons.

Lastly, the amendments contained in Bill C-81 would ensure that the only provisions in the Criminal Code that would permit pari-mutuel betting on horse racing are those contained in section 188 of the Criminal Code of Canada. This section provides that the regulation of horse racing is, and remains, a federal responsibility.

I think it is clear from what I have said that the bill clarifies a number of uncertainties in the law. Additionally, it gives clear legislative recognition to past and present provincial activities while at the same time putting in place some very clear restrictions and bounds as to what is and what is not permissible.

Given the state of the current law and judicial interpretation of it, the proposed amendments, when viewed correctly, do not promote an expansion of gambling; rather, they set some realistic and clear standards of what is permissible. In some cases, the amendments even restrict the scope of the current law.

It is only because the law has finally been spelled out in black and white that some honourable senators may have gained the impression that this bill promotes the expansion of gambling. By clearly setting out what is permissible, it is hoped that the reverse may well be true as well; that is, that the prohibitions are clearly defined.

Honourable senators, I urge passage of this bill.

On motion of Senator Perrault, debate adjourned.

SEEDS ACT CANADA GRAIN ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. R. James Balfour moved the second reading of Bill C-64, to amend the Seeds Act and the Canada Grain Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill contains long overdue amendments to the Seeds Act. A good deal has happened in the seed industry since the last time major amendments were made to the act, as far back as 1959. The industry has doubled in size during the past eight years, both in terms of acreage and authorized establishments. It now generates about $350 million annually in sales, including domestic and export markets.

This bill will help ensure that farmers get what they pay for and that the owners of seed varieties are engaged in fair competition.

One of the key elements of the bill is that it will provide greater authority under the Seeds Act to protect against false advertising and to strengthen the seed licensing system.

For some years now seed associations have been expressing concern about distorted or even false advertising of seed varieties. The amendments to the Seeds Act before us will ensure that if the privatization trend continues, there will be effective regulation of the quality and sales of seed in this country.

These amendments will halt false or distorted advertising practices by providing for the disclosure of certain information when seed is advertised, and by prohibiting the use of variety names when the seed is not pedigreed.

By strengthening our licensing system now, we will be guaranteeing against any possible introduction of inferior varieties in the future.

The penalties proposed in the bill for violation of the act are much tougher. The maximum penalty on summary conviction will be raised from $2,000 to $25,000, and on indictment will be at judicial discretion. This new level is a much more effective deterrent.

I am in full agreement with tougher provisions because they send a clear signal to the seed industry and to producers that this government is serious about maintaining a high standard of seed quality in this country.

[Senator Nurgitz.]

The bill will also extend the time limit for instituting proceedings by way of summary conviction, allowing more time for proper investigation of complaints and for the institution of legal proceedings.

I wish to make note of the bonding provisions in the bill, because it is an important aspect of quality control in Canada's seed industry. Under the current system, all imported seed is held in bond while it is tested to ensure that quality requirements are met.

This bill will transfer bonding authority, through the Seeds Act, from the jurisdiction of Customs and Excise to Agriculture Canada.

Finally, I would like to draw the attention of honourable senators to the role of the Canadian Seed Growers Association in the administration of this act. With the exception of seed potatoes, the Seed Growers Association is the official seed pedigreering agency in Canada. The members of this organization can take a great deal of the credit for establishing standards to ensure varietal purity of crops.

I am pleased to see that the bill proposes to establish clearly the role of the Canadian Seed Growers Association in the Seeds Act. Like many of the other measures contained in the bill, this particular provision is long overdue.

I noted that consultations with the provinces and seed associations occurred prior to the introduction of this bill. As a result, I understand that there is widespread support for it. Therefore I am urging all honourable senators to support this important legislation.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the sponsor a question? I presume that this bill has nothing to do with plant breeders' rights.

Senator Balfour: No.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Sparrow, debate adjourned.

CUSTOMS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. R. James Balfour moved the second reading of Bill C-59, respecting Customs.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is an important and much-needed piece of legislation, and one which has broad support among those who will be affected by its provisions.

Some honourable senators may not be aware that the current Customs Act was one of the very first legislative initiatives of Canada's first Parliament in 1867. It is now 118 years old, and although it has been substantially amended over the years, today it is badly out of date and largely incompatible with modern business practice and transportation and travel conditions.

It became clear some time ago that further amendment and tinkering with the present law was no longer sufficient. A completely new Customs Act was needed which would eliminate the obsolete and inconsistent provisions of the current act; arrange the provisions in a simpler and more logical structure; give the department more flexibility in responding to changed conditions in modern transportation and business practice; and, finally, modernize the procedures for revenue collection and administration to reduce the paper burden, where possible, on both the government and the business community.

Honourable senators, all these basic objectives have been met in Bill C-59, which we are now considering. The new bill was developed only after extensive consultation with those who will be most affected by its provisions. The department consulted with importers and exporters, brokers and agents, and representatives of the travelling public. What has emerged is a bill which has won the praise and support of these groups, and, at the same time, one which will enable Customs to carry out its responsibilities for administering and enforcing the law governing the movement of persons and goods across our borders more effectively and efficiently.

For one thing, it is shorter, simpler, more understandable and more logically structured than its predecessor. This in itself should make it easier for the department to administer and easier for the business community and the public to understand.

I do not intend to deal in detail with the various clauses of Bill C-59. However, honourable senators, I should like to mention just a few examples of how this bill has been improved and modernized to meet business conditions as they exist in the 1980s.

One of these areas is that of speeding up the process of customs clearance and delivery of imported goods. The pace of business has accelerated rapidly in recent years. Time is money, and manufacturers and importers try to work with minimal inventories and a fast turnaround whenever possible. We live in an age of extensive use of containerization, air transport of goods, and rapid, even overnight, delivery to relatively distant points.

To facilitate faster processing of imported goods, there have been many requests from importers—and from travellers—for more simplified entry accounting systems. This bill permits expedited release of imported goods from customs control. This, in turn, will provide for more rapid delivery of the goods to the manufacturer or importer.

At the same time, through provisions for post-release audits, it ensures that Customs can follow through and ensure that all duties owing to the government are, in fact, paid.

Another area in which the new act has been strengthened to reflect current policy is that of ensuring fair and equitable treatment of those who must pay duties and taxes under the act. This is in keeping with the government's overall policy of fair dealings with Canadian taxpayers as exemplified in the Declaration of Taxpayer Rights published by the former Minister of National Revenue earlier this year.

When disputes arise, as they sometimes do between the department and importers, over tariff classification or the value for duty of imported goods, the new act provides that the department will accept security in lieu of cash payment pending a review. This obviates the necessity of their tying up sometimes large amounts of capital until the dispute is resolved. Further, when such settlements are favourable to the importer, the government must pay interest on moneys refunded following a disposition of the case. The government will also pay interest on refunds or drawbacks which are not dealt with expeditiously. These related provisions are designed to ensure equitable treatment of taxpayers to reflect the concept that no taxpayer should be penalized when he or she is in honest and legitimate disagreement with the federal government over the payment of taxes or duties. Through all its provisions the new act reflects the principles underlying the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The act incorporates a decision by the Supreme Court concerning the burden of proof in criminal proceedings.

● (1520)

Honourable senators, the customs officers of the Department of National Revenue are required to administer not only the Customs Act, but to assist in the administration of some 60 other pieces of federal legislation. Many of them deal with the enforcement of restrictions on what may or may not be imported into or exported from this country. The new Customs Act will strengthen within reasonable limits the power of the department to enforce such laws and regulations for the benefit and protection of Canadian citizens.

One of its provisions deals with the power of the department to open for inspection mail items which they have reason to suspect might contain illicit materials such as drugs or pornography. The new act transfers the powers relating to such inspections from the Canada Post Act to the Customs Act. It gives customs officials the right to open mail items weighing more than 30 grams without first obtaining the permission of the sender or addressee. But I would like to reiterate that no item will be opened unless the officials have reasonable grounds to suspect that dutiable or prohibited materials are enclosed. These provisions will also help the department greatly in its battle to prevent the use of the mails to circumvent Canadian law prohibiting illicit importation.

Honourable senators, in these and many other ways this new bill represents a significant improvement over the current Customs Act. This government is committed to a course of improving the effectiveness and efficiency of overall government operations while, at the same time, reducing the cost and paper burden for those who must do business with the government. Sometimes this requires legislative change, as in this case. We expect a great deal of customs officers. We expect them to provide courteous and efficient service to thousands of Canadian businesses and millions of Canadians and foreign travellers who cross our borders. We expect them to collect revenues effectively. Customs and Excise is responsible for almost 25 per cent of all federal revenue collections. We expect them to protect our borders vigilantly against illegal and undesirable importations. This new law will help them carry out all these responsibilities more effectively than in the past.

This bill has been carefully prepared and subjected to much scrutiny by private sector groups and by a legislative committee of the other place. It represents much-needed and popular legislative reform. I hope honourable senators will join with me in supporting this bill so that it may be passed into law and proclaimed into force at the earliest possible date.

On motion of Senator Neiman, debate adjourned.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Davey, for the adoption of the Fourth Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (Royal Assent), presented in the Senate on 6th November, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C.)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I have the permission of the Senate, I would like to defer my contribution to this debate until December 17. However, if other members of the house would like to take part in the discussion before that time, I hope they will feel quite free to do so. Otherwise, I ask that the order stand.

Order stands.

CANADA'S INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—INTERIM REPORT ON BILATERAL TRADE WITH UNITED STATES AND CANADA'S PARTICIPATION IN RESEARCH ON STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Interim Report of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's International Relations pertaining to Bilateral Trade with the United States and Canada's Participation in Research on the Strategic Defense Initiative, tabled in the Senate on 17th September, 1985.—(Honourable Senator MacEachen).

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to make some comments on the Strategic Defense Initiative and arms control in light of the recent superpower summit. At the summit concluded last week, the President of the United States refused to budge from his decision to pursue research into the possibility of constructing a defence against enemy missiles. This Strategic Defense Initiative has been warmly embraced by the President as a goal of national policy to such an extent that its pursuit has now become a major obstacle to the conclusion of any arms agreement. We are told that at one time the advisers of the President put forward this proposal as a bargaining chip which might facilitate movement on the part of the Russians in reaching an agreement to reduce the stocks of nuclear armaments. Whatever the origin of the policy, adherence to it is now a litmus test of American resolve.

The allies of the United States have been invited to participate in the research, presumably to express alliance solidarity on the basic American objective. However, the alliance has not been put to the severity of the test associated with the deployment of the cruise missiles in Europe. Honourable senators will recall that the North Atlantic Treaty Organization took what is now known as the "two-track decision" in 1979. One track was to proceed with the deployment of cruise and Pershing missiles in accordance with an agreed schedule unless, through a process of negotiation which the alliance was prepared to undertake with the Soviet Union, agreement could be reached on the matter of the deployment of theatre nuclear weapons in Europe. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization was convinced that the build up of SS-20s in Europe by the Soviet Union posed a threat not only to the security of Europe but also to the solidarity of the alliance itself and that a firm and concerted alliance response was required. That response, as we all know, was contained in the form of the decision which I previously mentioned and contained in the ministerial communiqué of December, 1979.

A number of subsequent effects flowed from that decision—in a sense, a watershed decision—which are quite relevant to our present concerns. First, the Soviet Union accused the alliance of an arms build-up and sharply challenged the assertion that any arms imbalance existed in Europe as a result of its deployment of SS-20s. It became apparent that a principal objective of the Soviet Union would be to undermine public opinion in NATO countries through a massive propaganda effort and, where appropriate, through threatening statements by Soviet leaders designed to unnerve public opinion and political leaders.

● (1530)

A second effect was that the numbers game became a principal preoccupation of parliaments and the public. The effort on the part of the members of the alliance to show, by comparison of the numbers of weapons held by the Soviet Union with those held by the United States, the legitimacy of the decision to proceed with deployment became very complicated indeed, and no doubt stimulated the Soviet Union to argue that the nuclear forces of the United Kingdom and France should be included in the negotiations which had been launched in Geneva.

A third effect was that real skepticism developed with respect to the intentions of the United States with respect to arms control. At times, statements emanating from the United States were disturbing; the concept for example, of the "winnable nuclear war" was identified with the thinking of the President of the United States.

Finally, as we all know, the intermediate nuclear force negotiations were eventually terminated by the Soviet Union in Geneva in accordance with previously declared Soviet intentions when the first nuclear missile was deployed in Europe by the United States.

Arms control was then and remains today a focal point of east-west relations. The conclusion of any arms agreement has been hindered by the poor state of east-west relations, with the distrust and suspicion so high at times that it found expression in exaggerated rhetoric, either in Washington or in Moscow. In fact, that period of relationship was described as megaphone diplomacy and it became an objective of other countries to try to reduce the rhetoric, because it was necessary to do that if there were to be any improvements in east-west relations.

Honourable senators, it is apparent that the limited outcome of the Geneva Summit just concluded bespeaks the continuing distrust, or lack of trust, between the superpowers. One ought not to be surprised at the failure to reach substantive agreement on arms control in view of the stiff attitudes which prevailed prior to the summit. The encounter between Mr. George Shultz and Mr. Gorbachev in Moscow prior to the summit was revealing, certainly on that point. It was not just that the Soviet leader proved to be a very combative interlocutor but also that he formulated a perception of the United States which Mr. Shultz described as not being in accordance with reality as it existed in the United States. One can understand that, because the Soviets were somewhat appalled, I think, when the President of the United States described the Soviet Union as an evil empire.

Senator Flynn: Some years ago.

Senator MacEachen: Some years ago, it is quite true. So that is the atmosphere that prevailed in Geneva. It is worth mentioning that the Prime Minister of Canada expressed his opinion that arms control should take precedence over bilateral issues, over human rights and over regional questions at the Geneva Summit. He believed that arms control should take precedence over all those other matters and that the United States and the Soviet Union should go the extra mile to reach an arms agreement. We now know the results of the Geneva Summit: The participants did not go the extra mile on arms control. That extra mile still remains to be travelled.

If a single point emerges from what I have been saying, it is that the deployment of weapons, or the prospect of a new system of weapons—even a defensive system as is proposed by the United States—is disturbing and unsettling. It is clear that the Strategic Defense Initiative introduces a new and unsettling factor in parliaments, in public opinion and certainly in east-west relations. We must bear in mind that the west, at the time the President launched his Strategic Defense Initiative, was emerging from the deep conflicts and debates occasioned by the deployment of the United States weapons in Europe. The North Atlantic alliance itself had demonstrated its ability to withstand the massive propaganda and the pressures of the peace movement by going ahead with missile deployment. As a result of that decision and the determination with which the alliance had carried out its intentions, the Soviet Union had suffered a major political and propaganda setback.

In Canada, we ourselves successfully faced the controversy which surrounded the decision of the Government of Canada to test the navigational system of the cruise missile. The political momentum at the time was moving inexorably in the direction of the west, and one is naturally bound to ask: Why did the United States inject a new and disturbing element into that political situation which was developing at that time?

The President proclaimed his intention to embark upon his Strategic Defense Initiative in March of 1983. It so happened that that announcement coincided with the visit of Vice-President George Bush to Canada. In fact, just some hours prior to the President's speech, Mr. Bush advised the Prime Minister of Canada of the main thrust of the President's speech and of his intention to make a new proposal to build a defensive system against enemy missiles. Mr. Bush, of course, added his own explanation and his own defence of the action which the President was to spring on the world at that particular time.

I do not intend to argue, as has been done in the committee report, the reasons why the committee found the Strategic Defense Initiative to be justified. I am talking about the political aspects. But it is a fact that the President, in his speech announcing the Strategic Defense Initiative, concentrated his attention on the security that would prevail in the world if a successful defence could be developed against missiles from other countries. As I recollect, he did not lay any stress whatsoever upon the potential of the Soviet Union for undertaking a similar technological breakthrough. In fact, if I recollect correctly, he did not mention any threat whatsoever. He defended it basically on its possibilities of creating a non-nuclear future.

● (1540)

Nothing occurred at the recent summit to solve the political and arms control problem created by the Strategic Defense Initiative. Indeed, the opposite is true. There was no meeting of minds that would even permit a reference to the subject in the final communique.

Mr. Weinberger, the Secretary of Defense in the United States, took pains to secure the U.S. position in a letter which he addressed on November 13 to the President and which was eventually leaked to the press.

It appeared to many observers prior to the summit that both the United States and the Soviet Union realized their own rigidity and faced the fact that neither was prepared to budge from their original positions. With the realization that the extra mile which had been advocated by the Prime Minister in the field of arms control was not to be travelled, they broadened the agenda to include other items and they reduced the emphasis on arms control in order to make possible a summit which would be judged a reasonable success in the absence of any breakthrough on arms control.

The Strategic Defense Initiative remains on the table as a burning issue between the United States and the Soviet Union. It is reported that the temperature rose very rapidly when the Soviet leader dealt with that question at the summit meeting, and it is a matter of public record that the President of the United States, following the summit, made it very clear that he had not made any concessions whatsoever on the Strategic Defense Initiative. Despite the illumination that we derived from the committee report which we are debating, that remains as the central issue between east and west as the deployment of the nuclear weapons in Europe by the United States and the Soviet Union had become the principal issue between the east and west several years ago.

In saying that, I am not in any way downplaying what I consider to be the positive aspects of this recent summit in Geneva. The fact that both sides after a period of six years agreed to meet and to spend so many hours in discussion must be of great significance. The fact that both sides agreed to meet at the highest possible level next year and again the following year is of significance and gives hope that through further discussion and through further negotiation some concrete results can be achieved. The emphasis that has been placed at the summit on the acceleration of the arms negotiations may, indeed, prove useful. We hope it will and, of course, the resumption of exchanges in various fields is an indication of an often improved political atmosphere more than it is a change of position on matters of substance.

Cultural and academic exchanges, for example, are a reflection of improved atmosphere because the first exchanges that were interrupted when the Soviet Union downed the Korean airliner were academic and cultural. Of course the interesting or revealing resumption, as I understand it, is of flights between the Soviet Union and the United States. When one recalls the bitterness of the atmosphere that prevailed at the time of the Korean aircraft downing, and when one observes what has happened, one can only say that the Geneva Summit was a very important event in east-west relations.

In all of this Canada does have a role to play. It is a limited one but an important one in terms of indicating to both the United States and the Soviet Union that we expect them to make the necessary accommodations that will result in some agreement on arms in general but also on some agreement that will take the Strategic Defense Initiative from its present status as a major obstacle to an overall arms deal.

Canada should continue to press both sides to reach compromise solutions and, particularly, to reach an early accommodation on the Strategic Defense Initiative.

The present Prime Minister understands Canada's role. The former Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, also understood Canada's role. In the final year of his leadership he launched a major effort to secure an improvement in east-west relations. Much of what he advocated and which seemed so far away has now been achieved.

President Reagan said, following the recent summit in Geneva, "We met and we had to meet. I had called for a fresh start and we made that fresh start."

I think that as Canadians we should not forget the fact that it was Canada through the peace initiative which first made the necessity of a fresh start a worldwide crusade. This was at a time when Washington was not as convinced as it is today of the need or desirability of a fresh start in east-west relations. The fresh start has been made and we can only hope that the impetus which will derive from that start will achieve positive results in the field of arms control which were not evident at the conclusion of the summit last week.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

CANADIAN FORCES—SPOUSES OF MEMBERS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Lorna Marsden, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, October 16, 1985, moved:

That the Senate do urge the Government of Canada to permit freedom of assembly and speech, and such other freedoms guaranteed to all other Canadian citizens, for spouses of members of the Canadian Armed Forces.

She said: No doubt, some honourable senators regard this motion as unnecessary and much ado about nothing. However, the reaction of the Minister of National Defence to the rather mild action of a group of spouses of members of the Canadian Forces raises issues which lie at the heart of Canadian civil order and the means by which the state maintains civil order. I am confident that honourable senators will wish to speak their minds on this issue.

First, may I address the question: What is the nature of the organization referred to and what does it want? In the newsletter of the Organizational Society of Spouses of Military Members dated May 1985, we find the following:

In the beginning we wanted a Dental Plan. As we thought of ways to inform our Government, it occurred to us that we needed a national association that could speak about the unique needs and concerns of Canadian military families. During a brain storming session in August 1984 OSOMM was born. We gained support from the local ECS, women's groups and from various individuals who donated their time and money. Our first newsletter was delivered and 40 women attended our first meeting. Base officials informed us at this time that a Dental Plan was considered "political activity" and as long as we pursued this issue we could not meet on the base to deliver our newsletter without censorship or have any of the numerous benefits of a non-public funded organization. If we agreed to forget about the dental plan and other "political" issues like homemakers' pensions, we could be provided with a building for a family resource centre within two weeks . . . Although all we had wanted was to communicate our need for a Dental Plan to our elected representatives and to form a national support group, it soon became apparent that archaic laws governing the Department of National Defence were now being applied to deny us the freedom of assembly, association and free speech guaranteed to all other Canadians under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. DND officials have maintained that a group of women seeking changes in living conditions and benefits, for example, a Dental Plan, would clearly threaten the political neutrality of the Canadian Armed Forces and therefore could not be allowed these freedoms in their own communities. One DND official stated, "This would be the beginning of another Argentina—"

It is clear from this description of their own activities that the sorts of objectives for which the spouses of members of the Armed Forces were prepared to organize were relatively minor reforms in their community and way of life.

It should be noted that in the United States there is a military families organization which allows lobbying and which makes recommendations to the U.S. government. Furthermore, the U.S. Department of Defense has acted on their recommendations. This organization notes, further, that there are no fewer than 19 American national organizations representing the military and their families. In other words, such an association is not without precedent even within the military of allies.

The issue which is the subject of this motion is an important one in its own right. There are human and civil rights which speak to the quality of democracy and its freedoms in Canada and the rights of individuals which must not be overlooked and which are of vital importance in each of the provinces which senators in this chamber represent. However, the issue goes beyond this.

If there is one significant accomplishment which has been achieved over the past generations in Canada, it is the end of seeing the family and marriage as an instrument of social control for the whole society. There has been an evolution in public and private thinking about the nature of marriage from that of a man and his family acquiring property rights over a daughter-in-law or, at least, the wife becoming the property of her husband, to that of a partnership of free people making free choices. Women are no longer seen as forms of property who must give up their civil rights on marriage. Women are not the property of their husbands in our society in any sense. Husbands can now be charged by their wives with sexual assault. Wives are assumed to have access to the property created during marriage, not as a dowry but as a right. Wives do not have to stay with abusive husbands, nor husbands with abusive wives. Divorce is increasingly accessible and divorce reform is the subject of a bill before Parliament at this moment. Illegitimacy no longer exists as a legal concept in Canadian jurisdictions. Common-law marriages are recognized in property laws and in other important social and legal relationships.

The current government has made marriage the dividing line between classes of people in more than the instance before us today. We had, last spring, amendments to the Spouses Allowance which became available to widows or widowers of pensioners but not to the never-married, the divorced or the separated. Marriage became the dividing line. One fears that the government is going to institutionalize further this form of division in Canada.

What the Minister of National Defence and, perhaps, the government appear to see is a world where the institution of marriage is used as a means of social control over public issues and rights such as free speech and free assembly.

It is not proposed within the military community, at least up to this point, that by-laws governing community standards of behaviour be established, but, rather, that the enforcement of public behaviour be on the basis of marriage. This is a scandalous turning back of the clock—a re-assertion of all relationships, a denigration of marriage, and a denial of civil liberties.

It was suggested by the Leader of the Government in the Senate a few weeks ago that the government was prepared to make a statement on this immediate issue concerning the spouses of military members. I hope one is made soon and that it is a progressive one. However, that repentance on the part of the Minister of National Defence and his colleagues and the recognition of the modern era are not sufficient. It is necessary in this chamber that we signal our own firm conviction that marriage is not a dividing line upon which civil rights can be drawn. It is not a form of seclusion from the community; it does not turn off the mind or the activities of free citizens, and it will not be seen as an instrument of the state for the control of individuals in their relationship to their fundamental rights, no matter what the occupation of the person to whom they are married.

I urge you to vote in favour of this motion.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, may I put a question to Senator Marsden?

The honourable senator's motion reads that we should urge the Government of Canada to permit freedom of assembly and speech and such other freedoms guaranteed to all other Canadian citizens. It seems to me that, if these are guaranteed to all Canadian citizens, they must be applicable to spouses of members of the Canadian Armed Forces. Perhaps the honourable senator has some regulation in mind.

Certainly, if there is a violation of the Charter, that can be struck down by the courts.

I do not understand exactly what this motion means in substance, because the Charter applies to anyone, and marriage is not a reason for discrimination under the Charter.

Senator Marsden: I am glad to hear the honourable senator say that because, of course, I agree with him entirely; but the fact of the matter is that the Minister of National Defence backed up the commanding officer of the Armed Forces base on which these spouses organized to deny them freedom of speech and assembly. There is a case pending which, I trust, will be struck down on the basis of the Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms.

However, the Leader of the Government in the Senate indicated several weeks ago that the government would move before that case came to court, but it has not moved.

Senator Flynn: In any event, if a minister errs, whether it be a minister of the present government or a former minister of the previous government, I do not believe it changes the Charter and I do not think your motion, if carried, can do anything in practice. It is an empty gesture that we are invited to make.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to join in this discussion, and, before I do, I will remind Senator Flynn that he forgot to ask a question.

I do not see why citizens should have to go to the expense of court actions all the way up to the Supreme Court of Canada in order to establish their rights under the Charter. Where there is a clear violation, they should not have to do so. It is as simple as that.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps Senator Marsden will reply, but what Senator Godfrey has said is too simple.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, speaking to the motion and not asking a question of anyone, it seems to me that the motion proposes a political course of conduct that—

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Frith: I suspect that Senator Flynn anticipates that I am going to disagree with him; he will not let me finish the sentence to do so.

The motion, in effect, requests the government to say to the Minister of National Defence that he ought to permit these people to do it. Then they do not have to go to court. What Senator Flynn says is quite right. If there is a violation of the Charter, there can be some way to remedy it. Where there is a wrong, there is a remedy in law. But this is not a court of law. This is a political institution, and a member of that institution is asking us to ask the government to reverse a political act that it has already taken. While I do not disagree in the slightest with Senator Flynn that there is another remedy, that is not the only remedy.

This is a simple, clear motion requesting the government to tell the Minister of National Defence to stop doing what he is doing.

Senator Flynn: It does not say that.

Senator Frith: Yes, it does.

Senator Flynn: I would not object if the motion said that we urged the government to abrogate some by-laws or some regulations—very specific by-laws or regulations. That is all right. But you are asking us to tell the government to please observe the Charter of Rights. For goodness sake—

Senator Godfrey: What is wrong with that?

Senator Flynn: In general, the simplifications of Senator Godfrey are always the same. He may not want to go to court, but he must know what he wants in any event. What is Senator Godfrey asking me to do in this specific case? Does he know?

Senator Godfrey: Yes, I know, because Senator Marsden told us. If Senator Flynn were listening, he would know exactly what she is asking him for and exactly what the government should do. It does not necessarily have to be in the regulations.

Senator Flynn: Has Senator Godfrey seen the regulations to which Senator Marsden refers? Does he know what he is talking about?

Senator Godfrey: I have heard Senator Marsden tell us today; I listened to her and I believe every word she said. I do not have to go and read the regulations. She said what they are and I am satisfied that she knows what she is talking about.

Senator Flynn: Anyone who talks like you would have the Senate do this sort of thing every time—

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on a point of order, perhaps Senator Flynn is making some time for himself so as to propose an amendment to the motion. If it were an amendment along the lines that he has been suggesting, it might well be that we can all support it.

Senator Flynn: I am asking Senator Marsden whether she has a specific regulation in mind to add to her motion. I would like to know what I am doing. Perhaps Senator Godfrey does not mind not knowing, but I do.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there must be some difference between a specific regulation and a decision. Perhaps we need to amend the motion so that if there is a regulation, it can be cited; if there is no regulation, the decision that is made can be cited. For that purpose, unless Senator Marsden wishes to add something further, I will adjourn the debate on the motion to see whether we can come to a solution. It seems to me that we can all agree with the principle of the motion but, at the same time, that there is substance in what Senator Flynn has to say about some technical difficulties. Of course, we wish to make the amendment that would suit his requirements so that he could feel free to vote for the motion, as I believe he would like to do.

Senator Marsden: I will say to the Honourable Senator Flynn that I believe there is a specific regulation that can be quoted here. However, I was of the opinion that it is not necessary for us to tell the Minister of National Defence which regulation he might want to change and how he might want to do so. That is, after all, his prerogative. It does seem to me, however, that he did need some urging on in a course of action which is within his power to take now, and that our obligation here was not to draft his regulatory change but to express a sentiment in a certain direction in which I think many honourable senators would concur. Furthermore, I do think that the regulations that are referred to in the specific case of these particular spouses in Alberta may not be the only relevant regulations that he might want to change at the same time. Therefore, it seemed to me that there was nothing to be gained by a narrow, technical motion on this matter.

Senator Flynn: If you want to speak and say nothing, that is fine with me.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

* Base Year 1978 — amounts vary with degree of urbanization

The Senate Committee poverty lines are based on a formula which is updated annually on the basis of a measure of disposable personal income in Canada and changes in the distribution of families of various sizes.

THE SENATE POVERTY LEVEL is approximately 50% of average Canadian family income adjusted to family size, making provision for inflation and gross national product. For families of sizes 2, 3, and 4, the Poverty Lines are almost exactly half of the average income for families of those sizes.

STATISTICS CANADA: Poverty Level Lines are based on changing consumption patterns which now indicate that families who spend 62% or more of their income on food, clothing and shelter (as opposed to the 70% criterion used at an earlier date) are in straitened circumstances. These limits are also differentiated by size of area of residence.

Total Number and Percentage of Persons below Poverty Line	23.4% (5,621,000 persons)	17.8% (4,269,000 persons)

Statistics Canada figures for 1984 show that the lowest 20% of families and unattached individuals (lowest income quintile) receive only 4.3% of total income. THESE FIGURES INDICATE THAT THE GAP FOR DISPARITY BETWEEN THE LOWEST AND HIGHEST GROUP IS CONTINUING TO GET GREATER IN RECENT YEARS.

CANADIAN STATISTICAL REVIEW, JUNE 1984 - The Senate Committee Poverty Lines (Senate). The Special Senate Committee on Poverty, chaired by Senator David A. Croll, developed poverty lines based on income levels which reflected "items of basic need". These lines are differentiated by family size and adjusted each year by an escalator based on living standards, as reflected by the amount of disposable personal income available in Canada in any given year. The annual escalator is designed to adjust for real as well as nominal changes in income and for change in average family size over time. The resulting poverty levels are close to half of the average income for families of sizes 2, 3 and 4 in 1981. Senator Croll releases periodically an update of the Senate Committee poverty lines and those released for 1981 were used in this note.

UPDATED POVERTY LINE

THE SENATE

Wednesday, November 27, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL
C-55—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a group of references to committee for pre-study of a number of bills which will be coming to us shortly from the other place. I have consulted with my colleagues opposite and will now introduce the motions.

I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-55, intituled: "An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Doody has consulted me about his intention to introduce these motions. I am not objecting to it, but I would mention that the consultation took place only about ten minutes ago. My first reaction is a positive one on all the motions—the one before us now and the three that are coming up—but I suggest we stand them until tomorrow, so that those who did not get the ten-minute notice I got will have a chance to consider them.

Senator Doody: But I will introduce all of them today?

Senator Frith: Yes, and I will then adjourn the debate on each until tomorrow.

Senator Doody: I have no objection to that at all.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-74—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-74, intituled: "An Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and to provide for certain matters in relation to the 1981 decennial census", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL
C-70—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-70, intituled: "An Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have two other bills which I will leave until tomorrow. Both of them are properly matters for study by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I fully appreciate the workload undertaken by that committee, although I would have thought that by this time just about everyone in Canada would have had an opportunity to appear before the committee on the study of the subject matter it now has before it. However, I will discuss these two bills with the chairman of that committee and with my colleagues opposite, and then I hope that tomorrow we will find a home for the pre-study of those bills.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps, honourable senators, it would be a good idea to tell us what those bills are and then we can deal with them tomorrow, rather than asking for an additional day.

Senator Doody: I would be delighted so to do, Senator Frith. The first bill is to amend the Income Tax Act and related statutes, and to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, the Financial Administration Act and the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act. To be modest about it, that is a rather voluminous bill.

Senator Frith: Is that Bill C-84?

Senator Doody: That is Bill C-84.

The second one is Bill C-83, which is entitled: "An Act to amend the Tax Rebate and Discounting Act". That one is now before the committee of the other place and has aroused some interest. Both of these bills are worthy of pre-study, and I will try to find a home for them.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—USER FEES ON GREAT LAKES

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question respecting the current Canada-United States trade talks. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform the Senate if it is the government's intention to defer legislation imposing user fees on the Great Lakes? I ask the question in light of representations made by Senator John Glenn of Ohio and a group of other United States senators, which the United States Transportation Secretary Dole sent to Ambassador Gotlieb in Washington and to the Minister of Transport, Don Mazankowski, in that, according to their representations, such legislation could have a devastating effect on the business at ports on both sides of the border.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I shall take the question as notice, honourable senators.

Senator Grafstein: Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate could inform us on that matter as soon as possible. Can he also tell us whether or not it is the government's intention to link this issue with other trade issues on the government's trade agenda?

Senator Roblin: I can answer the second question quite definitely: There is no linkage.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

QUEEN CHARLOTTE ISLANDS—LOGGING DISPUTE—HAIDA INDIAN RIGHTS

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, all Canadians were saddened at the arrest of 58 Haida Indians arising out of their struggle to stop logging on Lyell Island and generally to protect their homeland. I appreciate the recent efforts of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in this regard.

My question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: Will this subject be a topic at the forthcoming First Ministers' Conference to be held in Halifax? If not, I would ask him to make representations to the Prime Minister to have this subject placed on the agenda for that meeting.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Both the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister of the Environment have been working zealously in an effort to mediate this difficult problem, a problem which has very substantial constitutional overtones. It is not something that is within the direct purview of the federal government; rather, it is a provincial matter.

I can tell my honourable friend that I believe I am well informed when I tell him that the Prime Minister does expect to discuss the matter with the Premier of British Columbia when they meet at the First Ministers' Conference.

Hon. Jack Austin: I have a supplementary question. The Leader of the Government in the Senate has said that this matter is not within the purview of the federal government—something which I find rather curious inasmuch as matters relating to Indian affairs, which would include Haida affairs, are a fiduciary responsibility of the federal government.

Perhaps the government leader can advise us—if not now, then following the discussions which may take place between the Prime Minister and Premier Bennett—whether the federal government is willing to entertain in principle the question of compensation to the province of British Columbia in respect of any provincial crown lands which may be required to be surrendered as a result of an award of land rights to the Haida under their aboriginal claims.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, it is correct to say that the federal government has a constitutional responsibility with respect to the Indian people. The point in question, however, is the constitutional status of the land which is the subject of the dispute, and that is quite a different matter.

I do not think it would be wise of me to attempt to bargain with the Government of British Columbia across the floor of this chamber. These are discussions that will have to take place between the Prime Minister and the Premier of British Columbia. If there is any information I can give my honourable friend after that meeting, I shall be more than pleased to do so.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

VISIT TO UNITED KINGDOM

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the visit of the Governor General to the United Kingdom and the press reports in connection with that visit.

Can the government leader advise us, first of all, if the visit of the Governor General to the United Kingdom is an official visit?

If it is, in what way is it official in terms of its standing with Her Majesty the Queen and in terms of its standing with the British government, inasmuch as the Governor General has called upon both Her Majesty the Queen and Prime Minister Thatcher?

In the alternative, if the visit is informal, what standing does the visit have in terms of the conduct of the business of the Government of Canada?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I believe I am correct in telling my honourable friend that the visit is an informal one. It is true that the Governor General has called upon Her Majesty the Queen, as one would expect. It is also true that there has been a conversation between the Governor General and the Prime Minister of Great Britain. However, the conversations that have taken place have not been on subjects that involve the political responsibilities of the Government of Canada.

Senator Austin: Can the Leader of the Government inform us as to the constitutional standing of Her Excellency the Governor General when she visits the United Kingdom? What is her constitutional standing in terms of Her Majesty the Queen and in relation to the Government of the United Kingdom?

Senator Roblin: Well, without trying to suggest to my honourable friend that I am an expert on these arcane matters, I can tell him that to the best of my knowledge the Governor General visits Her Majesty in her capacity as Her Majesty's representative in Canada. That is her official status when she is in Canada or outside of the country.

● (1410)

Senator Austin: Does that apply with respect to her visit to the Prime Minister of Great Britain?

Senator Roblin: That is an informal visit at the discretion of Her Excellency.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

REMOVAL OF IMPORT QUOTAS ON FOOTWEAR

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to ask a question of the Leader of the Government with respect to the impact of the new policy of the Government of Canada on the importation of footwear. The industry has claimed that the new policy will cause the loss of a large number of jobs. I believe the number mentioned was at least 5,000 and the Minister for International Trade has stated that there will be no loss of jobs to Canadians.

Can the Leader of the Government tell us whether any detailed studies have been made by either the Department of International Trade or the Department of Finance which would indicate the impact of this policy on the various plants and, if so, whether the government would consider letting us have these studies in order that we can have a more informed view about this policy?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can tell my honourable friend that in June of 1984 the government of the day directed the Canadian Import Tribunal to review the footwear industry's position in relation to possible injury if import quotas were removed and the industry's use of the period of protection allowed them under the import quotas in order that they should become competitive.

After hearing a number of witnesses and receiving 39 written submissions over a period of a year, the tribunal found that the footwear industry in recent years, as a whole, has matched and often out-performed the economy in the manufacturing sector. The industry, with the exception of women's and girls' footwear area, is competitive on an international basis; and the industry has adapted to meet the challenges of the marketplace and was competitive because of it and not because of the time allowed to become competitive under quotas.

I should like to add a few remarks to that statement. There is a problem, undoubtedly, in some areas where we may expect to see dislocation, and in those cases there are safety nets in place that will help the people who are affected by this change to find new employment or to change their skills or otherwise to adapt to the situation. We feel that reasonable precautions have been taken for those, relatively few, in my opinion, who will be affected by this change.

I do not think I would subscribe to the view that thousands of jobs are at risk. The import tribunal studied these matters in detail and I am sure that I can get for my friend, if he so wishes, the report which indicates the contrary.

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government has said that there will be relatively few jobs lost. We all know about the report of the import tribunal which, as he mentioned, was commissioned in June of 1984, but what I want to know is whether, subsequent to the report, the government made its own appraisal of the impact of this particular change in policy. Presumably, the Leader of the Government is speaking from some knowledge when he says relatively few jobs will be affected. I want to know if any studies have been made, and can we see them if they have been made?

Senator Roblin: I will try to get my friend some figures on that point.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

FREE TRADE ARRANGEMENT—IMPACT ON EMPLOYMENT IN CANADA

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): On a related subject, as the Leader of the Government knows, the Government of Ontario has released a series of studies which indicate that if a free trade arrangement were entered into with the United States some 300,000 jobs would be threatened in the province of Ontario. I do not know whether the federal government has made similar studies. I would like to know whether such studies have been made or are under way, because if these negotiations are to be examined with full information, it seems that we need to know what impact changes of that kind would have.

[Senator Austin.]

Can the Leader of the Government tell us whether studies have been made? I believe that yesterday the Secretary of State said that studies were under way, so I should like to know what they are and whether we can see them if they have been completed.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): There are a number of studies in the public domain concerning the general question of trade to which I can direct my honourable friend. There is, of course, the effort of the Senate itself in which we established, to the satisfaction of this body at any rate, that the risks involved in free trade and the shift in jobs—not the loss in jobs—from one area to another amply justified a policy of freer trade relations with the United States.

I would also suggest that my honourable friend look at the report of the Macdonald royal commission which dealt in some depth with the same problem. He can glean some appreciation of the problem from that source. He can also look at the recent report of the Economic Council of Canada in which they investigated the same matter. There is a wide variety of other studies that have been made in connection with the general question of who loses and who gains if a freer trade regime were entered into.

I would point out to my honourable friend that over the past ten years there has been a most remarkable shift in tariff protection in Canada under GATT; so much so that in the next year or so, with respect to the United States, the tariffs on goods moving either way will be reduced to relatively small portions compared to what they would have been if nothing had been done. During the whole of that process adjustments to GATT had to be made and people moved from one job to another. That, of course, is a traumatic experience for them and I by no means minimize it. That is the reason the former government, as did this one, put in various measures to try to cushion the blow to those who had to make adjustments to these changing trade conditions. This is nothing new. This is a recurring feature of our adjustment to world and continental trading problems. I expect that we have not seen the last of them by any manner of means.

With respect to specific reports that the government may have available, I shall take that question as notice.

Senator MacEachen: I appreciate the particular undertaking that the Leader of the Government will advise us whether there are separate studies. However, what I have in mind is whether there has been an analysis, for example, of the impact on the agricultural industry and other industries in the economy which are now expressing concern about the free-trade approach.

It is obvious that when Mr. Reisman begins to negotiate with the United States he will have to know in precise detail the impact of any proposed changes on the job situation in Canada in every sector in every province. I think the sooner the rest of us know that too, the more informed would be a judgment on the impact of this change on the Canadian economy.

I appreciate that the Leader of the Government has assured us that he will get whatever information he can and tell us exactly what studies are under way.

Senator Roblin: I said that I would find out what information is available, and that is what I shall do.

I believe my honourable friend is well aware that part of the negotiating process with which Mr. Reisman will be involved will be hearing from the very people who will be affected in respect of the various propositions put forward. We will be dealing directly with the industries concerned, both those who may feel themselves threatened and those who may feel advantaged by the discussions that are taking place. As well as the reports which I am sure will be of some interest, I want to underline the policy of the government to maintain the closest negotiating posture it can with those people who will be in the front line when changes take place.

Senator MacEachen: That is the customary procedure in trade negotiations. It has always been the case that the closest consultation is kept with the various industries, and I assume that would continue to be the customary routine.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

REMOVAL OF IMPORT QUOTAS ON FOOTWEAR

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): I want to go back, if I may, to a comment the Leader of the Government made with respect to the footwear industry. He said that those affected would be assisted by various safety nets. I do not know what safety net has been put in place as a result of this new policy. I understand that the CIRB, the Canadian Industrial Renewal Board, which had been put in place to assist adjustment in these industries, particularly the textile industry, has run out of funds. Perhaps the Leader of the Government could throw some light on what these safety nets are that will help the footwear industry.

● (1420)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I certainly will, because I think it would be of interest to the house to have the full picture in that respect. But I point out to my honourable friend that, as he correctly stated, the policy of close liaison with people who are affected by trade changes is nothing new. It has worked very well in the past and I am confident that it will work very well in the future.

THE SENATE

"SENATE BULLETIN"

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. A few days ago I received a copy of the "Senate Bulletin"—which I think every senator receives—but it was a one month old. Some articles are out of date, while others have appeared in "Quorum", which we receive every day. I would like to know how much the "Senate Bulletin" costs to produce. I would also like to know who are the people responsible for publishing it. Perhaps they could provide any information not already printed in "Quorum" directly to that information bulletin so that we need receive only one publication and could get rid of the "Senate Bulletin", which is obsolete.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I would tell my honourable friend that this particular Senate news summary has been in existence for some time. It was not my idea, and I can tell my colleague that I never thought it had any great use at all. If I were following my own device, I would probably agree with him that we could do better than this report we have now, which is out of date and is self-serving in any case. Unfortunately, however, it does not fall under my direction and control.

Senator Denis: It falls under the control of whom?

Senator Roblin: It falls under the direction and control of the Senate itself, through the Internal Economy Committee. I am afraid that I do not control it. I would ask my friend to refer his question to the Internal Economy Committee, which I hope can provide him with some sort of answer.

Senator Denis: I thank the government leader. In that case, I am telling the Internal Economy Committee to look after that request.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the chairman of that committee is His Honour the Speaker. As deputy chairman, I can state that I am sure this matter will appear on the committee's agenda in due course.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

HEALTH AND EDUCATION—EFFECT OF REDUCTION IN TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to explain to this chamber how the federal government can justify cuts in transfer payments to the provinces in light of the protests of the provinces that such cuts will impair health and education services in those provinces.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think I should tell my honourable friend that the federal government is not proposing cuts. It is widely thought that it is, but I am here to say that there will be no cuts. In fact, the transfer payments will be steadily increased over the next five-year period, which increases will total around 5 per cent per year, as far as I know at the present time.

Senator Frith: It seems to me I've heard that song before—from us.

Senator Roblin: My reputation for accuracy is on the line here and I believe that what I am telling my honourable friend is correct. There will be no cuts.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers to questions.

[Senator Denis.]

STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE

STATUS OF STUDY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on September 24 last by the Honourable Senator Steuart respecting Strategic Defense Initiative—Status of Study.

(The answer follows):

Yes, Mr. Kroeger has completed his study and has reported on it to the Prime Minister; and, no, the study has not, nor will it be made public.

The report, while prepared with the assistance of External Affairs and other government departments, was the sole responsibility of Mr. Kroeger in his then capacity of special advisor to the Privy Council Office.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SOUTH AFRICA—APARTHEID—CANADIAN POSITION AT COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 16 last by the Honourable Senator MacEachen respecting Foreign Affairs—South Africa—Canadian Position at Commonwealth Conference.

(The answer follows):

The Canadian government is totally opposed to apartheid. The government favours unrelenting pressure on South Africa to change its unjust laws based on racial segregation. The objective is rapid and peaceful change based on dialogue rather than destructive violence. To that end, the government has introduced a wide range of new measures during the past year, including measures to make effective the Code of Conduct originally announced in 1978. Those measures are spelled out in the statement issued by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on July 6, and the statement he made to the House of Commons on September 13, which recapitulated the earlier measures. At the United Nations on October 23, the Prime Minister reiterated that total sanctions would be invoked if there was no progress.

The objectives for the Commonwealth meeting in Nassau were formulated in light of this policy. In working toward a consensus that would send a clear message to the Government of South Africa, Canada undertook a series of consultations. This included the visit to Canada of the British Foreign Secretary, the President of Tanzania, and the Secretary General of the Commonwealth. A personal representative of the Prime Minister, Mr. Bernard Wood, visited the Front Line States (Zambia, Botswana, Zimbabwe, Tanzania) to sound out their ideas. Views were also received from concerned Canadians; many useful suggestions were put forward. There was a general wish for Canada to play a conciliatory role and that there should be both unity and movement in any Commonwealth agreement.

The Commonwealth Accord reached in Nassau commits all of its members to certain measures including some that can be termed selective economic sanctions. It commits members to further effective measures in the absence of desired results within a reasonable time frame (6 months). All Commonwealth countries subscribed to the Accord without reservations. The Prime Minister gave a full report on the Accord to the House of Commons on October 28.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 16 last by the Honourable Senator Stewart respecting Canada-United States trade negotiations.

(The answer follows):

Prime Minister Mulroney expressed Canada's interest in pursuing a new bilateral trade agreement with the United States in his statement to the House of Commons on September 26.

The ball is now in the U.S. court. It is for the American Administration to pursue whatever domestic procedures it deems necessary before responding officially to the Prime Minister's offer and indicating whether the U.S. agrees to begin negotiations. On this matter it is worth noting the statement by U.S. Secretary of State Shultz on October 28 in Calgary on the bilateral trade initiative:

"President Reagan has warmly welcomed this initiative and the Administration has begun consultations with the Congress. On the basis of these early talks, and with our statutory requirements for consulting with Congress and the private sector in mind, we believe it will be possible to begin formal bilateral negotiations in 1986."

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

POLL—AWARDING OF CONTRACT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on November 5 last by the Honourable Senator Davey, respecting Supply and Services—Poll—Awarding of Contract.

(The answer follows):

This contract has not yet been awarded.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, while the Leader of the Government is reviewing unanswered questions, might I draw to his attention the questions which I have addressed to him on at least two occasions with respect to when an agreement will be reached between the Government of Canada and the Government of Nova Scotia with respect to the Sydney Steel Corporation. I raised the question first on May 14, 1985, and latterly on September 18, 1985, and I really would like an answer, if the Leader of the Government could oblige.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Well, it is easy to ask questions, but it is sometimes a little harder to get the answers, particularly when there are two parties in the deal—and in this case there are two parties in the deal, as my honourable friend has said. I always take his questions with great seriousness. I will give him an answer as soon as an answer can be offered; but at the present time agreement has not yet been reached, so it is not possible to reply.

Senator MacEachen: Are there unsettled questions between the Government of Canada and the Government of Nova Scotia? Is that the reason for the delay? Because it is now well over a year since it was expected and regarded as essential that the second phase of the modernization of the Sydney Steel plant be carried ahead. I wonder what the explanation is for the delay. Is the Government of Canada refusing the legitimate requests of Premier Buchanan?

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend can take it for granted that if I am unable to answer the questions because the two sides have not agreed, then he should also expect that I would not try to negotiate the deal in the Senate.

Senator MacEachen: Well, it might be a good idea.

Senator Roblin: If it were left to you and me, we would get along pretty well—provided I had my way.

Senator MacEachen: I could give you the figures.

Senator Roblin: I would want my own way, that's all.

Senator MacEachen: Don't we all!

HON. CYRIL B. SHERWOOD

FELICITATIONS ON INDUCTION INTO DAIRY HALL OF FAME

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, as chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry, may I beg the indulgence of the house to perform a very pleasant duty. I wish to announce that two nights ago Senator Sherwood of New Brunswick was inducted into the Dairy Hall of Fame.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Marshall: Senator Sherwood commenced farming at Norton, New Brunswick, in 1935, 50 years ago, as a fifth-generation Sherwood on a crown grant dating back to 1815. He very soon became active in farm organizations and was instrumental in organizing the New Brunswick Cream Producers' Marketing Board and the New Brunswick Milk Producers' Association.

Many of his accomplishments are listed and all are noteworthy. Senator Sherwood was President of the Saint John area Milk Producers' Association and the New Brunswick Milk Producers' Association. He was a Director of the Maritime Winter Fair Association, the Maritime Federation of Agriculture, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and the Dairy Farmers of Canada.

In 1952 he was named Minister of Agriculture for New Brunswick, a position which he held until 1960. As minister, he emphasized the importance of developing effective marketing programs to cover all farm commodities produced in the province. He authorized and supported the amalgamation of the provincial livestock show with the Fredericton Exhibition, which resulted in the development of the present well-rounded provincial exhibition held in the capital city.

In 1960 Senator Sherwood, as Leader of the Opposition, and he held that position until 1966, introduced a motion in the Legislative Assembly which established the royal commission investigation into the New Brunswick dairy industry.

In October, 1979, he was summoned to the Senate and he became Vice Chairman of the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Chairman of the Subcommittee on matters pertaining to development in Kent County, New Brunswick. He was instrumental in getting the Senate Committee on Agriculture to undertake hearings pertaining to soil degradation; and in 1984 the report of that committee entitled "Soil at Risk" was published.

With his knowledge, skill and dedication, Senator Sherwood has played a very prominent role in the advancement of the dairy industry both provincially and nationally. I am sure that all honourable senators join me in commending him on the recognition that he so richly deserves, namely, that of being inducted into the Dairy Hall of Fame in New Brunswick two nights ago.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND (LOTTERIES)—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall, for the second reading of the Bill C-81, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code (lotteries)".— (Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C.).

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, by the introduction of Bill C-81, the government has served notice that forever more and permanently it intends to abandon the field of lotteries and associated fund raising schemes. I believe that the decision to take this action has been taken without a full consideration of all the facts. I do not intend to speak at great length or in detail on this bill, but I can restrain my enthusiasm for the measure. It is not a good deal for the Canadian taxpayer, federal. Honourable Senator Nurgitz said yesterday that the bill is the product of an agreement between the federal and provincial governments. He hailed this new era of co-operative—

Senator Doody: Federalism.

Senator Perrault: I do not think he used the word "federalism."

Senator Flynn: That is Pearson's word.

Senator Perrault: But this new era of co-operation with provincial governments who are being ushered into a new, sunny upland of good relations with the federal government.

Senator Doody: We are getting to him.

Senator Perrault: These days, relations with the provincial governments, according to federal spokesmen, constitute a political "love-in". The government is engaging in an orgy of self-adulation about its alleged ability finally to work with the provinces.

Senator Doody: Almost narcissistic.

Senator Perrault: The fact of the matter is that in this deal the "Feds" bought the Brooklyn Bridge.

Senator Doody: They sure did, and you built it.

Senator Frith: Yes, we did build it.

Senator Perrault: They paid too much for the bridge. What are they giving up? This allegedly shrewd, canny deal negotiated by this steely-minded business-oriented federal government—

Senator Flynn: Terrible!

Senator Perrault: This deal involves the federal government's giving up one of the largest sources of revenue in the history of Canada for precious little return. Indeed, never in the history of this country has there been a larger revenue transfer from a federal government to a provincial government, with, I predict, very little thanks in the process.

Senator Frith: Sell the store.

Senator Perrault: Sell the store and the planking on the floor of the store.

Senator MacEachen: And the dock.

Senator Perrault: Yes, and the dock and everything else. Is it a good deal to say, "We shall no longer be tainted by any association with lotteries in any form?" Is that a good deal for the federal taxpayer?

Senator Flynn: Terrible!

Senator Perrault: What are we getting in return? In return we are getting $100 million for the Calgary Olympics, and it is a great event. It will make money. It will be an artistic and financial success and we should all be in support of the concept of having the federal government contribute. I am one of the foster fathers of the Calgary Olympics, and I am proud of that fact.

Senator Doody: Pray heavens.

[Senator Marshall.]

Senator Perrault: But we have $200 million of federal money committed to the Calgary Olympics. We have $100 million coming from the provinces, little enough. We will get approximately $30 million to $40 million from the coin and stamp program. We will get $400 million from ABC Television in the United States, one of the largest contributions to any Olympic Games. I think it is the largest in history, but Senator Nurgitz may wish to correct me on that point. The games will make money. After 1988 we will be discussing how the surplus will be distributed. That is how good that deal will finally be.

The provinces have said that they will give the $100 million to Calgary only if the federal government will guarantee that it will stay out of the lottery business forever. We made a deal, too. We made a deal before the government was unceremoniously ushered out of office.

Senator Flynn: Which government?

Senator Perrault: The Liberal government.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Doody: To the tune of 211 polls.

Senator Perrault: But we shall rise again. What was the Liberal deal? Yes, we agreed with the provinces on the $100 million.

Senator Nurgitz: Wasn't it a sports lottery?

Senator Perrault: But we made no agreement to amend the Criminal Code to make it impossible for the federal government ever to get back into lotteries again.

Senator Nurgitz: To save money.

Senator Perrault: It is not saving money at all.

Senator Nurgitz: You lost a fortune!

Senator Perrault: In net the contribution of the provincial government to the Calgary Olympics is $85 million, not $100 million, because $15 million was still left in the Lotto account and that money is reverting to the provinces.

Senator Flynn: How much from the Sports Pool?

Senator Perrault: We are not talking about the Sports Pool today, and it is not my intention to talk about the Sports Pool. Time does not permit.

Senator Doody: Just the good news, Ray.

Senator Perrault: Time does not permit a full development of my sentiments on that subject.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: I intend to demonstrate parliamentary restraint.

Senator Frith: Strict adherence to the rule of relevancy.

Senator Perrault: Yes, the word is "relevancy" and it is irrelevant to talk about the Sports Pool.

Senator Doody: The whole thing was irrelevant.

Senator Perrault: I am delighted with any sensible plan to help the Calgary Olympics, and we should all feel the same way. However, what kind of revenue loss are we looking at?

Senator Doody: That is irrelevant.

Senator Perrault: I just happen to have some facts and figures. Between June 1984 and June 1985, $1.8 billion worth of lottery tickets were purchased in Canada and $700 million flowed back to the provinces. And what are we saying? We are saying, "Just give us $100 million for the Calgary Olympics and we will get out of the lottery field and let you take over." When the idea of the national lottery was set up in 1974, it was designed to help the Montreal Olympic Games, which was another great success in that it provided great benefits for this country.

Senator Flynn: It was not a great success financially.

Senator Perrault: There are still some bills to be paid and some honourable senators are laughing about it. I know that it was not a great success financially, but in terms of the visitors who came and spent their dollars here on their vacations during that period, a good argument could be made that it was financially successful as well.

Senator Flynn: Then you do not need the lottery.

Senator Perrault: The lottery was established in 1974 with the support of all the provinces and all Canadians, who wanted the Montreal Olympics to be an artistic and financial success insofar as those goals were attainable. When that commitment was met in, I believe, 1976, Lotto Canada Incorporated was established. It continued the process of raising money for worthwhile causes. Where was the money to go? The money was to go to fight killers of Canadian people—to fight cancer, ALS, MS, muscular dystrophy and all the other medical problems. It was to be used to advance the arts, to develop Canadian talent in the larger cities of Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, yes, and in all the smaller communities to the outposts of Newfoundland. This money was going to help design and bring some justice and equity once and for all to the development of sports and fitness programs in this country. Those are the three great supportable goals which had the general support of the people in all parties.

Incidentally in the first three years of the establishment after Lotto Canada it netted $200 million which flowed back to the federal coffers to be spent in these worthwhile directions.

Senator Nurgitz: Then what happened?

Senator Perrault: In 1979, for some inscrutable reason—and the former distinguished Leader of the Opposition, the Honourable Senator Flynn, was part of that process—it was decided that the government would abandon the lotteries and make a deal with the provincial governments.

Senator Doody: Imagine, making a deal with the provincial governments!

Senator Perrault: Lotto Canada was a good thing. It was an opportunity to join together from coast to coast in national goals, endorsing national symbols and rallying national purpose to raise money for the good national causes I have described. The Conservative government did not agree with Lotto Canada. When they were elected to office they entered into negotiations with the provinces to abandon Lotto. It was an unfortunate retreat. They did not say to the provinces, "Look, we will abandon the field only if you will promise to use provincial lottery funds to fight against illness in this country. We will get out of this only if you promise you will use the money derived from lotteries for cultural purposes and sports development." They said, "Take it over, boys."

Senator Frith: Right this way.

Senator Doody: And girls.

Senator Perrault: Yes, boys and girls, and some of them in the federal government made very bad decisions.

Senator Frith: No self-respecting girl would make such a deal.

Senator Perrault: But, honourable senators, it was not a good deal for Canada. So when we were swept into power in 1980, during that tempestuous year—

Senator Frith: Ceremoniously.

• (1440)

Senator Perrault: Yes, it was ceremoniously done that time.

Senator Nurgitz: Tell us about it. I can hardly wait.

Senator Perrault: There was a problem; that Tory arrangement had been made with the provincial governments. Of course, as honourable senators are aware, the federal government was to receive an indexed $24 million per year as part of the deal which had been negotiated at that time by Mr. Paproski, who was the minister in the other place. The new Liberal government was then faced with the situation of staging the Calgary Olympics with no source of funds other than from tax revenues. We made that Calgary commitment for $200 million and then we set about trying to find that money from non-tax sources, and thus the introduction of the Sports Pool, which, admittedly, enjoyed indifferent success.

Senator Roblin: You can say that again.

Senator Flynn: It was at your own initiative.

Senator Perrault: It was not at my own initiative, honourable senators. May I put myself clearly on the record. I was never the minister responsible for the Sports Pool. However, I can say that one of the reasons why the Sports Pool did not enjoy the success which had been anticipated by its originators was the opposition of a number of provincial governments across the country, including many Conservative governments.

Senator Doody: That is the only kind there were.

Senator Frith: In the bad old days.

Senator Perrault: We were faced with making a commitment of $200 million to the Calgary Olympics and extra funds through the stamp and coin program and so on.

[Senator Perrault.]

When it became obvious that the Sports Pool was in some difficulty—and, in my view, the concept of the Sports Pool was partially unsound; its problems were not due entirely to intransigent provincial governments—I am not trying to foist the total blame in that direction. We made a deal with the provinces, as I said, for a $100 million contribution to the Calgary Olympics by the provinces with $24 million indexed, but we did not agree to amend the Criminal Code to abandon the lotteries field forever, and I think this is the costly mistake being made by the present government. As I said earlier, and I do not mean to be repetitious, $1.8 billion worth of lottery tickets were sold between June 1984 and June 1985, with $700 million going to various levels of government. Yet, we are only getting $100 million back for Calgary and the $24 million per year which is indexed, and we are clearing out entirely from the lotteries field. It is not the kind of deal which I think a government that has thought through the implications would have signed. Also, we have not received guarantees from those provincial governments that they intend to spend money for the useful purposes which were delineated at the outset of the whole lottery concept in 1974, and I think that is a great tragedy. We do not know whether these lottery funds will wind up being used for the paving of highways or for any other undesignated purpose, or whether they will be used for medical research, the arts and sports.

I have one concern, and I have mentioned it before in this chamber. Almost invariably, the larger centres in Canada get more than their fair share of athletic and sports development funds. I am from Vancouver and I know we were all heartened the other day to know that the B.C. Lions had won the Grey Cup, after 21 years.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: May I be candid with you when I say that the large cities in Canada get more than their share of athletic and sports type developments, and I think it is unfair.

Senator Frith: Now we are getting to relevance.

Senator Perrault: Vancouver, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Edmonton and Calgary, for example—and two or three others—are the only cities large enough in this country to host major national and international sports events. As soon as they indicate that they are willing to accept the hosting function for these events, the federal government comes in with massive amounts of money to build even larger stadia; to build swimming pools and to build all of the facilities that the deprived areas of Canada have been yearning for, and that is the fact of it. One of the tragedies of the Canadian Football League, for example—and I know that it is essentially professional but I merely want to indicate the concern many of us feel—is that we do not have a team from the Atlantic provinces playing in the Canadian Football League. One of the reasons is that the money is not there to build a stadium in the maritime provinces. Yet, if Nova Scotia or New Brunswick or Newfoundland or Prince Edward Island were large enough to say: "We are prepared to host the Commonwealth Games," they would have a stadium as large as the Edmonton Commonwealth Stadium, that magnificent structure in the province of Alberta.

I think there is a basic injustice here to the smaller cities and communities of our country. It was my hope, when I was Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport, that we could correct this over a period of years; that we could develop athletic facilities and programs in many of the smaller communities in Canada in order that they, too, could share in a program of development of capital and training facilities and programs across this country.

However, federally, we are now out of the field without any guarantees that that great source of revenue that the federal government once had for this purpose will ever again be directed toward this and medical research, culture and other worthwhile endeavours in this country. I had hoped that perhaps Senator Nurgitz might assure us that these considerations were on the agenda for the negotiations with the provincial governments. Were the provinces ever asked the question: "What will you do with the money?"

There is another concern, honourable senators, that I have with this bill, which, I am sure, has been drawn up with the utmost care. I know that some of the best legal minds of the government have directed their attention to the clauses which make up the bill. There have been suggestions from some quarters that Bill C-81, to amend the Criminal Code, could open up the potential for gambling casinos on almost a profligate scale in many parts of the country. Words of assurance have been given that that is not true at all; that there is no government in Canada today which will enter the field of licensing casinos to create "Nevada North". I do not think that is the intention of the government, but I wonder whether it might not be useful to refer this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for a relatively brief examination in order to make sure that certain assurances can be obtained from the minister and from the government.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps it would help Expo 86 at Vancouver.

Senator Perrault: That will also be a great event, honourable senators. It is partially supported by provincial lottery funds, incidentally. That is a useful purpose for those funds and we hope you will all come. We hope to have a Senate Day at Expo 86 and have you all attend.

Senator Roblin: That is the best news I have heard today.

Senator MacEachen: It will be a short visit.

Senator Perrault: I will not say more on the bill. I want to conclude by saying that many of those who have served with federal governments—

Senator Flynn: On the bill? I thought you were just beginning.

Senator Perrault: No. I have become mercifully briefer than I used to be. However, many of those who have served with federal governments have become rather cynical about these "good faith" transfers to the provincial governments, especially those on the scale of generosity represented by this Bill

C-81. The level of government which really requires money today is the federal government, and I said this in a debate last June. At that time, I said: "We are taking a popular, voluntary form of taxation, which is what lotteries are all about, and we are abandoning that field and allowing the provincial governments to expand their efforts in that area." I further said: "Inevitably it will mean that we will have to levy more direct taxes on the people and it will be more and more difficult for this government to raise money at a time when it requires that money." In that sense, I believe that it is improvident for the government to engage in a give-away on such a large scale at this time. I think that they could have concluded more successful negotiations with the provinces and ended up with more than the indexed $24 million per year from that huge take.

When the basic $24 million amount was established by the Conservative government in 1979, surely they did not anticipate that just a few years later we would be selling almost $2 billion-worth of lottery tickets per year. I think $24 million is too little. I think that the allocation of the funds by provincial governments should have been spelled out and developed more carefully and agreement achieved in that area. The Canadian people should have a better deal than that represented by Bill C-81.

In saying that, may I suggest again that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for further examination.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Nurgitz speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

• (1450)

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, in closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill, I want to thank Senator Perrault for his contribution to the debate. It is my intention to propose that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, which will meet to study the bill tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock. I invite Senator Perrault to attend that meeting and express his views to the minister. At that meeting he may be able to obtain from the minister the assurances he is seeking.

I do have one comment to make in connection with the notion that, through an amendment to the Criminal Code, we have stopped the federal government from once again wasting the taxpayers' money in connection with another sports pool.

The fact is, the Criminal Code can be amended to provide that authority to the federal government at any time in the future. In other words, this is not a Charter matter which would require all kinds of other consents for an amendment.

Senator Flynn: It can be so amended when Senator Perrault is again the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport.

Senator Nurgitz: Yes. Honourable senators, that concludes my remarks on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

SEEDS ACT CANADA GRAIN ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Balfour, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bélisle, for the second reading of the Bill C-64, intituled: "An Act to amend the Seeds Act and the Canada Grain Act".—(Honourable Senator Sparrow).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would ask that Order No. 2, standing in the name of Senator Sparrow, be permitted to stand instead in the name of Senator Steuart (Prince Albert-Duck Lake).

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands in name of Senator Steuart.

CANADA'S INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—INTERIM REPORT ON BILATERAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA'S PARTICIPATION IN RESEARCH ON STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Interim Report of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's International Relations pertaining to Bilateral Trade with the United States and Canada's Participation in Research on the Strategic Defense Initiative, tabled in the Senate on 17th September, 1985—(Honourable Senator Flynn).

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I adjourned the debate on Order No. 5 yesterday with the idea of eventually closing the debate on this item. If there is any honourable senator who wishes to speak to it, I shall be pleased to yield. If not, I shall deal with it in due course.

Order stands.

RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

CANADIAN FORCES—SPOUSES OF MEMBERS—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marsden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough):

That the Senate do urge the Government of Canada to permit freedom of assembly and speech, and such other freedoms guaranteed to all other Canadian citizens, for spouses of members of the Canadian Armed Forces.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday, when this item was dealt with in the chamber by Senators Marsden, Godfrey, Flynn, and myself, Senators Godfrey and Flynn asked some questions of the mover of the motion. I have since checked the record and I have found that indeed I said that I was not asking a question but was going to speak to the motion itself at that time.

So, technically I have already spoken to this motion. It is my intention to move an amendment at this stage, and I shall speak briefly to that amendment, if I have the leave of honourable senators to do so.

Honourable senators will recall that yesterday I did move the adjournment of the debate on this item, saying that I would be proposing an amendment. Since I did adjourn the debate, I suppose I do have leave to continue today. In any event, so that the record is clear, I think the simplest way to proceed is to obtain the permission of the Senate to proceed at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Fairbairn:

That the motion be not now adopted, but that it be amended by deleting the period after the word "Forces" and adding the words "and to amend or repeal all relevant regulations and orders accordingly."

Once the question is put on the amendment, I shall give a brief explanation of it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Marsden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough):

That the Senate do urge the Government of Canada to permit freedom of assembly and speech and such other freedoms guaranteed to all other Canadian citizens, for spouses of members of the Canadian Armed Forces.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn:

That the motion be not now adopted, but that it be amended by deleting the period after the word "Forces" and adding the words "and to amend or repeal all relevant regulations and orders accordingly."

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Flynn, in questioning the mover of the motion, Senator Marsden, raised the point that the motion as it now stands does not refer to any particular regulations or matters of law that ought to be changed to make them conform to the Charter. Senator Flynn pointed out that the motion as it stands in its original form would, in effect, be saying, if I understood him correctly, that the government is urged to make its rules and orders dealing with this subject conform to the Charter, or that eventually the matter could find its way into the courts and there be dealt with under the auspices of the Charter.

Senator Marsden and I had a look at some of the regulations and orders that are relevant to the motion in its original form. They are somewhat complex, and certainly it is not possible to refer to one or two only.

I suggest that the motion would be more in conformity with the objection raised by Senator Flynn if it were amended as I have suggested; that is to say, that the principle of the motion be adopted and that all relevant regulations and orders be amended or repealed accordingly.

When I proposed this amendment to Senator Flynn privately, he raised another interesting point, that being that the whole matter might best be referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. That committee, as honourable senators are aware, deals with the whole question of rules, regulations, orders, and other subordinate legislation that might be in conflict with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Given that that committee is reviewing that very question, it might be interested in the subject matter of this motion.

That is something, of course, that the Senate will have to decide upon. I must say that when Senator Flynn raised it with me, it seemed to me to be a useful suggestion. It strikes me as a very appropriate means of dealing with the motion at this stage; namely, to refer it to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments for examination. However, there may be other honourable senators who will want to debate the motion before such a reference is made, if indeed it is made.

● (1500)

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I think that was a good effort on the part of Senator Frith to clarify the intent of the motion of Senator Marsden. In principle, I have nothing against the idea of changing any regulation, any bylaw or any statutory instrument which would violate the Charter or the Bill of Rights. By adding this amendment I do not think we are going any further because the motion states:

—adding the words “and to amend or repeal all relevant regulations and orders accordingly.”

What regulations or orders are we referring to?

As Senator Frith mentioned, if any relevant regulations or orders were violating the rights under the Charter perhaps it would be necessary to have the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments look into them. I am not familiar with the procedure we should follow in dealing with this question. I do not know if there is an amendment that should be made to the amendment or otherwise, but I am certain that if Senator Marsden were to identify the regulations or orders, perhaps we could replace that motion with one referring these particular regulations and orders to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments which has the duty to indicate if there is any irregularity in any of these instruments.

Under those circumstances, I move the adjournment of the debate on the motion in amendment and perhaps Senator Marsden eventually can let us know if she has specific regulations or orders in mind. If she were to withdraw this motion and to replace it by one referring these specific regulations or orders to the joint committee, I think that the Senate would approve the motion without hesitation.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate on motion in amendment adjourned.

CENTRE BLOCK—REMOVAL OF PORTRAITS OF BRITISH PRIME MINISTERS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Hicks, calling the attention of the Senate to the removal of the portraits of former British Prime Ministers from the sixth floor of the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings.—(Honourable Senator Corbin).

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, on Wednesday, November 6, Senator Molgat gave notice, on behalf of Senator Hicks that on Thursday, November 7, he would call the attention of the Senate to the removal of portraits of former British Prime Ministers from the sixth floor of the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings.

My honourable colleague, Senator Hicks, did, indeed, raise the matter on the following day. I listened attentively to his remarks and decided then that I wanted to respond for a number of reasons that I will spell out today, tomorrow, next week and perhaps for some months to come.

What concerned Senator Hicks is, of course, the decision to remove the portraits or, more properly, the decision to have them hung somewhere else and who was responsible for that suggestion, if I may call it that. He said that he did not think:

—that that decision was any business of the Parliamentary Spouses' Association at all.

He then quoted the Leader of the Government in the Senate as saying:

Plans are now being made to have prints of the Canadian Prime Ministers hung in the corridor and a suitable location for photographs of the Prime Ministers

—that is, of the United Kingdom—will be found.

Senator Hicks did not tell us who had made the decision some time ago to hang the portraits in the first place. He said:

—that that row of photographs was exceedingly interesting. I thought they related to our history in a way that all of us could be proud of.

I wish that he had not referred to all of the British Prime Ministers, or that he had not included me in his conclusion. However, Senator Hicks has failed to illustrate his affirmation or support it with facts. It may be a foregone conclusion in his mind that all of these men and the one woman merit our equal and perpetual esteem because they happen to carry at some point in their lives the title of Prime Minister. I could not disagree more.

Senator Hicks says that:

—those portraits are part of our history.

I question the validity of that broad statement and the historical basis for it. He further states:

We should not try to turn our back on our heritage; we should be proud of the origins that have enabled us to create the institutions that belong to us today.

I could not agree with him more if the matter he raised related directly to the institution of the Canadian Parliament, but the Prime Minister is not Parliament in Great Britain or in Canada. The Prime Minister may or may not have influenced Parliament mightily and that, I suggest, is the subject of debate for another day. I fail to see, and the Honourable Senator Hicks has failed to establish, the relationship between the Prime Ministers of the United Kingdom and the institution of Parliament in Canada. I cannot take a blind leap of faith because he says so.

My respect for the Mother of Parliaments is unimpeachable. I could subscribe to the quote attributed to Joseph Howe but it should have been applied appropriately and correctly. We are talking here of our national records, our illustrious dead, our great structures and love of country and our national pride. Yes, but this is Canada.

Have the parliamentary wives desecrated a national shrine? They have merely responded to countless observations and comments heard by all of us and repeated by countless visitors to our parliamentary restaurant since the portraits hang in the hall leading to it. Are the parliamentary spouses, most of them wives, iconoclasts? I feel that our spouses, male and female, have made a valid contribution to Canadian national pride by suggesting a more suitable resting place for the late British Prime Ministers—at least most of them. The entrance to the restaurant, in my opinion, is not that suitable place.

● (1510)

Having said that, I would immediately invoke one exception. The portrait—and it should properly be called a photograph—of the late, the Right Honourable Winston Churchill, merits a particular place of honour in the Canadian Parliament; I would daresay almost second to our own Prime Ministers, and that is for reasons that I think would be obvious to most of you and which I can spell out in some detail if there is a request to that effect.

I do not wish to debate the merits of that particular politician and the great man he was in times of desperate crisis. He, of all British Prime Ministers, is perhaps the only one whom living Canadians readily acknowledge as outstanding. Besides, his photograph is the only portrait in the batch that can readily be called a work of photographic art; it is superlative. It is an all-Canadian product; the photographer being none other than Karsh. Canadians can be justly proud of the person and of the artistic medium-technique depicting him.

As for most of the others I say, along with the Leader of the Government in the Senate, “may they rest in a suitable location.”

In concluding, I should like to refer briefly to Spenser Compton, Earl of Wilmington and Prime Minister of Great Britain during a few short months in 1742 and 1743. I quote from The Prime Ministers by George Malcolm Thomson which states:

Not a complete fool, nor a man of any consequence, this “dull important lord” filled the four highest offices in the state for nearly thirty years. The consideration that was given to a minister was something that he enjoyed; others could wield the power and do the work; it was enough that he looked like a minister.

Let Wilmington with grave contracted brow

Red tape and wisdom at the council show

Sleep in the senate, in the circle bow.

He remained a bachelor, his life unspotted by amorous scandal, although Horace Walpole speaks of “private debauches, his only pleasure money and eating, his only knowledge forms and precedents; his only insinuations bows and smiles.”

For a few months, Wilmington was a stop-gap Prime Minister: no other achievement is remembered of his term of office. He died rich and left his money to his nephew. The British constitutional process moved on, barely noticing the brief intervention of the phantom.

Why should the portrait of that particular individual hang in the halls of the Canadian Parliament? Why should one find fault with a recommendation coming from the Parliamentary Spouses' Association? Honourable senators, I leave you with that thought.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Hicks, debate adjourned.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS REGULATIONS

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Consideration of the Fourth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications (subject-matter of the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Regulations), presented in the Senate on 27th June, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Langlois).

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I ask that this order stand until Wednesday next, December 3, 1985.

Order stands.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SEVENTY-FOURTH ANNUAL CONFERENCE, OTTAWA, AND SPRING CONFERENCE, LOMÉ, TOGO—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Peter Bosa rose, pursuant to notice of Thursday, November 7, 1985:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Seventy-fourth Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union which was hosted by Canada in Ottawa from 2nd to 7th September 1985, as well as to the spring Conference which took place in Lomé, Togo, from 25th to 30th March, 1985.

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to speak today about this year's work of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, and especially about the 73rd Conference, held in Lomé, Togo, and the 74th Conference, held here in Ottawa. I shall also make brief mention of some smaller meetings, notably those in Nairobi on environmental issues, and in Mexico on disarmament.

I think you can already see from my opening remarks that the IPU has been dealing with some of the most vital issues confronting today's world. The great problems of disarmament, pollution, unemployment, and political and economic development in Africa and elsewhere appear in our newspapers and on our television screens and radio broadcasts every day, rivetting our attention and demanding that we do something concrete to develop solutions. We need global approaches and worldwide co-operation to deal effectively with many of these issues, and this can only be realized by working through such organizations as the United Nations and the Inter-Parliamentary Union.

This year was the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations. It was also the 96th year of the IPU—a time of renewal for this institution following a period of some organizational difficulties owing to growth in membership, heavy participation in the conferences, and over-lengthy sessions.

The Ottawa Conference, from the 2nd to the 7th September, marked both the anniversary of the United Nations and the restoration of confidence in the IPU, and was a magnificent success which testified most favourably, I believe, to the hard work and enthusiasm of all who helped to direct it and make it function effectively. My colleagues and I, who were members of the Canadian Executive Committee and the Canadian delegation to the meeting, have received messages of thanks and appreciation from parliamentarians from all quarters of the globe, and feel sure that the success of the Ottawa conference was a major international achievement for Canada.

If the IPU wanted to select a title for last year's work, I think it could describe it as "The year of Africa and other world problems."

The first IPU meeting attended by Canadian parliamentarians in 1984-85 was in Nairobi, Kenya. It took place from 26th November to 1st December, 1984; and was sponsored jointly by the IPU and the United Nations Environment Program. It dealt with a range of general, worldwide environmental problems, not solely with the African situation. Nonetheless it gave some of our parliamentarians an opportunity to experience the African situation first hand, and to see something of the efforts and the achievements of African peoples as well as the difficulties they face. As we all know, Nairobi is a modern and dynamic city, which must feel many of the same kinds of urban pressures we ourselves feel on this continent. At the same time, delegates surely could not help but get some sense, in Kenya, of the urgency of the human and environmental problem in many of the African countries, especially since the Ethiopian tragedy was at its height at the time of that IPU meeting.

● (1520)

Members of the Canadian IPU delegation attending the Nairobi meeting were Mr. Benno Friesen, M.P., Chairman of the Canadian group, the Honourable H.A. "Bud" Olson, P.C., Mr. Bill Blaikie, M.P., the Honourable Charles Caccia, P.C., M.P., and Mr. Stan Darling, M.P. They were assisted by Miss Carol Chafe, Deputy Executive Secretary of the Canadian group, His Excellency David Miller, Canada's Commissioner to Kenya and Permanent Representative to the United Nations Environment Program, and the staff of the High Commission in Nairobi. About 100 delegates from various parts of the world participated in this gathering.

The Lomé Conference in the early spring enabled many of us to experience Africa for the first time, at first hand. We were very well received by our hosts, including His Excellency General Gnassingbé Eyadema, Founding President of the Rally of the Togolèse People and President of the Republic of Togo. In addition to effective participation in conference sessions, we visited many educational and other facilities in Togo, some of them assisted and sponsored by Canadian aid programs. Madame Suzanne Duplessis, Député, and I also had the pleasure of visiting the People's Republic of Benin, at the invitation of the Beninese authorities, on March 28.

I think we Canadians were all impressed with the warmth and spontaneity of the African people and with their efforts to develop their potential in ways fitting their own perspectives and social patterns. Togo is a beautiful country. It may not be the richest on earth, but it certainly appears to have a reasonable standard of living and good prospects. It is green and orderly, with a mixture of agriculture, tourism, industry and phosphate production. Except, perhaps, in the far north, 500 kilometres away from Lomé, it has not suffered from the drought and related problems which are now causing such havoc in those African states which run in a band beneath the Sahara.

Nonetheless, the drought problem was clearly on our minds in Lomé. One of the main items on the agenda was the question of famine, desertification and drought in Africa, and in this work the Canadian delegation played its full part. Mr.

Lee Clark, M.P., prepared and submitted a draft resolution on our behalf, and then played an active part in the committee work and drafting sessions. A resolution was then adopted unanimously by the conference, drawing attention to the urgency of the situation and calling for effective measures to control and combat it.

Owing to disturbances going on in South Africa at the time of the Lomé conference, an emergency supplementary item was introduced concerning "the recent events in Langa and the repression in southern Africa." A resolution was put forward on this question and was adopted by acclamation.

The other work of the conference included the following matters: First, a resolution on the problem of international debt was adopted by consensus. Senator Rhéal Bélisle and Mr. Stan Hovdebo spoke on this issue in the plenary debates, and Mr. Geoff Wilson prepared and submitted a Canadian draft resolution.

Second, a resolution concerning disarmament, the Middle East, the Iran-Iraq war and Red Sea navigation was discussed in the Political Committee, among speakers who were sometimes bitterly divided. Some amendments on disarmament which I presented on behalf of our delegation helped to promote agreement on some issues, but other differences could not be reconciled despite the best efforts of Mr. Marcel Prud'homme of our delegation, who was presiding in his capacity as chairman of the committee. A text was eventually adopted in the conference by 718 in favour, 178 against and 75 abstentions. The Canadian delegation had 14 votes at its disposal and divided them two in favour, eight against and four abstentions.

Mme. Duplessis spoke in the plenary debates on the disarmament issue, focusing on the problem of chemical weapons. Mr. Benno Friesen, leader of the delegation, and I participated in the plenary debate on the general world situation, and also represented our group in the Inter-Parliamentary Council and the caucus of western and like-minded delegations known as the Ten-Plus.

The Canadian delegation to the Lomé conference was accompanied by Mrs. Friesen, Mrs. Bosa, Mme. Bélisle, Mrs. Clark, Mr. Duplessis, Mrs. Hovdebo and Mrs. Wilson. We were assisted by Mr. Martin Lavoie, Executive Secretary of the group, Mr. Roger Hill, Adviser, and Mr. Gordon Lovelace, Director of Information Services. Mr. Charles Lussier, Clerk of the Senate, and Mr. Claude Desrosiers, Principal Clerk, Table Duties, House of Commons, participated in meetings of the Association of Secretaries General of Parliament. Mrs. Hill and Mme. Lussier also accompanied the delegation.

During our time in Africa, the delegation was admirably assisted by His Excellency Frederick G. Livingston, Canada's High Commissioner to Ghana and Ambassador to Togo, and Mrs. Livingston, and by Mr. James Stone, Second Secretary of the Embassy. They did everything they possibly could to make our visit interesting and worthwhile.

Before going to Lomé, the delegation leaders attended a meeting of the Ten-Plus in Madrid. We were warmly welcomed and assisted by Canada's Ambassador to Spain, His Excellency Christian Hardy, and by Mrs. Hardy and the embassy staff.

As I have just mentioned, one of the items on the IPU agenda in Lomé dealt partly with disarmament. This topic has long been an important concern of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, and the debates in Lomé were soon resumed at another IPU meeting, the Inter-Parliamentary Symposium on Disarmament Relating to Conventional Weapons that was held in Mexico City from May 28 to 31, 1985. This brought together parliamentarians, experts and staff from all parts of the world, including, for Canada, Senator Paul Lucier and Mr. Ross Belsher, M.P.

Turning now to the Ottawa conference, I think it is a cause for great pride that this meeting was such a success. Seven hundred and forty one delegates from 94 countries attended the conference. Some delegates were accompanied by their spouses. Here was the world's oldest political international organization meeting in our capital and continuing the work of examining the vital world issues and bridge-building among parliamentarians which is so necessary in today's world.

Once again, Africa was at the forefront. One major item on the conference agenda was decolonization, and this naturally focused mainly on the situation in Namibia, formerly known as South West Africa. The debates also dealt with the problems of South Africa, the western Sahara, and the various non-self-governing territories remaining in the world. Mrs. Mary Collins of our delegation played a leading role in this work, speaking in the plenary debates, chairing the drafting committee which prepared a resolution, and serving as rapporteur. Dr. Howard McCurdy also participated in the drafting group sessions. The impact of current events in southern Africa made it impossible to achieve a consensus resolution. The final text was adopted by 678 votes in favour, 143 against and 101 abstentions. The Canadian delegation had 14 votes and cast them four in favour, two against and six abstentions.

Another very important item on the agenda dealt with the problem of the illicit international drug traffic, as well as the International Youth Year and the rights of youth. Our delegation had proposed the drug issue in Lomé, but had not been too happy to see it combined with youth questions, since we believe that illicit drug use and trafficking are problems of society as a whole. All of society is responsible; young people are all too frequently the victims.

● (1530)

As it happened, the work on the drug question and the youth situation proceeded very successfully. Eventually, a text was unanimously adopted, which clearly distinguished between the two aspects of the item. The Honourable Allan Lawrence played a key role in the work on the drug issue, giving a very forceful speech in the plenary debates and serving as chairman of the drafting group and rapporteur. Mr. Lawrence and I also worked on a memorandum on the drug question, which was circulated to all delegations. Dr. Howard McCurdy led the work on youth issues, speaking in the plenaries and also representing our delegation in the drafting sessions and committee work.

A supplementary item was added to the agenda concerning the international debt problems of developing countries. Mr. Gilbert Chartrand and Mr. Marcel Prud'homme participated in the committee work on this issue. A resolution was adopted by consensus, but with reservations on some paragraphs by various national delegations, including our own.

A meeting of women delegates was also convened during the conference, chaired by Mme. Suzanne Duplessis of our Executive Committee. More than ten Canadian women parliamentarians helped to host this luncheon, which I believe was a successful event. A resolution was adopted concerning opportunities for women delegates to participate more strongly in IPU meetings.

In addition to the members already mentioned, Mr. Friesen, Senator Bélisle and I participated in various ways in the plenary sessions, committee work and delegation activities of the conference. Mr. Friesen was elected President of the Conference, and then to a seat on the IPU Executive Committee. He and I represented our delegation in the Inter-Parliamentary Council and the Ten-Plus meetings. I spoke in the plenary debates, noting that 1985 was the fortieth anniversary of the founding of the United Nations and expressing the hope that the superpowers and other countries would overcome the causes of mistrust among them and develop a new spirit of co-operation.

The Ottawa conference also provided an excellent opportunity to show something of Canada to the outside world. One highlight was the opening ceremony, in the presence of Her Excellency, Mme. Jeanne Sauvé, the Governor General. Speakers were introduced by Mr. Prud'homme, and included Mr. Friesen, Chairman of the Canadian Group; the Honourable Harvie André, Associate Minister of National Defence; the Honourable Guy Charbonneau, Speaker of this chamber; the Honourable John Bosley, Speaker of the House of Commons; and Mme. Sauvé herself.

Another spectacular highlight of the conference was the gala evening on September 4, a fine show of musical and other entertainment which was introduced by Mme. Suzanne Duplessis and Dr. Howard McCurdy. It was very well received by the audience and was carried from coast to coast on national television. In addition to these events, there were two programs of visits for delegates and accompanying persons to see something of Ottawa, Montreal, Upper Canada Village, and such facilities as the Chalk River Nuclear Laboratories of the Atomic Energy Company of Canada. The educational visits, for example, were so popular that they were invariably booked up well in advance.

The Canadian delegation was as active in the social events as it was in the debates and committee work of the conference. Mr. Friesen, Senator Bélisle, Mr. Lawrence, Dr. McCurdy and I were accompanied by our wives, and Mr. Prud'homme was accompanied by his sister.

Members of the Executive Committee of the Canadian Group, and alternate delegates, also took a keen interest in the conference, including participating in lively morning caucuses and attending the plenary debates. Those participating included Senator Eymard G. Corbin, the Honourable Robert Howie, Dr. Bruce Halliday, Mme. Suzanne Duplessis and Mr. Ian Deans.

The success of the conference represented a major achievement for the Canadian group and the senators and members from both houses who worked so hard and so long to make it a memorable event. In addition, success depended heavily on the excellent organizational and staff work carried out by the Parliamentary Relations Secretariat, other branches of the administration, and advisory and support groups. The list of names of those who contributed is far too long for me to mention everyone here. I simply want to assure everyone concerned that their efforts were deeply appreciated.

We were all sorry to see the Ottawa conference end and our many friends return to their own countries. We hope that they will all remember Canada very warmly, and will carry forward, to further stages, the substantive work which was accomplished at the conference. The fact that more than 100 journalists were accredited to the Ottawa meeting underlines the extent to which the media focused its attention on the IPU Conference. We hope that the ideas developed in Ottawa will have a positive influence on parliaments, the public and governments at home and abroad.

Canada has been and continues to be a solid supporter of the IPU. Having hosted the fall conference in Ottawa, Canadians have had the opportunity to see for themselves the very important work that the IPU does. As vice chairman of the Canadian group, I am pleased to have played a part in the organization of the conference and in the activities of the IPU and I thought that I should share with honourable senators the highlights of the activities that have taken place during the past 12 months.

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

SEIZURE OF EGYPTIAN AIRCRAFT—EXPRESSION OF OUTRAGE— EXPRESSION OF CONDOLENCES

Hon. H. A. Olson, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, November 26, 1985, moved:

That the Senate express its shock and outrage at the recent terrorist attack on the Egyptian aircraft and urge that an international effort be made to strengthen security measures at airports to reduce the risk of this happening in future; and

That the Senate express sincere condolences to the families of all the victims.

He said: Honourable senators, I appreciate the Senate's giving leave yesterday to revert to Notices of Motions to enable me to place this motion on the order paper. I will endeavour to be brief.

I consider it appropriate that we say a few words about the recent hijacking, because two Canadians from Beiseker, Alberta, who were on board the aircraft, were murdered—I consider that to be the right term—in this incident. The wording of the motion, whereby we express shock and outrage, is appropriate, because even for hijacking we have now hit a new low, when hijackers murder people. They murdered a 16-month old baby and, I believe, four women, including one Canadian.

We are not absolutely certain of all of the facts, because the trial of the one hijacker who is still alive has not yet been held. However, I believe that we should express formally our shock and outrage at this incident.

I do not wish to say much more about it at this time, but I am sure that all honourable senators will mourn with me the loss of Valinda June Leonard and her son, 16-month old Andrew Leonard, who died either from the effects of a hand grenade or from the fire and smoke inside the aircraft that followed the commando rescue attempt.

The people I have mentioned were completely innocent of being involved in any kind of political action, either in that part of the world or elsewhere. Mrs. Leonard's husband, Edward, is a landscape engineer from Calgary, working in the Middle East. His wife was making this trip because I understand there is a six-month limit on visas for spouses.

I will conclude by thanking honourable senators for giving me the opportunity to express on their behalf sincere condolences to the families of the victims. I will ensure that a copy of the debate is sent to the Leonard family, after its publication tomorrow.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

● (1540)

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, it was for me a sad personal experience yesterday to have seconded Senator Olson's motion expressing the Senate's condolences to the bereaved Leonard and Uffelman families in their sorrow over having lost Valinda and her son, Andrew, in that tragic EgyptAir hijacking in Valletta, Malta last Sunday. I consider as close friends the Leonard family of Etobicoke, Ontario, who have suffered another personal tragedy this year. In conveying to them and to the Uffelman family our deepest sympathy, I would like to express also our admiration and respect for the courage and understanding with which these families have responded to the tragic ending of 60 lives by the senseless acts of barbarous terrorists.

I think it is also proper in debating this motion today, to offer to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, our appreciation for his having offered the services of the Canadian government to transport the remains of these two innocent Canadians back to Canada and also to thank the Canadian and Maltese diplomats with whom I was in contact on Sunday several times.

Added to the horror that we feel over the tragic death of these innocent victims, is our deep sense of frustration and anger at the failure of governments to prevent the recurrence of hijackings and other acts of international terrorism. We should ask ourselves today why our governments are so ineffective in preventing aircraft hijackings by armed terrorists who seem to get on board our aircraft and other means of transportation so easily. This tragedy in Malta should end any complacency that air piracy is on the decrease and that it has not been such a tragic thing in the past. This tragedy in Malta also reinforces the need for more international co-operation to prevent terrorism. This tragedy urgently calls for swift and stringent regulations and other provisions by the International Civil Aviation Organization and the International Air Transport Association. Furthermore, the United Nations, with the good record of its peacekeeping forces, should also get involved in an effective way to fight international terrorism and air piracy.

We in Canada should spare no costs in ensuring that healthy and safe air transportation is available to the air-travelling public. The public should be reassured that we are doing our best to prevent air piracy in Canada. We should increase our efforts to help solve the Middle East conflict, which has generated so many acts of terrorism, not only in the Middle East, but in other countries.

Even though we are living in an imperfect world, we should never give up efforts to make this world a safer place in which to live. Next month Canadian External Affairs officials will be attending a special meeting between officials of the seven western summit countries in Bonn. I hope that the Canadian contribution will be concrete and very forceful. I also look forward to reports by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Transport on the matter of air safety in Canada, and as it relates to international travel. I hope, too, that such reports will be referred to our appropriate parliamentary committees for examination. I think these steps will go a long way in helping to reassure the air travelling public and in clearing the doubts and concerns that trouble many Canadians today.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I just take a moment to reinforce the sentiments expressed by my honourable colleagues opposite. Senator Olson said that he was sure that he spoke on behalf of the members of this house. I would like to underline and reinforce the unanimity of this side in expressing our sincere condolences to the families of the victims. It has already been said eloquently by my honourable friends opposite, but this international terrorism is something that becomes very real when it begins to affect citizens of our own country who seem to be far removed from that sort of thing. I agree that an international effort should be made on this problem, and I am sure that it is in the process of being made. It is not an easy problem to solve, and I do not envy those who have the responsibility for it. I congratulate Senator Olson and Senator Haidasz for bringing this motion before the Senate and I fully concur in their sentiments.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to add a short footnote to this motion. I do not know how many honourable senators share a feeling I experience when I hear about events of this kind. We usually hear about them on the radio or television or read about them in the papers. It may be just a personal reaction, but I find myself resenting these hijackers being described as international terrorists. There is a certain aura of glamour, adventure and political martyrdom associated with that description. Of course, they want to present themselves in a good light so they give their gangs names with a certain glamorous dimension and connotation. Society tries to organize itself on the basis of giving, no matter what the political system is, some opportunity to express political dissent. It is not the same in all countries, of course. I can understand why persons who cannot get their political beliefs implemented feel a sense of frustration and may be tempted to try illegitimate means to achieve those objectives. However, it seems to me that these people who succeed in having themselves described as terrorists and hijackers and who use all these glamorous sounding names are really the most cowardly of criminals. Even organized crime in its violence normally leaves what they call the "straight people" alone. They fight amongst themselves.

However, I am very suspicious as to how really politically motivated a number of these people are. They take innocent people; they hold them as hostages and they arm themselves to do so. They never arm themselves, you will notice, to fight other armed people. They do not take on the armies of the establishments with which they disagree.

Senator Nurgitz: That might take courage.

Senator Frith: That might take a little more courage. They themselves might actually have to look down a gun barrel. But they are always on the butt end of the gun; they are always pointing those guns and making those threats at people who are totally incapable of defending themselves, including children, and then hear themselves being described in some mild, vaguely heroic terms. That, I suppose, is one of the reasons, although not a complete answer at all to Senator Haidasz's question as to why it is so hard to deal with these people.

The press, of course, is in a difficult position. There is an event that is worthy of reporting, but I often feel that the press squeeze the last drop out of it, and from what I know of the psychological make-up of such people, I believe they get a thrill out of the whole thing because day after day they find themselves the centre of attention; an attention that they otherwise have never been able to get.

Senator Nurgitz: It is a media event.

Senator Frith: It becomes a media event. They become performers and, while they are playing their games, their cowardly games, innocent people are injured; innocent people are terrorized and innocent people are killed.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

MR. HUBERT GRIFFITH, EDITOR OF DEBATES (ENGLISH)—
FELICITATIONS ON COMPLETION OF 25 YEARS OF SERVICE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that Mr. Hubert Griffith, the Editor of Debates and Chief of Reporting Services (English), celebrated, on November 1, the twenty-fifth anniversary of his service to the Senate, and I believe we would all like to take notice of that fact and to congratulate him on the event.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

INCOME TAX ACT AND RELATED ACTS

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-84

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators will recall that yesterday we discussed referring the subject matter of two bills to committee for pre-study. I am pleased to inform honourable senators that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has agreed to find time to handle those bills. I am grateful to the chairman, Senator Murray, for having agreed to that and for listening to the wisdom of my argument, which I believe was the only bright spot in an otherwise rather dull morning.

Senator Frith: A frustrating morning.

Senator Doody: A frustrating morning.

Therefore, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-84, intituled: "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and related statutes and to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, the Financial Administration Act and the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

TAX REBATE DISCOUNTING ACT

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED
TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-83

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-83, intituled: "An Act to amend the Tax Rebate Discounting Act", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, December 3, 1985, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to return to a subject which was raised yesterday having to do with trade. Is it a fact that the government has decided that all items should be placed on the bargaining table, with the specific exceptions mentioned by the Prime Minister in his statement in the House of Commons when he referred to the sovereignty of Canada and certain other matters? Are all matters, other than those, on the table for negotiation including agricultural products?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is an important question and I would not like to answer it off the cuff so I will take it as notice.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, my point in asking the question is that in the statement made by the Premier of Quebec about areas of shared jurisdiction it would be the view of the Province of Quebec that products in those areas could not be put on the table without the consent of the provinces. The premier took the view, for example, that communications and agriculture could not be negotiated without the consent of the province. In other words, the province would have a veto on the question as to whether these items would go on the table. I should like to ask the Leader of the Government to deal with that subject when he is dealing with the first point I made.

Senator Roblin: It raises a very nice constitutional point. Relying on my memory, I do not think that in the past provinces have claimed a veto on matters of joint constitutional interest in connection, in particular, with the GATT negotiations. This, I think, is a new approach to the matter, but it is an important one and I will try to find out the answer for my friend.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to raise once again the subject which I have already raised very often. This time I raise it having had the benefit of the announcement by the Minister of Agriculture in the other place as to the government's drought assistance program. If I may be pardoned, I would say that it was a very disappointing announcement. The amount of money was inadequate. It looks like the government wishes to be a Scrooge with the farmers of western Canada. This is particularly clear when you compare the $150 million announced to the billion dollars or more provided to bail out the depositors of banks.

Senator Flynn: Oh, come on!

Senator Argue: The farmers asked for half a billion dollars in Saskatchewan, and with half a billion dollars for other areas the total would be a comparable amount, and still the announcement is probably 10 or 15 per cent of what the producers asked for and, I think, had a right to expect. The demand was for $50 an acre and was supported by political representatives at every public meeting. The calculation here is based on $5 an acre, or perhaps a little more.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: Does the government expect the provincial governments to come forward with a matching program of payments in the disaster area, or is there likely to be for Saskatchewan, for example, a matching program by the provincial government so that the $150 million might at least be doubled?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, of course I am unable to say what the provinces are going to do in the future but I can tell my honourable friend my understanding of what they are doing right now. The amount of $150 million which the federal government is contributing as its share is based on topping up the crop insurance from 70 per cent to an 80 per cent figure. Our original proposal to the provinces was that they should match it so that it would amount to $300 million directly in this program. This proposition was accepted by the Province of British Columbia but it was not accepted by the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. Those provinces said, "It is all very well for you to offer us this suggestion but we are going to have to make up our own minds as to how we are going to distribute the money, but we do undertake to contribute in another form an amount equal to what you have been contributing under this program," and this is what they are doing. The Province of Alberta has a program of $212 million which includes the farm fuel system and also special consideration for livestock in Alberta. They are also providing a concession of fuel taxes in Saskatchewan, 21 cents per litre, and they also have a farm loan program, of which my honourable friend is aware, at a 6 per cent interest rate. So they have their own programs, and their contribution, though not the same as ours, provides at least the same amount of money, and in some cases a good deal more. In Alberta the fuel tax concession is 14 cents per litre. That is the contribution that the provinces are making so far.

● (1410)

One has to remember—and I do not have all the figures with me right now—that this particular program which the federal government is sponsoring is not the first it has sponsored in response to the drought situation. The sum of $42 million has been provided with respect to livestock and over the past couple of years a couple of billion dollars have been contributed in crop insurance, to which the federal government, along with everybody else, makes a substantial contribution. While I would not for a moment pretend that this program is going to be satisfactory in the sense that it meets all the demands that are being made, it does represent a substantial contribution toward easing the problem.

Senator Argue: I appreciate the minister's reply. I am not exactly sure as to what he said about Saskatchewan. I guess I should ask him whether or not there is a possibility that the Province of Saskatchewan will match this amount, or is it clear from what he said that the programs in place or recently announced in Saskatchewan are the only Saskatchewan programs? I would point out to the minister that the Saskatchewan program is in no way a drought assistance program. It is available to every farmer on an equal basis across the province, so it cannot be considered a crop disaster program. It is an agricultural support program available to everybody. I would like to know whether there is another factor involved here; namely, that Saskatchewan will match the federal program directed to the disaster area.

I would like to ask the minister another question, and if he does not have the details I will understand. It is pretty clear to me from what the Minister of Agriculture stated in the other place that these payments will be made to producers who have had accumulated crop losses primarily due to drought over the past three years. My question is: Is a producer who had a total crop failure in 1985 but an average crop in the years just prior, entitled to a payment under this program?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am not able to give my honourable friend that information this afternoon for obvious reasons. While it is a very important question, it is clearly one of detail and administration. I shall find out the answer to it. With respect to his first question, I reiterate that in connection with its present programs the Government of Saskatchewan is spending an amount that is at least equal to that being contributed by the federal government. It is within the constitutional purview of the Province of Saskatchewan to bring in any program it likes. We in the federal government are in no position to tell the province how it should be done. That is the responsibility of the Government of Saskatchewan and I respect it and I think we should all respect it. We have offered a suggestion. We have done our part. They have said that they will match us in terms of dollars but they want to provide their assistance in another way, and I think we have to accept that. As to what the Government of Saskatchewan will do in the future, the honourable senator had better address his question to them.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Argue: I would dispute the statement the minister has made, not that he does not believe it to be accurate, that the Saskatchewan government has contributed or will contribute by its announced programs to the drought area anywhere near the amount of money that is being contributed and has been announced by the federal government. The Saskatchewan program, I think, will still fall short for everybody and, as I said, it is not targeted specifically to the drought area.

Can the minister explain to the house why the beef producers were singled out for preferred treatment? The beef producers in the disaster area have received $60 per head. I will not go into the mathematics of it, but that is the total. Every beef producer in the drought area gets a payment without question. You have the brood cows, the sows and so on. However, for the grain producers there is a means test. Why is there this difference in attitude by this government?

Senator Roblin: I do not think there is any difference in attitude. The amount of $48 million was provided for the beef producers in the drought area and some $150 million is being provided for the farmers who are interested in other forms of agriculture. To my mind they are being treated on a reasonably equitable basis.

Senator Argue: They are not all the same at all, because the fact that grain producers live in the drought area does not entitle them per se to anything under this announced program. However, the beef producer, whether that producer had plenty of hay this year, last year, and the year before that, gets paid.

Does the Leader of the Government in the Senate realize that the payments under this assistance program will average out for the producers of western Canada to about half as much as a family living in a city could obtain under the Canada Assistance Plan?

Senator Roblin: Payments under the Canada Assistance Act are available to farmers as well as to those who live in our cities, assuming there is a demonstrated need. I do not think that sort of comparison is helpful at all. To my mind, it merely incites people to envy or to express dissatisfaction in other ways with their situation.

It is perfectly true that any program of this nature is not going to be completely fair and equitable. In the nature of things, that doesn't happen. We have to get as close to being completely fair and equitable as we can. We are saying to those farmers in the drought area who have suffered crop losses that they are entitled to assistance on this basis, and that is what we mean.

It is quite possible that there might be one or two people in that area who did not experience the drought. It may be that they are living just outside the municipality affected. If that is the case, notwithstanding that they are outside the municipality or the so-called drought area, if they have a case for assistance, it is available to them.

Senator Argue: The facts are clear. The producers in the drought area will not all get assistance. I can tell the minister that in the case of the province of Saskatchewan, farmers are barred, by policy, from getting payments under the Canada Assistance Plan, the ground for refusal being the fact that these individuals did have an income in the prior year. They are told to sell their farms and to use their crop insurance cheque to support their families, notwithstanding that the crop insurance money is already committed to operations in the upcoming year.

The test for farmers is not simply one of whether or not the farmer has any available income; it is different, and as a result of it, farmers are barred from assistance under the Canada Assistance Act.

Senator Roblin: Well, I am not sure that I can agree with my honourable friend's analysis of the situation.

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—1983 STABILIZATION PAYMENT

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I was deeply distressed to learn yesterday that there wasn't any announcement whatsoever of any assistance in terms of a 1983 stabilization payment for sugar-beet producers, and of particular concern to me are those sugar-beet producers in southern Alberta who did not plant a crop this year.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate, in answer to a question on an earlier date, indicated that the issue of the 1983 stabilization payment was bound up with discussions respecting drought assistance.

My question to him is: When can we expect an announcement in respect of a 1983 stabilization payment for the sugar-beet industry?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I should clarify my statement, in the event that my honourable friend has misunderstood it, respecting the relationship between the drought assistance and the sugar-beet situation.

While each element stands on its own feet, they have a common interest, that common interest being the amount of money that is available for assistance to the agricultural industry. That is the connection between the two.

The minister in charge of the beet policy is still struggling with it, in an endeavour to find something that can be offered to those producers. However, as I said the other day, I have no news on that matter that I can advise my honourable friend of at the present moment.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: I have a supplementary question. The policy regarding payments to sugar-beet growers is really unrelated to the establishment of a long-term sugar-beet policy. Admittedly, a long-term sugar-beet policy is required. The policy respecting retroactive payments is a long-standing one. This now goes back to 1983, in relation to a crop that was planted by sugar-beet growers in three provinces, all in the expectation that the policy previously in effect would be continued.

Whether or not there will be a new sugar-beet policy is something else altogether, but surely the question of that stabilization payment can be resolved now.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend's argument is persuasive. I like the sound of it myself and I am doing my best to see if something can be done about it.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, my question really is a supplementary to a question raised by Senator MacEachen. I understood the government leader in the Senate to say that in matters of trade where there was an element of shared jurisdiction, to his knowledge, the position taken by provinces was not that they were predominant. Was that the answer he gave?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I offered an opinion on the subject, but I am saying to my honourable friend that I cannot recall precisely from the facts of previous negotiations whether my impression is correct. My impression is that there has not been a serious problem in the past in co-ordinating federal and provincial policies with respect to matters in shared jurisdictions and international relations. There are exceptions that can be quoted but, on the whole, we have managed to get along.

However, I recognize that if the matter is raised in the way it has been raised by the Premier of Quebec, the situation will need to be carefully considered.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND (PROSTITUTION)—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Finlay MacDonald moved the second reading of Bill C-49, to amend the Criminal Code (prostitution).

He said: Honourable senators, the present legislation dealing with street solicitation, section 195(1) of the Criminal Code, has ceased to be effective as a result of the interpretation of these provisions by the Supreme Court of Canada and the appellate courts across the country.

Section 125(1) of the Code, which makes it an offence for any person to solicit for the purpose of prostitution in a public place, was enacted in 1972 to replace the then vagrancy offence of being a streetwalker. This offence was viewed as a status offence, and was repealed in response to one of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. Court decisions have significantly limited the effectiveness of the present act in dealing with street solicitation.

The incidence of street soliciting in larger Canadian cities, as you know, has increased dramatically since 1978 when the Supreme Court of Canada held that behaviour must be "pressing or persistent" to constitute soliciting. In a later judgment, the court held that there must be repeated solicitations in respect of one individual. This means that a sequence of non-pressing approaches, made by a single prostitute to a series of individuals, does not constitute the offence of soliciting.

The Supreme Court of Canada also stated that the interior of a motor vehicle is not a public place, but a private place for the purpose of this section. This has caused further confusion as to whether or not soliciting that takes place in an automobile, parked in a public place or in a place open to public view, falls within the soliciting provision.

However, the real key is the third problem with the present legislation. As a result of conflicting decisions at the level of the provincial appellate courts in some jurisdictions, a customer who accosts a person in a public place can be prosecuted while in other jurisdictions the customer is not liable to prosecution. This imbalance in the application of the law cannot be allowed to continue. In fact, at present, this imbalance has become merely theoretical, since the law has been rendered totally ineffectual by court decisions.

The National Association of Chiefs of Police and the police chiefs of major Canadian cities have indicated to officials of the Department of Justice the phenomenal reduction in the complement of officers assigned to vice squads, morality squads, in recent years. There is simply no reason to have a vice squad if there are no legal mechanisms with which it can carry out its duties.

The proposed legislation would make it an offence for a prostitute or a customer to seek each other out in a public place. It is not intended to bring back the former status offence of simply being a prostitute in a public place who is unable—I think the expression used is—"to give a good account of herself." Mere presence will not constitute an offence, but any attempt to engage in the trade on the street will likely be caught. The problems associated with soliciting have not arisen from the presence of prostitutes and customers in public locations, but from the conduct in which they engage while they are there. These proposals are intended to remove the opportunity for them to carry out their business in public and to prevent such conduct from occurring.

In addition to making it clear that customers as well as prostitutes are liable to criminal sanction for negotiating sex in public places, these amendments will specify that such activity which takes place inside an automobile in any public place or place open to public view will be caught.

The use of public places for trade in prostitution cannot be considered to be any longer a right. This conduct can only be tolerated so long as it does not disrupt the lives of others. The nuisance effects of street solicitation have gone past the point of toleration. Here we have a situation where a small minority claims the right to buy and to sell sex in public to the denial of the rights of the general public in those communities affected.

This bill, honourable senators, remedies that situation. It corrects an anomaly in the law which has shielded those who have taken over the streets. It will, for the first time in Canada, make customers subject to arrest and prosecution for seeking the services of prostitutes. That aspect of the legislation will make this bill an effective response to the problem.

[Senator Molgat.]

We believe that customers will be unwilling to take the risk of arrest, criminal record and public exposure. These amendments will enable the police to control street soliciting. Not one witness appearing before the legislative committee of the House of Commons disputed this fact.

This bill will do what it is intended to do. Make no bones that it is limited in its scope. It is not intended to deal with the entire problem of prostitution. It is not intended to address its root causes, be they social or be they economic; it is only intended to deal with the pervasive, increasingly alarming form of prostitution, that is, the buying and selling of sex in public.

I am aware that one of the major criticisms of this bill has been that it does not address the problem of juvenile prostitution. In fact, this bill, although limited to conduct which takes place in public, will make the practice of juvenile prostitution less attractive to both the youthful prostitutes and the customers. We believe that many troubled children are lured to the streets by an activity that, superficially at least, appears to be lucrative, easy and commonplace. Customers, comfortable in their anonymity, can prey on children. The proposed legislation, if enacted, will reduce the number of children turning to this readily available trade in their cities.

Municipalities, as you know, have also endeavoured to use bylaws to control street soliciting over the years; again almost exclusively without success. In 1983, the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the Calgary bylaw on the basis that the real character of the bylaw was an attempt to control prostitution, and as such was a function of the criminal law that falls exclusively under federal jurisdiction. Then, a similar bylaw, enacted in Montreal, was also quashed by the Supreme Court, although a further effort by that city directed at the sale of any service on public streets has, so far, withstood challenges in the lower courts. However, Mayor Drapeau of Montreal pointed out recently that the future of that bylaw was by no means certain. While the committee was considering Bill C-49 in the other place, the Niagara Falls bylaw, which was drafted in a manner similar to that of the Montreal bylaw, was struck down by a provincial court.

So we have seen the failure of one injunction, the Vancouver West End injunction, to deal adequately with the problem. The daily life of one community was improved appreciably, but at the expense of another community, namely, the Mount Pleasant area. Subsequent to that West End injunction, the Attorney General of Nova Scotia was unsuccessful in obtaining a similar injunction to prevent prostitutes from occupying certain streets in downtown Halifax. Bylaws do not offer a viable solution.

● (1430)

Honourable senators may be familiar with the report of the Fraser Committee on Pornography and Prostitution, which was tabled in the House of Commons last April. The Fraser report clearly identified the many serious problems attendant upon the practice of street soliciting. I do not think it is necessary for me to reiterate those problems. We all know the magnitude of the problem. We are now faced with determining the solution. The Fraser report recognized that the current Criminal Code provisions pertaining to soliciting in a public place for the purpose of prostitution, because of the interpretations placed on them by the courts, can no longer provide an effective mechanism for controlling the many serious nuisance effects that so often result from the practice.

Finally, the Fraser report has confirmed the view frequently expressed by law enforcement authorities and municipal leaders that the criminal law is appropriate and necessary to deal with this particular form of prostitution.

The Minister of Justice and his officials, we should note, are currently involved in reviewing the recommendations of the Fraser committee, together with those of the Committee on Sexual Offences Against Children—the Badgley report—in order to bring before the House, I believe sometime in the spring, a comprehensive package dealing with the larger problems of prostitution, pornography, child abuse, and so on.

The citizens of communities across Canada affected by street soliciting should not have to endure their situations any longer. Street soliciting is an aspect of the prostitution problem on which there is consensus and which calls for an immediate response by the government.

Although the Fraser report indicates a diversity of opinion on prostitution, there is one area in which there appears to be a consensus. That is the issue of street solicitation. Bill C-49 will reinstate the power of law enforcement agencies to control the problems of street prostitution which have flourished unchecked over the last several years. Honourable senators, I ask for your approval of this bill.

Hon. Azellus Denis: May I ask the honourable senator a question? The definition of “public place”, according to this bill, includes a motor vehicle. But there are all kinds of vehicles that could be used.

Senator Flynn: A bicycle?

Senator Denis: It could be a horse-drawn vehicle. I would like to know why they put in the words “motor vehicle”.

Senator Frith: What about a calèche?

The Hon. the Speaker: Does Senator MacDonald have an answer?

Senator MacDonald (Halifax): Honourable senators, this is a serious matter. Perhaps the honourable senator would specify the type of vehicle he has in mind, and if I do not know the answer I will be pleased to get it for him.

Senator Denis: Perhaps the word “motor” could be withdrawn.

On motion of Senator Lewis, debate adjourned.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S ACT
GOVERNOR GENERAL'S RETIRING ANNUITY ACT
SALARIES ACT
JUDGES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved the second reading of Bill C-78, to amend the Governor General's Act, the Governor General's Retiring Annuity Act, the Salaries Act and the Judges Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-78 combines proposals with respect to the salary and pension of the Governor General, the salary of the Lieutenant Governors, and the salaries and allowances of the federally appointed judiciary.

Senator Doody: Anything for the Senate?

Senator Nurgitz: Nothing for the Senate. Before describing the changes proposed in this bill, it would be appropriate for me to review briefly the nature and constitutional framework of these institutions. I believe that will make evident to honourable senators the necessity for the amendments contained in this bill.

First, as honourable senators know, the office of Governor General is the instrument chosen by the founders of our nation to carry on the executive government of Canada on behalf of and in the name of Her Majesty the Queen. All public acts are executed by the Governor General's authority, on the advice of Her Majesty's Privy Council for Canada. In addition to sanctioning the business of government, the Governor General is required to undertake many duties as head of state for Canada. In the same way as the British monarchy, the vice regency might be described as an office of little real power but of real influence. That influence and the example set for all Canadians by the incumbents of this position have had a positive effect extending beyond mere ceremony to identification, I suggest, with the nation itself.

The same quiet influence has been exercised at the provincial level by a series of public spirited men and women who have been justly honoured by elevation to the office of Lieutenant Governor. Where once the lieutenant governorship of a province was a purely ceremonial office with relatively light duties, the incumbents of these offices are now expected to undertake a wide variety of functions and responsibilities on behalf of government.

Furthermore, whereas formerly the Lieutenant Governor was usually a person of some private wealth, the trend in recent years has been to appoint men and women of relatively limited private means, who have distinguished themselves in various fields in the life of the nation. As government becomes more technical and perhaps more removed from the life of ordinary Canadian citizens, we look increasingly to the Governor General and to Lieutenant Governors in the provinces to put a human face upon our political machinery.

Turning to the judiciary, there are now nearly 800 federally appointed judges in Canada. At the provincial level, these include judges of the County and District Courts—which now exist, I might say, in only four provinces—as well as the judges of the Superior Courts, both trial and appeal divisions. In addition, there are the judges of the so-called "Section 101" Courts, the Supreme Courts of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, the Federal Court of Canada, the Supreme Court of Canada and the Tax Court of Canada.

Much has been said of the enhanced role of the judiciary since the coming into force of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It is undoubtedly true that the Charter has placed new responsibilities on the judiciary, and greater pressure upon the courts, both with respect to the increased number of matters being litigated, and the complexity of the issues which they involve. In the past, we have been fortunate that men and women of ability and dedication have been attracted to the bench. Now, more than ever, we must be assured of a uniformly high calibre for our judiciary, as the impact of their decisions upon all facets of Canadian life is more fully realized.

Honourable senators, I will now turn to Bill C-78 itself. The first thing which you will note that this bill does is to seek an increase in the salary of the Governor General of Canada. That salary has remained essentially unchanged from the time of Confederation. In 1931 the original 10,000 pounds sterling annexed to the office was converted to $48,666.63 Canadian. In the old days it was almost $5 to the pound sterling. This amount has remained unchanged to the present day. The government proposes to increase the salary of the Governor General to $70,000 a year, an amount which more accurately reflects the great importance and onerous duties attached to this office.

• (1440)

The bill will also amend the Governor General's Retiring Annuity Act to fix the annuity payable to retired Governors General and the surviving spouses of former Governors General at one third of the salary annexed to the office on March 1, 1967. This will ensure that all present and future annuitants will continue to receive the same amount.

The salary of a Lieutenant Governor will be raised from $44,100 to $69,000. As I noted at the outset, the holders of this office are exercising increasingly heavy responsibilities. It was the view of the government that the salary now provided does not adequately compensate our Lieutenant Governors for the functions and duties they are expected to perform.

The major portion of Bill C-78 is addressed to increases in judicial salaries and allowances. As honourable senators will recall, a commission to inquire into the adequacy of judicial salaries and benefits was appointed in 1983, pursuant to the terms of the Judges Act. The report of this commission was tabled in Parliament in October of that year. It recommended major increases to judicial salaries, primarily to offset the effect of inflation over the period from 1975 to 1985. During that ten-year period, the judiciary was affected by inflationary pressures in a much more substantial fashion than any other senior group in the public sector. The commission therefore recommended that new base salaries be provided as of April 1, 1985, which would have resulted in a salary of $119,000 for a puisne judge of a provincial superior court, and $153,680 for the Chief Justice of Canada. These figures were arrived at in accordance with a formula which took 1975 salaries as being appropriate in that year.

The salaries recommended by the 1983 commission, while perhaps justifiable in objective terms, could not be implemented at a time of serious economic constraints. It was therefore determined that, although the full amounts recommended by the commission could not be provided, judicial salaries should be adjusted by reference to the relativity which existed in 1975 between judicial salaries and the mid-point of the DM-3 category, the most senior category of public servant.

Restoration of this relativity factor has resulted in a salary of $105,000 for a puisne judge of a provincial superior court, and $135,000 for the Chief Justice of Canada. While these amounts represent only about half the increases recommended by the 1983 commission, they will still result in substantial increments for 1985. The judiciary, as a class, is among the most highly compensated in the public sector. There is an old adage that "You get what you pay for." While an appointment to the bench is still considered the highest honour which can be conferred upon a lawyer, we cannot expect men and women who have been successful at the bar to take a substantial reduction in their level of income upon appointment to a judgeship. While the level of remuneration is not the only consideration in attracting members of the legal profession to the bench, nor indeed should it be, nonetheless the salaries provided must not deter the very people we wish to be appointed—top lawyers in leading law firms in our larger centres of population, and the rising stars of the profession, younger men and women who do not have the fallback of substantial personal savings.

The minimum criterion for appointment at the federal level is ten years at the bar. However, very few judges are appointed with this minimum qualification. Most are more senior, and by reason of their seniority are earning substantial sums from the practice of their profession. In order to attract men and women of experience and ability, judicial salaries must be set at levels which are reasonably attractive to a profession that historically has enjoyed high incomes.

Judicial salaries must also be regularly reviewed so that they do not fall behind other senior public sector salaries. The salaries provided to the judiciary have tended in the past to slip in a very short period of time, a result which has been disheartening to men and women who have a difficult job and do it well. The salaries proposed in Bill C-78 are considered by the government to be appropriate to the stature and dignity of the office and to current economic conditions as well.

In addition to salaries, a number of judicial allowances will be adjusted by this bill. The first of these is the representation allowance, which is provided to senior members of the judiciary, mainly chief justices, to help defray the expenses of hospitality and travel incurred on behalf of their courts. This allowance will be doubled from its present limits. The benefits of the allowance will also be extended to the spouses of judges entitled to the allowance, in order to permit reimbursement of expenses incurred by them or on their behalf in attending functions of an official nature with the Chief Justice.

As well, the conference allowance will be increased, as was recommended by the 1983 commission, from its present aggregate of $350 per judge on the court and $3,000 minimum per court to $500 per judge and $5,000 minimum per court. These increases are in response to increased travel costs since the allowance was last adjusted in 1980.

The removal allowance will be extended to retiring judges of the supreme courts of the Yukon and of the Northwest Territories, and to the surviving spouses and children of such judges who die in office, in order to permit their relocation to one of the provinces. The allowance will be available only in circumstances where the judge was appointed to one of the northern courts from a province. It was felt appropriate to extend this allowance in recognition of the special circumstances which exist in the north. Although we have been fortunate not to have been faced with any of the circumstances foreseen by these amendments, the government felt that these contingencies should be provided for.

In conclusion, honourable senators, Bill C-78 effects adjustments in the remuneration and benefits of some of our most important public officials. The amendments contained in this bill reflect recognition of the importance of the duties and responsibilities which the incumbents of those offices are required to perform, and the need to compensate them adequately for the increasingly onerous tasks which they undertake on our behalf.

Honourable senators, I know that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will be meeting on Tuesday next at 6 o'clock in the evening to hear the Minister of Justice with respect to several bills, including this one, should the reference be made. I urge honourable senators to support this bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise to speak to Bill C-78, first with regard to the provisions that deal with increases in the remuneration of the Governor General and of the Lieutenant Governors. I support and echo exactly what Senator Nurgitz has said—that this is, perhaps, an example of something that is too late and too little, but it is better than nothing. If ever there has been a case of suitable catching up, it would particularly apply to the salaries of the Governors General. As Senator Nurgitz has said, we realize that this salary, which is now being increased, has been around virtually since Confederation. I do not think that that can be said of any other public or, perhaps, private salary—certainly not the private salary pertaining to anyone now living.

Honourable senators, we support this bill. I agree with Senator Nurgitz that the role of the Governor General and that of the Lieutenant Governor has always been important. Historically, it has been a treasured part of our heritage. When we consider how these traditional roles have been fulfilled and that additional duties have now been imposed on the Lieutenant Governors and on the Governors General, we must also feel like apologizing for this raise being as small as it is. As we have said, however, better half a loaf than none.

I know that many of us associate various times in our lives with those people who served as Governors General. I do not want to leave anyone out, but the name that first comes to my mind is that of Lord Tweedsmuir, who was Governor General when I first became aware of Governors General. I also think of Viscount Alexander, and also, of course, our first Canadian Governor General.

Senator Doody: Viscount Alexander was our first.

● (1450)

Senator Frith: As Senator Doody points out, for Newfoundland Viscount Alexander was the first Governor General. Our first Canadian Governor General was Vincent Massey, followed by Georges Vanier, Roland Michener and Jules Léger. These are really quite glamorous names to all of us, as they should be.

Senator Phillips: Were you around when Earl Grey was Governor General?

Senator Frith: No, I was not. I still celebrate his name with the odd cup of tea, mind you. Then there was Edward Schreyer who, I believe, was the first former provincial premier appointed as Governor General. Now there is the dignified and appropriately aristocratic and even glamorous lady, Madame Jeanne Sauv .

Speaking as an Ontario senator, I should not let the opportunity pass to extend my congratulations to our newly appointed Lieutenant Governor, who, I believe, is the first black Lieutenant Governor in Canadian history just as Madame Sauv  is our first woman Governor General. I know that honourable senators join me in congratulating him, for to some of you he is a former colleague, Lincoln Alexander.

We support enthusiastically that portion of this bill which deals with the salaries of the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governors.

I can say that we bring the same enthusiasm to our support for those portions of the bill that deal with the salaries of judges. I want to take this occasion to say something about the rule of law. There is a difference, of course, between a rule of law and the rule of law. A rule of law is a legal rule applying to a particular matter. The rule of law is sometimes misunderstood as being the rule of lawyers and many non-lawyers misunderstand the prime importance of the rule of law. It seems to me that one thing that we have done in Canada is adopt, to some extent, the American use of the English language and also the tendency to hyperbole and the tendency to add a string of hyperbolic adjectives to every noun that we want to underline.

Senator Roblin: Not around here.

Senator Frith: I will pick us up on it, and here I include myself, when I next hear it done. In any event, the rule of law is a rule of absolutely prime importance to every citizen, and I do not say that in any hyperbolic sense. It is our bulwark and the mighty shield of every citizen against tyranny.

[Senator Frith.]

The Oxford Companion To Law says this about the rule of law:

A concept of the utmost importance but having no defined, nor readily definable, content. It implies the subordination of all authorities, legislative, executive, judicial, and other to certain principles which would generally be accepted as characteristic of law, such as the ideas of the fundamental principles of justice, moral principles, fairness and due process. It implies respect for the supreme value and dignity of the individual.

In any legal system it implies limitations on legislative power, safeguards against abuse of executive power, adequate and equal opportunities of access to legal advice and assistance and protection, proper protection of individual and group rights and liberties, and equality before the law.

Skipping a couple of lines dealing with international law, I continue:

It means more than that the government maintains and enforces law and order, but that the government is, itself, subject to rules of law and cannot itself disregard the law or remake it to suit itself.

It probably originated in mediaeval time in the belief that the law, whether of God or of man, ought to rule the world. One development of this was the idea that certain fundamental laws are unalterable by even the government, an idea itself connected with ideas of natural law.

In England, as a result of the constitutional struggles of the seventeenth century, in which Parliament and the common lawyers were victorious, the supremacy of the law came to mean the supremacy of Parliament. But this involves that Parliament can, at any time, and even retrospectively, alter the law to suit its purpose, or to absolve its misdeeds, or can overrule or reverse judicial decisions. Parliament is above the law, and the executive, the Cabinet, so long as it can carry a majority in the House of Commons, is in control of Parliament.

That was so in Canada until the passage of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. So long as any Parliament or any legislative assembly was within its constitutional powers, that is, its legislative powers, powers to make laws on certain subjects, it was supreme.

As Senator Nurgitz pointed out, that has changed in Canada since the passage of the Charter and that, in turn, has meant an important addition to the work of our judges and an important addition to the shield that I mentioned against tyranny.

To continue with the quote:

A.V. Dicey, in his Introduction of the Study of the Law of the Constitution (1885), reached the conclusion that the phrase had three meanings—

I am only going to refer to the first——in the England of his day, namely, that no man could be made to suffer punishment or to pay damages for any conduct not definitely forbidden by law, that every man's legal rights or liabilities were almost invariably determined by the ordinary courts of the realm, and that each man's individual rights are far less the result of the constitution of the United Kingdom than the basis on which the constitution is founded.

If, as I believe, the rule of law is the most important—assuming we have to pick one—safeguard of our freedoms, then we must understand also that such a rule of law is of no use without independent, able, qualified and devoted judges to see that it is given effect because, of course, the rule of law applies even in Russia, that is to say, there is a constitution. The definition I gave of the rule of law from the Oxford Companion to Law would apply to the Russian Constitution and to Russian laws as it would to many other legal systems that we do not support. The citizens of those countries, our brother and sister human beings, do not enjoy the same rights as we have although, in fact, the rule of law exists. The question then becomes: Is the rule of law enforced by an independent judiciary?

Of course it is, in our country, and the legislation before us now is legislation to pay appropriate salaries for the work that they do. But, more importantly, it is not simply payment for what is done by them, not just a quid pro quo in terms of the efforts and hours they put in, but in terms of the absolutely vital role that they play, and not in some abstract sense, for each individual citizen. As Senator Nurgitz has said, most of them do not go to the bench independently wealthy. When he mentioned that, I could not avoid remembering the first lines of the judge's song in Gilbert and Sullivan's "Trial by Jury" when the judge is describing—

• (1500)

Senator Nurgitz: Say it; please don't sing it.

Senator Frith: How do you know, you have not heard how I sound when I sing.

Senator Roblin: "When I was a lad I served a term . . ."

Senator Frith: No, you are referring to the Admiral in "HMS Pinafore." Remember how he became the admiral? But the judge's character sang:

When I, good friends, was called to the bar,
I'd an appetite fresh and hearty,
But I was, as many young barristers are,
An impecunious party.
I'd a swallow-tail coat of a beautiful blue—
A brief which I bought of a booby—
A couple of shirts and a collar or two,
And a ring that looked like a ruby!

You will remember that the young impecunious barrister finally became the judge whose reputation many tried to disparage but in the end was ready to try a breach of promise of marriage, which was the subject matter.

Senator Roblin: You had better not tell us how he got to be a judge. That is another story.

Senator Frith: The song goes:

So, I fell in love with a rich attorney's Elderly, ugly daughter.

The attorney said to him:

"And a very nice girl you'll find her!

She may very well pass for forty-three

In the dusk, with a light behind her!"

Now then to the legislation.

Senator Roblin: Can you sing?

Senator Frith: You could talk me into it, but I would rather not. I have practised before the Ontario bar, the Federal Court and the Supreme Court and I can say, by personal experience and by conviction, having in mind the principles to which I have referred, that I believe that our judges are required to play an important role, and do play an important role. Therefore, we support this legislation and commend the government for introducing it. We hope to see it receive speedy passage here.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION REORGANIZATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William M. Kelly moved the second reading of Bill C-66, respecting the reorganization of the Canada Development Corporation.

He said: Honourable senators, as usual it seems to me that on those occasions that I get an assignment to speak in this chamber I have to follow one of the greatest orators of this chamber, Senator Frith, so I cannot promise—

Senator Frith: If I am one of the greatest, we are in bad shape.

Senator Kelly: Nonetheless, I shall do my best. Bill C-66 represents a key element of the implementation of the government's policy, announced in the May budget, of privatizing government investments that no longer serve a clear public policy objective. It will authorize the sale of the remainder of the Crown's shares in the Canada Development Corporation, CDC. There seems to be substantial agreement that the Canada Development Corporation belongs in the private sector operating on an equal footing with other private sector companies. CDC should be able to operate fully as a private sector institution. It should have every opportunity to grow and flourish as a broadly-based Canadian company offering sound investment opportunities to Canadians. It should be freed from artificial constraints and should be able to respond quickly and efficiently to the demands of the marketplace. The bill before us today is intended to accommodate these objectives.

Honourable senators, if you will allow me, I would like to delve into just a bit of history by way of explaining the bill before us today. The Trudeau government created the CDC in 1971 for a host of objectives. Some would say that many of the objectives were contradictory and ill-conceived, but that is behind us now. When the CDC was established it was the government's stated intention that it would be operated essentially as a commercial operation and would be quickly transformed into a corporation, widely-held by Canadian investors with the government's share of ownership eroding to a minimum of 10 per cent. For that reason, the Trudeau government put several restrictions on the CDC Act, limiting eligible shareholders to resident Canadians, restricting to 3 per cent the total holdings of CDC shares by any individual or associated group, and a requirement that the federal government hold at least 10 per cent of the shares. The original CDC Act also gave the CDC a number of privileges and immunities in order to attract investors and to get the corporation off to a good start.

In the intervening years, the Liberal government seemed ambivalent as to whether the CDC was to operate commercially or as a vehicle of public policy, whether it was to operate independently under the control and direction of its board of directors or under government control. The disputes that arose a few years ago over the Massey-Ferguson rescue and the appointment of Maurice Strong as board chairman were only the latest incidents in a long tug-of-war between the government and the CDC over its independence and mandate. During this period, the CDC did manage to bring down the government level of participation to just below 50 per cent. But continuing uncertainty over the CDC's role dampened the market for CDC stock. Furthermore, the privileges given to the CDC, both by its act and by virtue of government ownership, were important factors in encouraging CDC management to push to the absolute limit the CDC's managerial and financial capabilities through an aggressive acquisition policy. As a consequence, during the recent recession the CDC's performance suffered, further depressing the market for its shares and delaying further privatization.

Honourable senators, I was privileged to be the co-chairman of a task force that reviewed federal crown corporations to help the Progressive Conservative Party prepare its policies and strategies before taking power last year. In our report we reviewed the CDC, its history and current situation and recommended that the government divest itself of its remaining shares as soon as market conditions allowed. On coming to power last year, the government decided that the best interests of the CDC and its public shareholders would be met if the government were to significantly reduce its shareholding and send a strong signal to current and prospective investors that the government intended to sell all of its shares as soon as possible. Before doing so, however, it was necessary to change some of the policies and restrictions that applied to the CDC. To increase the marketability of CDC shares and in line with the government's general policies and philosophies on foreign investment and trade enhancement, a decision was made to raise the restriction on foreign ownership. The special status applicable to the CDC was also to be removed. Each of these actions would, however, require amendment of the CDC Act.

The government appointed two eminent investment dealers chosen from among a much larger group who had been involved in the discussions. They selected Burns Fry and Gordon Capital to advise on the disposition. Their advice, based on market considerations, was that the disposition should occur sooner rather than later and that there was insufficient time to await parliamentary review of the necessary amendments. Accordingly, in the period August 21 to September 6 this year, the CDC undertook a rights issue for investors to buy all but 11.8 per cent of the government CDC shares. In order to purchase each right, investors paid $5.75 or half the full purchase price. With passage of this legislation, investors may present their rights, pay the remainder owed and obtain their shares and the votes going with them.

• (1510)

Honourable senators, I feel that at this point I should make a brief parenthetical remark about this particular process. As someone who is committed to the supremacy of Parliament, I at first felt some unease about this rights issue proceeding before Parliament had had the opportunity to review and pass the enabling legislation. On the other hand, the government's financial advisers counselled against delay. Furthermore, I must emphasize that the government undertook a rights issue. CDC shares will not change hands until this legislation is passed. Should the bill not be passed or should it be amended in a material way, the holders of rights can obtain a refund for the payment, plus interest accrued at 10 per cent per annum.

In any event, the rights issue was fully subscribed. In my opinion, it was an excellent transaction. When the conversion of rights issue into shares is completed, after the coming into force of this bill, the sale will net $250 million for the consolidated revenue fund and, equally important, may be a very clear manifestation of this government's intention to return private sector activities to the private sector. As market conditions allow, the government intends to divest itself of its remaining 11.8 per cent of the CDC's shares.

Briefly and simply, therefore, the bill before us now seeks to accomplish the following:

Complete removal of the government's 10 per cent minimum share ownership requirement and authority for the minister to dispose of the government's residual shares;

Increase the foreign ownership restriction from 0 to 25 per cent, with no individual non-Canadian shareholder being able to hold more than 10 per cent. This recognizes that the CDC operates in a world market and does require access to foreign capital;

Raise the maximum level of shares that may be held by individual Canadians or individual Canadian firms to 25 per cent. In establishing the level at 25 per cent, the government followed the precedent and the parallel enforcement provisions established in the Bank Act.

Incidentally, honourable senators, this 25 per cent ceiling also provides the attraction of allowing investors of 20 per cent or more to equity account the investment in their own books. On the other hand, the 25 per cent maximum precludes any one firm or individual from obtaining clear or majority voting control of the CDC, thereby guarding against increased corporate concentration.

Otherwise, Bill C-66 authorizes the minister to continue the CDC as a public company under the Canada Business Corporations Act. Under company law, therefore, the CDC will move from being a "special act" company—that is, a company established by Parliament—to a normal business corporation. It will be, therefore, on a par with similar Canadian commercial activities.

Honourable senators, it would not be prudent, nor would it be fair to current shareholders, to thrust CDC completely and immediately into the harsh realities of the private marketplace. Accordingly, Bill C-66 includes a number of "transition" items. In other words, provisions designed to phase the CDC out of—or as some might say, wean the CDC away from—the special status it currently has. These transitional measures include:

Maintaining the current status as "legal for life" for CDC shares, until April 30, 1989. This means that pension funds, insurance, trust and loan companies may continue to buy CDC shares as routine investments;

Allowing the government, in lieu of voting its shares, to appoint up to five CDC directors for two years, or until the government's investment falls below 10 per cent;

Fixing the number of directors of the CDC board at a minimum of 18 and a maximum of 21 for two years or until the government's shareholding erodes below 10 per cent.

Honourable senators, this bill is long overdue. It represents in many ways the stated policy of the previous government. It represents a major step in this government's privatization process. It will be to the significant benefit of the CDC, and to its current 55,000 shareholders and to its future shareholders. It will remove from the government any formal or implicit responsibility for the future actions and operations of the company.

As well, in a sense, Bill C-66 marks the end of an era. In the late 1970s and early 1980s, the previous government set up a number of mixed enterprises: Corporations in which the government and the private sector were joint investors and partners. Some, such as Telesat Canada, are still around. However, experience with mixed enterprises has not been particularly encouraging. In spite of hopes to the contrary, mixed enterprises have not worked particularly well in this country. Governments found that they were held accountable for a corporation's performance and actions, even though they did not, or could not, exercise control over those actions. Government often found the temptation to intervene too strong, thereby incurring the wrath of management and the suspicion of the private investor. Perhaps the problem lay not with the mixed enterprise model, but with the way in which the corporations were handled by the government. In any event, as the Auditor General has noted in his last annual report to Parliament, the experience should be instructive as we embark on the privatization of some crown corporations that may result in the creation, at least for a time, of a new series of "mixed enterprises".

Honourable senators, that concludes my introductory remarks. Bill C-66, an act respecting the reorganization of the Canada Development Corporation, proceeded through the other place unamended. Senator Sinclair has assured me that he has very little comment to offer on the whole matter and supports it totally, and therefore I urge a speedy passage in this place.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Would Senator Kelly, the sponsor of this bill, permit a question at this time?

Senator Kelly: Yes, I will.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I understood Senator Kelly to say that the financial advisers urged the government to proceed at this time because of market conditions. He then went on to say that, for that reason, they used an issue of rights rather than an issue of government shares. He went on to say that the result of this would be to bring into the government for those shares some $250 million.

My question is this: Is it the position of Senator Kelly that the pricing of those rights and the value of those shares was in accordance with market conditions?

Senator Kelly: I think my simple answer to that, honourable senators, would be "yes".

Senator Sinclair: Is it the intention of the sponsor of this bill to deal with any other inquiries into the valuation of these shares in his discussions, as he said in his preliminary remarks?

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I would be quite prepared to do that. I might point out that the market for these shares, shortly prior to this issue on August 21, 1985, was $11.25. The price set was a slight premium over $11.25. However, I would be quite prepared to elaborate, perhaps at some future time.

Senator Sinclair: I have one other question. I might say that I am putting these questions to Senator Kelly at this time in an attempt to shorten what might happen at another time. My question is: In your remarks, you said that one of the purposes of the legislation was to prohibit further concentration. I take it that that is a purpose of this legislation and that, if there were any way in which that could be improved, you would support that. Am I correct in that assumption?

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I want to be very careful in how I answer this question. Certainly, my sense of this government is that it has not in any way moved in the direction of serious concentration. However, I think it is recognizing that to have a responsible shareholder at the 25 per cent level can be quite beneficial in terms of monitoring what management does with the corporation. I recognize the concern, because it has been expressed on the question of the interpretation of "association." In other words, an associate only becomes an associate in excess of 50 per cent. I believe that is one of the matters of concern to Senator Sinclair. I draw Senator Sinclair's attention to clause 5(a) and hope that the senator would take that into account in his concern regarding the possibility of concentration occurring under the rules set out in Bill C-66 and recognize that, with not too much more juggling, whether 50 per cent, 25 per cent or 10 per cent, as it is in certain other acts, concentration can occur if it is not carefully watched for. I believe the clause I refer to may help him in that consideration.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the order.

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Balfour, second by the Honourable Senator Bélisle, for the second reading of the Bill C-64, intituled: "An Act to amend the Seeds Act and the Canada Grain Act".—(Honourable Senator Steuart (Prince Albert-Duck Lake)).

Hon. D. G. Steuart (Prince Albert-Duck Lake): Honourable senators, my remarks on this particular bill will be rather short and, I hope, to the point.

Bill C-64, to amend the Seeds Act and the Canada Grain Act, was outlined by Senator Balfour in a clear and concise manner. The idea of amending this act was conceived many years ago. It is more than 25 years since the act has been changed. During that time, as Senator Balfour pointed out, this particular industry has more than doubled; it has probably tripled. It now amounts to something like $385 million a year in both the domestic and the foreign markets.

What has grown up during that time requires change. Many so-called seed growers in this country and abroad have begun to grow seed and name them in an attempt to imitate the job done by the legitimate seed growers in this country, to the detriment not only of the seed growers who invested a great deal of time and money, but also to the detriment of Canadian farmers and the reputation of Canada as a seed grower, in domestic and foreign markets.

This bill seriously increases the penalties for this sort of behaviour and, we, on both sides of this chamber, hope that it will put an end to these imitations and this kind of action.

I have checked with members on this side of the chamber who are involved with and concerned about the agricultural industry, and I think I can say, without fear of contradiction, that, generally, we support these particular amendments.

The only caution I might voice is that while a great deal of the power in this bill is given to the Seed Growers' Association—and I think that is a good thing because they know more about it than anyone else—there has been a tendency on their part at times to be a little zealous in the prosecution of some people who have, quite legitimately, attempted to sell seed grains, mostly in Canada and, possibly, abroad, calling them by their names. For example, registered seed growers will develop a wheat such as Neepawa and some of the farmers will buy that seed green and grow it and then attempt to advertise it, not as a registered seed, but as, in fact, Neepawa wheat. The seed growers in their over-zealousness have prosecuted those people.

I suppose, in the final analysis, the whole point of growing registered seed and developing new strains of seed, which has been very successful in Canada, is to spread that seed across Canada and throughout the world so that we can improve the kinds of grains we can grow, especially in Canada, and have greater yields of more improved varieties across Canada.

I hope that the government, when this bill is passed, will watch closely to see that the power we are giving to the Seed Growers' Association is not abused. It has not been abused too much in the past, but there has been a tendency in that direction.

With those few remarks, I point out that I think this bill is timely. I am sure we, on this side, support it, and I do not think it is necessary to refer it to committee. If it is the desire of the majority of senators here, we could pass this bill as it is.

I add only one caveat which is that the government should police the powers that it is giving to an independent agent like the Seed Growers' Association.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I wish to inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Balfour speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Balfour: I close the debate.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. R. James Balfour, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CUSTOMS BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Balfour, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bélisle, for the second reading of the Bill C-59 intituled:

"An Act respecting Customs".—(Honourable Senator Neiman).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have been asked to stand that order in Senator Barrow's name. He will deal with it next week.

Order stands in name of Senator Barrow.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

CENTRE BLOCK—REMOVAL OF PORTRAITS OF BRITISH PRIME MINISTERS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Hicks, calling the attention of the Senate to the removal of the portraits of former British Prime Ministers from the sixth floor of the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings.—(Honourable Senator Hicks).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Hicks has asked me to stand this order in Senator Walker's name because if Senator Hicks speaks on it now it will have the effect of closing the debate. Apparently, Senator Walker wishes to speak before that occurs. Therefore, I would ask that the order stand in Senator Walker's name.

Order stands in name of Senator Walker.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-55 WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips that the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-55, intituled: "An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Bill C-55 had already been referred to that committee. Whether it is in good order to withdraw the motion at this time or whether we will refer it again, as a matter of formal procedure, is really of no consequence to me and I will agree with whichever procedure is more convenient to the chamber.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I feel the same way as Senator Doody does. Let us make it clear that we hope it is pre-studied by the committee in whatever way the chamber deems appropriate.

I think that probably the best procedure to follow at this moment is to withdraw the motion and remind the chairman that it has already been referred to that committee.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the motion be withdrawn?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-74

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-74, intituled: "An Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and to provide for certain matters in relation to the 1981 decennial census", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we support this motion.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-70

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-70, intituled: "An Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this is one of the motions that we discussed. We support this motion also.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 3, 1985, at 2 p.m.

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

REPORT ON THE SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-47

THURSDAY, November 28, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

EIGHTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of Bill C-47, intitled: "An Act respecting divorce and corollary relief", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, June 12, 1985, examined the said subject-matter and now reports as follows:

In its study, the Committee has taken cognizance of amendments to the Bill effected in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of the House of Commons. This Committee supports and commends many of those amendments, particularly those which have responded to concerns expressed as to the rights of non-custodial parents in relation to children of marriages that have broken down.

i) Clause 3 — Jurisdiction

This clause would require at least one year's ordinary residence in a particular province by a spouse before a court could have jurisdiction to hear and determine a divorce proceeding. Ideally, mere residence anywhere in Canada for a year would be preferable; but the Committee recognizes the practical difficulties of "forum-shopping"; or of the problems associated with a person having to prove a substantial connection with a particular jurisdiction. A preferable solution would be a requirement of residence in a province for at least six months. This would give more recognition to Canadians' mobility, while at the same time requiring some commitment to the jurisdiction in issue.

ii) Clause 8 — Grounds for divorce

A majority of the Committee was disposed to agree with those witnesses who contended that the "fault" grounds should be deleted from clause 8, and that marriage breakdown based on one year's separation should be the sole ground for divorce. The Committee notes, however, that the Bill as reported to the House of Commons continues to include adultery and cruelty as matters which can establish marriage breakdown, and thus entitle an applicant to an immediate dissolution of marriage. As a suggested solution, the Committee recommends that clause 8 should be amended to allow an application for divorce based on adultery or cruelty only if the spouses have lived separate and apart for less than one year. If the separation exceeds one year, only separation could be relied on to establish marriage breakdown.

iii) Clause 11 — Barring or delaying divorce

Paragraph (b) of sub-clause 11(1) would allow a court to stay the granting of a divorce if reasonable arrangements have not been, but can be made for the support of a child of the marriage; and to dismiss an application for a divorce if arrangements for such support cannot be made. The Committee does not understand why there should be an absolute bar to a divorce in these latter circumstances. This seems contrary to the intent and spirit of the Act, and we recommend the deletion of such an absolute bar. The Committee also feels that analogous protection should be given in respect of spouses. There should be no absolute bar to a divorce; but the court should have a discretion to delay the granting of a divorce to encourage certain arrangements to be made, such as the assignment of pension benefits to older, dependent spouses, or to preserve a spouse's right to apply under provincial legislation for division of property. This would be a discretion that is rarely used; but it should be available to avoid hardship arising from some divorces.

iv) Clause 16 — Custody orders

The Committee has a concern with the specific wording of sub-clause 16(7), which was added in the House Committee to allow the court to order an ex-spouse having custody of a child to give notice to the other ex-spouse of plans to change the residence of that child. As drafted, sub-clause (7) could be interpreted as only allowing the court to make such an order where the custodial parent intends to change the child's residence at the time custody is granted, and not thereafter. Undoubtedly, this is not intended; and it may very well be that a court would refuse to interpret the sub-clause in this way. But, as legislators, we should ensure that no ambiguity remains. Accordingly, sub-clause 16(7) should be amended to make it absolutely clear that courts have jurisdiction when the intention to change the child's residence is formed at any time after custody is granted.

v) Clause 17 — Variation of support orders

Sub-clause 17(4) allows for the variation of support orders, based on a change "in the condition, means, needs or other circumstances of either former spouse". The Bill also explicitly sets out the power of courts to make "term" support orders. There is a concern, where a term order is predicated on the attainment of certain objectives by the payee spouse, or on the happening of a specified event, that sub-clause 17(4) is not broad enough to accommodate variation orders where those objectives have not been attained, or that event has not taken place. It refers to a change in the former spouse's "circumstances". It may be that in this could be interpreted as having no application to matters independent of the person's immediate circumstances; that where her circumstances have stayed the same in relation to the order's objective, the spouse could not secure a variation order, even where a need persists that is related to the marriage. Sub-clause 17(4) should be amended to remove any doubt on this matter.

vi) Clause 26 — Regulations

With respect to clause 26, the Committee agrees with the concern raised by the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments that it does not provide a sufficiently explicit basis for regulations which establish the Central Divorce Registry. This Committee thus recommends that clause 26 be amended to provide express authority for the making of regulations: establishing the registry; prescribing the duties of persons engaged or employed in its administration; and prescribing the information to be supplied by officers of the court in relation to proceedings under the legislation. This Committee also agrees with the opinion of the Chairmen of the Joint Committee as expressed to the Minister, that the closing words of clause 26 are too broad. Those words give to the Governor in Council the power to make such regulations as he "considers necessary" to assure uniformity in the rules made pursuant to section 25." The underlined words render the regulation making power exercisable on the subjective test of what the Governor in Council considers necessary. Hence, the courts would be prevented from passing on the issue of whether the regulations do validly seek to assure uniformity. The Committee recommends that the clause be amended so that it merely allows the regulations to be made to assure uniformity, without reference to a subjective assessment of necessity.

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN B. NEIMAN,
Chairman.

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

REPORT ON THE SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-48

THURSDAY, November 28, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

NINTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of Bill C-48, intituled: "An Act to provide for the release of information that may assist in locating defaulting spouses and other persons and to permit, for the enforcement of support orders and support provisions, the garnishment and attachment of certain moneys payable by Her Majesty in right of Canada", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, June 12, 1985, examined the said subject-matter, and now reports as follows:

In its study, the Committee has taken cognizance of amendments to the Bill effected in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of the House of Commons. This Committee fully supports and commends many of those amendments.

The Committee does not wish to comment on any particular provision of Bill C-48. We do note with interest the concerns expressed as to the Bill by the Privacy Commissioner, in particular his speculation as to whether it constitutes a first step in a gradual dilution of federal privacy legislation in pursuit of a "good cause". This is an important issue, and one which should not be minimized or dismissed lightly. Parliament should take care to ensure that the confidentiality of government-collected information is not reduced without compelling reasons, and only to the extent that is absolutely necessary. We are confident, however, that Bill C-48 meets both of these criteria. The problems of default in the payment of support, and of abduction of children by parents in defiance of court orders or custody agreements are significant and compelling. Not only is great suffering caused, but there are undeniable social and economic costs involved. Persons who unjustifiably defy the law in this area should be considered to have forfeited, to a degree, a right to complete privacy. In our opinion, Part I of the Bill, which deals with the release of information is properly limited in scope so as to be an appropriate response to these problems; and Part II, which allows for the garnishment of federal monies by persons to whom support is owed, is also a reasonable response.

This being said, the Committee does wish to make further comment as to two aspects of the Bill. First, the full scope of its application is not yet known. The manner in which it will operate attends upon the conclusion of agreements with the provinces which will govern procedures concerning the search for and release of information, including safeguards for protection against unauthorized release or use of that information. While the Committee has been given a general idea of the probable contents of such agreements, until they are concluded it is not possible to know definitively how Part I will be administered.

The second issue has to do with another submission by the Privacy Commissioner. He has speculated as to whether the release of information provisions will really provide useful information to those who wish to enforce support and custody provisions. As a practical matter, the limited nature of the information released may not, in his opinion, be of much use.

In light of these issues the Committee feels that it would be appropriate for Parliament to play a continuing role in evaluating the operation of Bill C-48. One suggestion is that it be arranged that all agreements concluded under the Act be referred for study to a committee of either or both Houses of Parliament, and that that committee or those committees be empowered to report as to the suitability of those agreements, both in furthering the aims of the legislation and in protecting privacy. Similarly, the Committee suggests that the Bill should be amended to provide for a full evaluation of the legislation by a Parliamentary Committee, which would also be empowered to report to Parliament with any recommendations for amendment or other improvements. One matter the Committee would consider is whether the legislation in fact is providing practical assistance to those seeking to enforce a custody or support provisions. If not, there could be a strong argument made that even the minimal invasion of privacy embodied by Part I of the Bill is not justified.

A final concern has to do with the effect Part I of the Bill may have on the manner in which information is held within the federal government. The Privacy Commissioner has raised questions as to the degree to which there may be interdepartmental sharing or cross-referencing of information which is "freed-up" by an authorization under Bill C-48. The Committee is unsure as to the full implications of such developments, should they come to pass. We recommend, if the Privacy Commissioner does not already have jurisdiction to monitor the effect of Bill C-48 within the federal government, that he be given such a power explicitly.

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN B. NEIMAN,
Chairman.

REGISTER OF SENATORS' INTERESTS

CONSIDERATION BY STANDING RULES AND ORDERS
COMMITTEE OF RELATED MATTERS—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Wednesday next, December 4, 1985, I will move:

That the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders consider matters related to the establishment of a Register of Senators' Interests, and report on these and any other matters relating to registration of Senators' interests, including the form and content of such a Register, considering among other matters relating to the registration of Senators' interests, the following:

- (a) remunerated directorships of companies, public or private;
- (b) other remunerated positions or offices;
- (c) remunerated trades, professions or vocations;
- (d) the names of clients when the interests referred to above include personal services by the Senator which arise out of or are related in any manner to his or her membership in the Senate;
- (e) any payments or any material benefits or advantages received from or on behalf of foreign Governments, organizations or persons;
- (f) land and property of substantial value or from which a substantial income is derived; and
- (g) the names of companies or other bodies in which the Senator has, to his or her knowledge, either himself or herself or with or on behalf of his or her spouse or dependents, any beneficial interest including, among others, shareholdings of a nominal value greater than one-hundredth of the total capital assets of the company or other body.

ment could help us with respect to the conclusion that emerged from the First Ministers' Conference on the subject of trade negotiations. Can the Leader of the Government shed any light on the matter of the right of the provinces to participate in the formulation of the mandate for the trade negotiations or, to put it more generally, the right of the provinces to participate in the trade negotiations?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think we have to be very careful about our use of language here because it is quite easy to get tripped up on terminology, and I hope I may avoid that. I believe there is no question about the right of the provinces to participate in the consultations that lead up to the trade negotiations. The question is whether that right also includes direction, and I think not. I think that participation means consultation in every respect. It is premature for me to attempt to define this any more precisely because the statement made by the ministers at Halifax made it quite clear that while they had agreed on certain phrases respecting the federal-provincial relationship, within the next 90 days they were going to deal with the way in which those phrases would be embodied in principles of action or in terms of reference. Therefore, that work has yet to be completed.

What has been done so far is to recognize the common interests of the two levels of government in this matter and to agree within a limited time frame to set down actual details as to the way in which they will be interpreted and acted upon.

Senator MacEachen: Is the Leader of the Government saying that the provinces' right of participation in the negotiations is a right of consultation alone?

Senator Roblin: I am not saying anything at all about that; I am simply saying that the question of participation in formulating our policies in the initial stages is one which we all recognize because we have already had substantial discussions with the provinces with respect to these matters.

The real nub of the question is, where do you go from here? I think that that is what my honourable friend is asking. I am saying to him that the governments have agreed that within 90 days they will settle on the terms of reference for the future.

Senator MacEachen: I understood the Secretary of State for External Affairs to say yesterday in the House of Commons that a historic step had been taken at the federal-provincial conference and that they had moved beyond what had been the practice in the past, namely, consultation and that there was now a right of participation in the negotiations. In fact, the Secretary of State for External Affairs described it as a watershed or a historic change in the policy of the federal government. What I am asking the Leader of the Government

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—PARTICIPATION OF PROVINCES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Govern-is whether he will clarify what is meant by this right of participation. Perhaps to help him in answering, I will ask him to tell us whether representatives of the provinces will be present at the negotiations between Canada and the United States.

Senator Roblin: As I think I have said twice already, that has to be established because the communiqué issued by the ministers in Halifax makes it perfectly clear that they are going to have to resolve the precise definition of these matters within the 90-day period, and I am sure that that will be done. I do not think I can pretend to tell my friend what the outcome of those discussions will be, so he will have to wait and see.

Senator MacEachen: Therefore, the Leader of the Government is saying that at the present time it has not been agreed at the First Ministers' Conference that representatives of the provinces will be present at the actual negotiations. I ask the question because of the understanding that has been carried away from the conference by a number of premiers. For example, the Premier of Alberta stated:

I want a firsthand reporting of it. I don't want to have someone else come out of the room and tell me what happened. I want our man there to tell me.

That, of course, is put in the form of a request, but the Premier of Newfoundland was quite categorical in saying:

We are going to have observers at wherever those negotiations are happening . . . and we are going to know at a moment's notice all the time what is going on.

Is Premier Peckford mistaken in telling us, as he did on a national telecast a couple of days ago, that the provinces would be present in the room while the negotiations are taking place?

Senator Roblin: Each of the 11 participants at this meeting is entitled to give his own interpretation of what he thinks was established at the time. I think, however, I have to have recourse to the actual wording of the agreement that was entered into at that time in order to set forth the position of the federal government. I can read it to my honourable friend if he so wishes.

Senator MacEachen: I have read it myself, but we all know that these agreements are put in general terms; that the First Ministers did meet as a group; and that, when the meeting was concluded, the provincial premiers gave some very clear-cut statements. One was by Premier Peckford when he said that he would have representatives in the room, as other provinces would, when the negotiations were taking place between Canada and the United States.

All I am asking is: Is that to be the case? Is it undecided? Or is it unclear?

Senator Roblin: There is no reference to that whatsoever in the communiqué, and I really cannot go beyond that.

Senator MacEachen: Would the Leader of the Government try to find out for us whether, indeed, there was an understanding reached at the First Ministers' Conference that provincial representatives would be present in the room during the negotiations between Canada and the United States?

Senator Roblin: If I attempt to make a unilateral interpretation of this document, I believe I will be in the same box as other people who are doing the same thing. I think we have to wait until the First Ministers or their deputies meet again in order to amplify the statements contained in this document with specific content.

Senator MacEachen: I am really asking the Leader of the Government not to interpret it, but to find out from his colleagues who were in that room whether that was the decision or whether the premiers are mistaken. Something happened in that room, and the premiers are saying: "Yes, we are now entitled to be present in that room when the negotiations are taking place between Canada and the United States."

All I want to know is: Was that agreement reached, or are the premiers mistaken?

Senator Roblin: I cannot tell whether the premiers are mistaken or not in the sense that I was not in the room, but I do have in front of me a statement on which they agreed, and in that statement there was no reference to the point my friend makes.

Senator MacEachen: Will the Leader of the Government find out whether that understanding was reached and is to be the procedure?

Senator Roblin: I think that will be the subject of negotiations for the next 90 days.

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government is saying that Premier Peckford and Premier Getty are mistaken; that their presence at the negotiations was not agreed to, but it will have to be negotiated; and that they, obviously, misunderstood what happened at the conference. That is my conclusion.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government another question which is, I think, even more important, and that is: Will the instructions or the mandate for the negotiators be determined by a first ministers' conference?

It is clear that Mr. Reisman must have a mandate or, to put it another way, have detailed instructions when he goes into the negotiations. Will those instructions now be derived from a first ministers' conference as part of the historic decision taken in Halifax?

Senator Roblin: I guess I had better read the communiqué, because my honourable friend makes it necessary for me to do so.

Paragraph 2 of the communiqué reads as follows:

The Canada-U.S. negotiations are now in their preparatory phase.

The word "preparatory," I think, is important. It goes on to state:

During that phase, the ministers agreed to give effect, within the next 90 days, to the principles of full provincial participation through, among other things:

—establishing a common basis of facts and analysis;

—each province and the federal government setting out their objectives for the negotiations;

—establishing an agreed view of the obstacles to the achievement of these objectives that may exist in the United States.

● (1410)

In the third paragraph of the communiqué it is made clear that there is a very strong possibility of holding further meetings at the level of ministers or first ministers as may be necessary to give further consideration to these matters.

Senator MacEachen: I have read the announcement that the minister has read. It refers to full participation. Yesterday, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, "We agreed," and he uses these words, "for the first time in history, that we would move . . . toward the right of the provinces to participate in the trade negotiations." I ask whether that right includes the right of the provinces to sit down with the Prime Minister at a first ministers' conference to establish the mandate for the negotiators. I base my question on what the Premier of Saskatchewan has stated categorically and without making a request. He stated as follows:

We've got ourselves a process, so we are all involved, all the premiers and the prime minister sit down like a huge Board of Directors and we're calling the shots together. So the Canadian public knows everything, the premiers know and we can take that decision to the negotiator and he can say, okay boy give him your best shot, come back and tell us how it's going.

Premier Devine is not the only premier to come to precisely the same conclusion. The Premier of Ontario said:

The bottom line being that the negotiating team will take instructions from the first ministers—

I want to know whether, as has been stated by at least two premiers—and I could probably get other statements from other premiers who would say the same thing, if I wanted to take more time—the right of participation in the negotiation means that the mandate will emanate and derive from a first ministers' conference. Does the right of participation mean that?

Senator Roblin: Quotation is a selective business. If my honourable friend wishes to hear another quotation from the Premier of Ontario, I can give him this one:

The Government of Canada must speak with one voice but must speak for all of Canada.

I am sure that we can both agree that that is a proper statement for a premier to make. As for the precise machinery by which this process of consultation will be observed, I have to come back to my point that that matter is going to be settled by the parties concerned within the next 90 days.

Senator MacEachen: Is the Leader of the Government saying that the matter has not been settled, that it is still an open question whether all of the governments will be involved in settling the mandate for the negotiations?

Senator Roblin: I cannot take any responsibility for what the various premiers are saying. The only document on which I can base my replies is that which contains what they agreed to at Halifax. I have read portions of what they agreed to at Halifax. The interpretation of that is going to be something that has to be settled among the parties in the next 90 days. We will then have the full picture.

Senator MacEachen: What the Leader of the Government is now saying is that Premier Devine and Premier Peterson are quite wrong, that it was not agreed that the mandate for the negotiating team will come from the first ministers. That is what he is saying. I am not asking him to create something new. I am asking him to tell the Senate the policy of the Government of Canada. Is it now the policy of the Government of Canada to share with all of the provinces the right to establish the mandate for the negotiating team?

Senator Roblin: I will read the third paragraph of the communiqué. My honourable friend says that he has read it, but he does not appear to have digested it.

The ministers agreed further that this preparatory work should include the determination of how best to give effect to the principle of full provincial participation in subsequent phases of the negotiations; and that the work might be accomplished, among other ways, through holding further meetings at the level of ministers or first ministers if necessary.

That clearly indicates to me that the final determination as to how to give effect to provincial participation has not been made, regardless of what some people may say about it. It seems to be quite clear from this wording that that decision has not been made, and it may very well be that further discussions at the level of ministers, or the first ministers, may be necessary to come to a meeting of minds on that subject—which comes back to my point: These matters are still under negotiation.

Senator MacEachen: The minister has read the words "full participation" from the statement. The Secretary of State for External Affairs yesterday used the words "full participation." I ask the Leader of the Government whether there can be full participation, to which the government has already agreed, unless the provinces are permitted to share in establishing the negotiating mandate. How can there be full participation? Does it not follow inexorably that if they are to have full participation, they must participate in establishing the mandate for the negotiators?

Senator Roblin: That is not what the First Ministers said when they left the conference. What they said was that:

—this preparatory work should include the determination of how best to give effect to the principle of full participation in subsequent phases of the negotiation;—

That is, how best to give effect to a principle. Well, that is a debatable matter, and that can be debated between them. But I think it is unreasonable to complain to me about the matter when it is the clear, express wording of the communiqué issued by the gentlemen concerned.

Senator MacEachen: Let us go beyond the communiqué. The Leader of the Government is a member of the cabinet, and it is a collective responsibility that we have here. I am asking him, in his capacity as a member of the cabinet, if he will tell us now whether in the upcoming trade negotiations the provinces will share with the federal government the establishing of the mandate for the negotiator; and, when the negotiator requires a new mandate, will the First Ministers again be called together in a meeting? I am asking him whether that is the policy of the government. He does not have to read from a script. Is that the policy or not?

Senator Roblin: The policy of the government is to meet with the other parties to determine the modalities of this matter. It follows from that that the modalities have not yet been decided on anyone's part, so far as I am concerned. So the situation is simply this; the preparatory work will determine how best to give effect to these principles.

Senator MacEachen: I think the Leader of the Government is misreading the very words themselves. The principle, surely, is the participation in decision making, and the preparatory work is to establish how the process of decision making will be carried out, whether there will be several meetings of the First Ministers, whether it will require a majority vote of First Ministers, and how many premiers must you have on side before you can give authority to the negotiator. The Premier of British Columbia is an experienced person at the negotiating table, and the Leader of the Government is doing these premiers less than justice when he will not deal with the substance of their statement. The Premier of British Columbia has stated, "Not only will we have the right, as First Ministers, to set the mandate, but when Mr. Reisman goes to Washington and finds that he cannot get an agreement and needs new instructions, we First Ministers will sit down together and give him new instructions." Those are not modalities. Those are principles that the premiers are talking about. So, why will not the Leader of the Government take the question seriously and not try to escape it by reading from a document that has been overtaken, not only by time but by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who was categorical in the House yesterday, and by at least six premiers. Why will he not come clean and tell us what the hell is going on.

Senator Roblin: For the simple reason that what we are talking about here is participation. We are not talking about decision making as such; we are talking about participation.

Senator MacEachen: I see.

Senator Roblin: What that means inevitably is going to be a matter of debate between the heads of government, and my honourable friend cannot expect me to lay down a policy on that matter when it is still open for discussion—because that is something that the Prime Minister is going to have to do himself.

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government has said, first, that full participation in the trade negotiations does not mean decision making. So they are not going to be making decisions. They can participate, but it is not full enough to include decision making. Second, he has told us that it is not yet settled as to whether the provincial representatives will be in the room with the negotiator, and he has told us that it is not yet settled whether the First Ministers will formulate a common mandate in the issuance of instructions. In other words, on every point his answers have been at variance with the statements of very important provincial premiers. I do not think that that is a satisfactory situation for the government, for the public or for any of us. We are entering into a huge enterprise that requires support from all quarters if it is to succeed, and the government will not help us to understand what is happening and has today, through its spokesman in the Senate, contradicted the conclusions reached at that conference, particularly by the Premier of Ontario, the Premier of British Columbia, the Premier of Saskatchewan and the Premier of Newfoundland.

• (1420)

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, my honourable friend persists in ignoring the fact that these gentlemen themselves made it quite clear at Halifax that the preparatory work should include the determination of how best to give effect to the principle of full provincial participation. They made it clear that they themselves had not decided at that time what the modalities of the matter should be, quite clear. It is open for negotiation, it is being negotiated and it will be negotiated in the next 90 days. I quite agree with my honourable friend that this is a monumental task. I quite agree with my honourable friend that it is necessary to have the widest possible Canadian consensus on what we should do, and one way to do that, I think, is to have negotiations with the provinces to determine how that can best be arrived at. That is what we are saying in these negotiations and that is the policy that I am trying to express. If my honourable friend is impatient and says that we should tell him now what will turn out in 90 days, I have to disappoint him because I cannot do it.

However, I tell him that the gentlemen concerned in Halifax understood very well, when they left the conference chamber at any rate, that this determination had yet to be arrived at, and when it is arrived at we will have the points that my honourable friend seeks to elucidate.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, if it is true, as the Leader of the Government has said, that the provinces will not participate in decision making, what is to be negotiated? What is there to negotiate for 90 days if the provinces have no right to participate in the decision making which is the key point? These men are not children. They know that decisions have to be reached and that is where they want to be when the decisions are taken. The Leader of the Government has said that they are not to participate in the decision making.

Senator Roblin: The Leader of the Government has not said that. I have said that I cannot give federal confirmation at the present time to the statements made by the provincial premiers who are in the negotiating posture. I cannot do that. They have a right to say what they think and they have a right to give their interpretation. They have a right to declare their interests, and it would be odd if they did not. However, based on their own agreement, the actual definition of how these matters will turn out is to be determined by discussion and consultation over the next 90 days. I think that that is the proper way to go.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I believe that we have established the wide uncertainty that exists in this field. I think there is a difference of opinion between the Leader of the Government and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. If honourable senators wish to read yesterday's House of Commons Debates, they will see that the Honourable Joe Clark stated that an historic step had been taken in giving the provinces the right to full participation in the trade negotiations. I believe that that is the understanding of the premiers. What is to be negotiated is not the principles which they think have been established, but how those principles are to be implemented. I hope that the Leader of the Government will try to take a look at all this and give us some answers, because we would simply like to know. I want to know especially whether 11 governments will instruct Mr. Reisman or one government.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend refers to the "historic" reference by my colleague in the other house. I think that may not be an incorrect definition because, as I recall other trade negotiations, they never reached the stage of discussion on the part of First Ministers that has been developed in Halifax. Certainly, to my recollection, that represents something new. There have always been consultations with the provinces, but not at the level at which they are going on at the present time. I tell my honourable friend that, just as soon as these issues are clarified by discussion among the principals, which is the only way in which it can be done, he will be told about it.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

HEALTH AND EDUCATION—EFFECT OF REDUCTION IN TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a question on the same topic, that of the federal-provincial conference in Halifax last weekend. In view of the fact that the provincial premiers have fallen neither for the smooth rhetoric of the Prime Minister nor the tricky arithmetic of the Minister of Finance, and the fact that it is now very clear to them that, collectively, the provinces will lose $6 billion over the next five years in the financing of their health and post-secondary educational programs, I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate why his government is being so cruel as to fight the federal deficit on the backs of the sick and of young Canadians who want to undertake post-secondary education.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think that my honourable friend somewhat over-states his case. The fact of the matter is that in the last five years the Established Programs Financing funds made available to the provinces amounted to $65 billion. In the next five years, it will be $90 billion. That is an increase of almost 40 per cent.

The significant part, however, is to note the change in the conditions between the first period and the second. In the first period, the rate of increase was approximately 7 per cent. Now it is 5, but bear in mind that, during the first period, the rate of inflation, which affects these costs drastically, was much higher than it is at the present time. It ranged anywhere from 8 to 10 to 12 per cent, so that 7 per cent in those days was a far less satisfactory payment to the provinces than is 5 per cent today when inflation is so much lower. I do not think, therefore, that it can be realistically maintained that we are trying to fight the battle of the federal deficit on the backs of the deserving. I do not think that that is the case at all. I think that the federal government continues to do its share, and I would say that is more than its share, particularly when one takes into account the effect of the lower inflation factor that we have now.

The federal government itself is controlling very carefully the expenses over which it has direct control. In fact, they are flat when you leave out the cost of transfer payments to individuals and the cost of supporting the national debt. But surely my honourable friend will recognize that all Canadians are being called upon to do something with respect to the federal finances, and that includes the provincial governments. It seems to me that the arrangement that has been made to continue the support of the higher education programs and the health services at the level proposed is not an unreasonable one in all the circumstances, and that the parties concerned are not substantially worse off than they were before.

Senator Haidasz: I have a supplementary question. Surely the Leader of the Government in the Senate understands that cutting $6 billion in the next five years from the funds provided for health and post-secondary education will impair the services to Canadians in those fields. In fact, Saint Joseph's Hospital in Toronto has already had to cut 15 per cent of its services to the patients who use that hospital because they are not receiving the money they need to meet the costs of health services.

Senator Roblin: My friend talks about the situation today. I suggest we must look ahead to the future. In the past, the rate of inflation in the medical field and in the educational field was much higher than it is today.

The inflation rate today is around 4 per cent. Let's hope it stays that way. The result is that the natural impact of the changes is not the one that my honourable friend describes. In the old days, they may have received an increase of 7 per cent on the grants, but they faced a rate of 10 or 12 per cent on inflation. Now they receive 5 per cent increase on the grants while facing an increase of 4 per cent on inflation. Who is better off? Without question, the second set of people are better off.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, since all of the premiers disagreed with the explanations given to them by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Finance, why does the Leader of the Government in the Senate persist in giving the impression that either the premiers do not understand what they were told, or that they are asking too much?

● (1430)

Senator Roblin: The premiers understand very well what the situation is, but I have yet to find a premier who would be willing to say that the federal government has given him enough. If my honourable friend knows of any such premier, I would be interested in knowing about him.

Senator MacEachen: Premier Buchanan did.

Senator Roblin: He is one man we will have to give a credit mark to.

Senator Frith: And you probably did when you were a premier.

Senator Roblin: I doubt that. When I was Premier of Manitoba I dug for all I could get. I would be very surprised if that were still not the case with others. So, I know a little about this subject and can tell my honourable friend that I think Premier Buchanan deserves special mention because there are not many like him. What did Diogenes say about an honest man? Well, he is one.

Without wishing to cast any unflattering aspersions on the other premiers who were present—because I do not wish to do that; I think they discharged their duties as best they saw them—it is quite reasonable to expect, and it is only in the course of nature, that premiers will say, “Give me a little more.”

Senator Doody: Premier Buchanan for the Senate!

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—PARTICIPATION OF PROVINCES

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government the following question: Following the commitment that was given to the provinces on the process and the methodology of establishing the negotiating instructions for Mr. Reisman, can the leader tell us whether the federal government has retained the power or the right to give instructions to the negotiator, Mr. Reisman, or must that wait until the end of the 90-day period?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am sure that Mr. Reisman will conduct himself in accordance with the current rules and regulations as long as they are in effect; if they are changed, then he will change.

Senator Olson: That's an interesting comment, but may I have an answer to the question I asked, which was: Has the federal government, in keeping with its commitment to the provinces, retained the right and the power to give instructions to the negotiator, Mr. Reisman, or will that wait until the end of the 90-day period? I know Mr. Reisman, and I am sure he will do what he says he will do, but may I have an answer to my question?

Senator Roblin: I must confess that I have not consulted my colleagues in connection with this specific matter, so I may be venturing on to thin ice, but I can say that in my opinion—and I will be pleased to confirm this later—Mr. Reisman will continue to carry out his duties during the 90-day period, just as he does now. If the rules are changed after that, he will be guided accordingly.

Senator Olson: Does the federal government feel it still has the moral authority to give Mr. Reisman instructions with respect to the undertaking, or has that been subordinated to the commitment that was made to the provinces?

Senator Roblin: The federal government will have to be guided by what is practical and realistic in the circumstances without in any way departing from its undertaking to give considerations to ways and means by which this concept of provincial participation may be introduced.

Senator Olson: Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate care to tell us what is practical in these circumstances? The leader said the government would be guided by what is practical; could we have a definition of “practical”?

Senator Roblin: We will just have to use our best judgment.

Senator Olson: Is the word “practical” being used as the word “soon” was used some time ago? Could we have a straight answer? Has the federal government renounced its authority to give instructions for 90 days?

Whatever may be interpreted as being “practical” is fine, but would you please define what is meant by that? I want to know whether the government has decided that it will not give Mr. Reisman any more instructions until the government has gone through the so-called process of 90 days? We do not even know whether there is a process or not. The Premier of Saskatchewan, as the Leader of the Opposition has already pointed out, says, “We have a process.” Do we have a process, or are we going to wait 90 days to find out whether we do have a process, and whether that process will be used to determine the instructions that may be given?

Senator Roblin: I have already answered the first part of the question about Mr. Reisman's activities and what the federal government will do; both will carry on doing what they are now doing. As to the process, I read it to him.

Senator Olson: I have also read it.

Senator Roblin: You have! Then I wish you had understood it.

Senator Frith: That's funny! We were just thinking the same thing about you.

PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

RESULTS OF PROVINCIAL ELECTION

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate would extend the compliments of this chamber to the Prime Minister for his foresight, his perspicacity and his ability to see into the future when he said approximately ten days ago that the people of Quebec do not have to fear Pierre-Marc Johnson and the PQ government.

Senator Frith: “There's nothing to fear from the Parti Québécois.” How right he was!

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I agree with my colleague in that the Prime Minister was unusually prescient.

Senator Sinclair: Perhaps we should also congratulate the Leader of the Government in the Senate—

Senator Walker: Don't overdo it!

Senator Sinclair: —for his statement, "You can rely on the good sense of the people of Quebec." I extend my congratulations to him.

Senator Roblin: In order to confirm the perfect impartiality with which I dealt with the question on a previous occasion, my honourable friend should record that I expressed my confidence in both Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Johnson as representatives of the people of Quebec. I thought it was proper that I should do so and I see no reason to change my view now.

STATUS OF WOMEN

ECONOMIC EQUALITY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and relates to the First Ministers' Conference held in Halifax last week. There was on the agenda for that meeting another matter of national importance, and that concerned the status of women. The government presented to the conference a report entitled: "A Progress Report on Economic Equality for Women", and many of the premiers put forth proposals. Premier Peterson of Ontario suggested a six-point detailed proposal of measures that could be taken to improve the situation of women in Canada. I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate what the reaction of the federal government to that proposal is, when can we expect to hear about an explicit response to that and what further action will be taken?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not in a position to reply to that question at the present time. I have no information.

Senator Marsden: Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate be willing to obtain such information and report back to the chamber?

Senator Roblin: I will make inquiries to see what decisions the conference arrived at with respect to those matters.

Senator Marsden: If I may, I believe that the conference did not arrive at decisions, but according to newspaper accounts the government was to respond and let the premiers know where they stood and when there would be further discussion. I should like to know what the time frame will be for those further discussions and when we are likely to hear about further action.

Senator Roblin: That is exactly my point; the issue is not resolved to the point where I am able to make a statement about it either with respect to the time element or the substance of the matter.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

HEALTH AND EDUCATION—EFFECT OF REDUCTION IN TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I should like to return to the question posed by Senator Haidasz. I got the impression from the answer the leader gave to Senator Haidasz that, in fact, the cost of post-secondary education and health has decreased in the past year or so. Is that the answer he gave to Senator Haidasz?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): No, I do not think so; I think those costs are still going up.

● (1440)

Senator Thériault: You said that they are still going up, but do you realize that the increase in costs for post-secondary education and health services in most of the provinces last year was higher than the year before? Despite the decreased rate of inflation the cost of providing post-secondary education and health services has increased at a faster rate than the rate of inflation; as a matter of fact, at a higher rate than it increased two and three years ago.

Senator Flynn: Thank you for the information.

Senator Thériault: When you say that the cost to the federal government will increase by 5 per cent while the rate of inflation will be 4 per cent, you are not, in fact, reflecting the true cost of increases in health services and post-secondary education. That is why some of the provinces, in particular the Atlantic provinces, are in strait jackets. For example, if the federal government goes through with the Minister of Finance's projection of reducing the expected grants to the province of New Brunswick for post-secondary education and health services, hospitals will have to close and grants for post-secondary education will have to be lowered. I hope that in the less privileged provinces the Minister of Finance will reconsider his threatened reduction of grants in those two areas.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate review what he said and inform us of what is happening regarding increased costs?

Senator Roblin: I do not think it would be advantageous for me to review what I have said, but I will take my honourable friend's point as a serious one and if I have any comments to make on it at a later date, I will be glad to oblige him.

AGRICULTURE

NATIONAL STRATEGY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would also like to dwell on the federal-provincial meeting in Halifax where federal and provincial agriculture ministers agreed that they would, over the next six months, develop a national agricultural strategy for Canada and then report their progress to the First Ministers.

May I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether this will mean that such issues as the national sugar policy will now be in abeyance for a further six months when we had been looking forward to seeing developments along this line before the end of this year?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think you can take it for granted that all federal initiatives in the agricultural field will continue during the process of review for the obvious reason that we cannot simply close up the shop in order to study what is in the show window. Those policies and programs we have in place will continue to be operated by the federal government regardless of what happens with respect to this conference on agriculture which will not conclude for six months.

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—1983 STABILIZATION PAYMENT

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, that leads me to the inevitable question: Does the Leader of the Government in the Senate have anything further to report on the progress of the 1983 stabilization payment for the sugar-beet industry?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): No, honourable senators.

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government if he could advise us whether or not the details for the $150 million drought relief program have been worked out? In particular, I am interested in the method of or the formula for making the payments. If that has not been determined, could the Leader of the Government indicate to us what process the government intends to follow to establish the formula?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe that I can promise my honourable friend that the details of the process to regulate the distribution of money will be announced soon. When he asks how soon is soon, I promise to make a very special effort to make sure that soon means soon!

Senator Olson: I want to indicate to the Leader of the Government that I appreciate that answer and the emphasis that is there, because there was some hope held out that the first payment would be in the hands of those drought-stricken farmers before Christmas. If that is to be achieved, the formula for determining the amount that an individual farmer may receive will have to be known.

Senator Roblin: If I remember correctly, in the case of the one province which accepted the original federal offer, namely, British Columbia, there is a chance—and I put it no higher than that—that they will be seeing some of their cheques go out before the Christmas period. With respect to the rest of the provinces, it certainly would have to be early in the new year.

Senator Olson: Could the Leader of the Government give an undertaking that he will try to obtain the basis on which the payment will be made and provide it to us as soon as possible?

Senator Roblin: I undertake to do that.

THE DE HAVILLAND AIRCRAFT OF CANADA, LIMITED

SALE TO BOEING CORPORATION

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. We have been told by Senator Kelly in regard to another matter that experts were called in to determine the price regarding the sale of government assets. Could the leader tell us whether that policy was followed regarding the sale of de Havilland?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if my memory is correct, the price negotiated was related to the book value of the assets of de Havilland.

Senator Sinclair: Everyone who has flown or who has been interested in aviation recognizes the capability of the Boeing company in assessing outstanding commercial aircraft. I think that the Senate would like to record that once again they have shown that capability in determining the advantages of the de Havilland type of aircraft.

In the agreement of sale is there any provision that will make it essential that any series arising from the present aircraft manufactured by de Havilland will be manufactured in Canada?

Senator Roblin: Yes, honourable senators. I do not have the specific document to hand at the moment but my recollection is that the spinoffs from the de Havilland aircraft anticipated to be developed in the future will be manufactured in Canada unless the explicit permission of the government is sought to do otherwise. The undertaking of the Boeing company is to build in Canada and to give that plant a world mandate for that kind of aircraft as far as their company is concerned.

Senator Sinclair: I have a further question. In light of that and the development of the Dash 7 and the Dash 8, is there any provision as to a minimum number of aircraft that will be produced in any given calendar year?

Senator Roblin: I should think not. I expect that that will be decided by the market.

Senator Sinclair: In light of these answers I think it only right to draw to the attention of honourable senators that after an aircraft is developed it takes a long time for the capability of that development to be reflected in price. Here we have a price that can move the other way—a gross and a minus one—so that we may very well see over time that this entire company has actually been sold for $90 million. What percentage is that of the book value?

Senator Roblin: I cannot answer that question, but I can tell you that the public investment in de Havilland is pretty close to a billion dollars, which is some cost as far as the taxpayers of Canada are concerned, and that there is an undoubted requirement for further capital investment of around $200 million, I am told, in the forthcoming period. There are substantial requirements of that nature that have to be met. One can see that there is a very substantial ongoing cost involved in operating this plant successfully.

● (1450)

We have had it for about ten years and have not been able to do that. It is costing us somewhere in the neighbourhood of $100 million per year to pay the interest alone on the money that is now, unfortunately, going to be part of the Canadian national debt in order to support what has been put into de Havilland so far.

It seems to me advisable to make the best arrangements we can to assure the future of that plant—insofar as anyone can assure a thing of that nature—in the way that we have done, and to create the conditions that will enhance the likelihood of maintaining the greatest possible number of jobs there for the future.

Senator Sinclair: In light of the fact that there was what we might call “government bookkeeping” involved in arriving at the book value of de Havilland, what does the relevance of the sale price in relationship to book value have to do with the sale of this company?

Senator Roblin: I am not sure that it has any relevance. My honourable friend seemed to me to ask the question, so I told him.

Senator Sinclair: I did not introduce book value, honourable senators; it was the Leader of the Government in the Senate who introduced the relationship to book value.

It is obvious to knowledgeable people, as reported in the press, that Boeing, once again, has made a wonderful deal. Boeing is a good Yankee trader. I hope this is not an indication of the type of Yankee trading deals we are going to make in regard to other trade matters.

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend would recognize that in a situation of this sort the question of getting the best price is a difficult one. Negotiations and investigations have gone on over the past year; there were about 130 contacts made in connection with the sale of this company. Three offers were ultimately received, and the judgment was that the offer from the Boeing company was the best.

In the whole context of that transaction, in connection with searching for markets, establishing price and trying to ascertain what maximum could be obtained for that company, the government was not relying entirely on its own information. It had a group of leading investment bankers, both in Canada and in Europe, investigate this matter. As my honourable friend would imagine, chartered accounting, legal and financial advice was sought from a wide variety of sources in order to arrive at the most reasonable basis possible with respect to this question of disposal.

This is the best arrangement that can be arrived at at the present time, and it has certainly secured the consent of all concerned, including those directors of the CDIC who come from the private sector.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

POLL—AWARDING OF CONTRACT

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I am grateful to the Leader of the Government for the informative delayed answer he provided on November 27 in response to my oral question of November 5. I asked about the bidding on the government's proposed super-omnibus public opinion poll. The leader has informed me, and I quote:

This contract has not yet been awarded.

In view of the fact that the bidding closed on August 30, that is 96 days ago, I have four questions. They are: Why the unconscionable delay? Has the government changed its mind about this very questionable proposal? Will the leader undertake to inform us when the award is granted and to whom it is granted?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I cannot accept all the premises that are enshrined in those four questions my honourable friend asks. I think he will find that, when the dust settles, this whole operation represents a distinct economy in respect of what was being done aforesaid in respect of this matter.

However, since he asks me if I will let him know to whom the contract is awarded, when the award is made, that I undertake to do.

Senator Davey: I think the “dust-settling” is a most appropriate metaphor.

Senator Roblin: The metaphor lies in the tongue of the speaker.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

QUEEN CHARLOTTE ISLANDS—LOGGING DISPUTE—HAIDA INDIAN RIGHTS

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I watched with great interest the reports coming out of the recent First Ministers' Conference at Halifax to see if there was any reference to the topic of aboriginal claims raised at the meetings.

I raised this matter last week with the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Can he advise us if Prime Minister Mulroney had an opportunity to discuss this important question with Premier Bennett, with particular reference to the situation of the Haidas of the Queen Charlotte Islands involving logging, in particular, on Lyell Island?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): The federal government is very sensitive to the position of native Canadians in all parts of the country and in respect of the whole array of problems that has arisen recently.

I think I may say, without undue modesty, that the policy being followed by the federal government in respect of its sphere of responsibility seems to be an improvement over anything we have had before and may even gain the approval of a good many of the aboriginal people who have rights or interests at stake; so, we are on common ground with respect to that.

Respecting the conversations in Halifax, I think it is correct to say that the Prime Minister did speak to the Premier of British Columbia about it. No announcement, that I am aware of, has been made and I think we must respect the fact that, regardless of what the Prime Minister says, the Premier of British Columbia has certain constitutional prerogatives which we cannot usurp.

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, I, perhaps, will argue about whether there is an improvement over previous administrations. I think the attitude of the previous administration was quite good in terms of its recognition of aboriginal rights and claims.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate ask the Prime Minister to tell Premier Bennett to get off the silly high horse he is on regarding aboriginal rights in the province of British Columbia and to get down to some sensible negotiations with the first citizens of that province? They have a reasonable, just and justifiable claim that can easily be settled with a little common sense if only that premier and his government would get down to business and start negotiating.

Senator Roblin: I appreciate my honourable friend's feelings in the matter, but he really cannot expect the Prime Minister to issue instructions of that kind to a provincial premier, any more than we would expect the reverse to happen.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND (PROSTITUTION)—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, for the second reading of the Bill C-49, intitled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code (prostitution)".—(Honourable Senator Lewis).

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I believe I can say that we are all aware of the frightful situation existing in some of our Canadian cities caused by the nuisances created by street soliciting of prostitutes. We have heard of the harassment, abuse, molestation and interference suffered by residents and others in the lawful use and enjoyment of certain streets and neighbourhoods caused by the activities of prostitutes and their customers.

Apart from the annoyance, there is also fear for safety and the obvious adverse effect these activities are having on these neighbourhoods. The problem has reached alarming proportions. I believe we all agree that steps must be taken to alleviate this terrible situation.

It is apparent from what the Minister of Justice said in the other place when he introduced this bill, that its object was, through an amendment to section 195.1 of the Criminal Code, to clean up the nuisances caused by street soliciting and that he was under pressure from groups, both police and citizens, to take action.

It is claimed by police authorities that the provisions of the Criminal Code dealing with nuisance, loitering, causing disturbance, pimping, procuring, operating bawdy houses and disorderly conduct are not sufficient to combat the situation now evident in some cities.

When the Honourable Senator MacDonald introduced this bill in this chamber, he explained that the present provision of the Criminal Code, section 195.1, prohibiting soliciting in public places, has largely, by reason of court decisions, been considered by police to be ineffectual in dealing with the situation.

As the honourable senator explained, these decisions held that, under that section of the code, to constitute the offence of soliciting, there must not only be a demonstration by an accused to make himself or herself available for prostitution, but also the conduct complained of must be pressing or persistent. It is claimed that this has tied the hands of the authorities and, accordingly, constitutes the reason for the present bill.

● (1500)

I believe that all honourable senators sympathize with the citizens who are so badly affected by the problems created by street soliciting and are prepared to support the implementation of proper, sensible and workable law to combat the state of affairs which this bill is supposed to remedy. However, the present bill, which has been described by some as "a legislative sledge hammer," goes too far.

Whilst the proposed legislation may, in the short run, reduce for a time the numbers involved in street prostitution in some areas, it will not, in fact, eradicate prostitution, which will continue and will be pushed into a much worse situation.

It must be remembered that, at present, prostitution is not illegal in Canada. If the present bill is to work it will have the effect of pushing prostitutes further into the hands of pimps, procurers and other criminal elements. The present bill raises some serious questions for all citizens, as it may have adverse consequences for the rights and liberties of all.

Bearing in mind the object of the bill, let us look at its provisions. Honourable senators will see that it defines a public place as any place to which the public has access, and that includes a motor vehicle in a public place or a place open to public view.

It prohibits any manner of communication, realized or attempted, in public for the purpose of engaging in prostitution or of obtaining sexual services of a prostitute.

This will grant to police unlimited discretion in applying the law. It would be up to the policemen to decide what was in the mind of an individual who stopped and talked to another individual. Any person engaged in a lawful pursuit will be liable to be apprehended by police, who may decide in their own discretion that the person is stopping a vehicle or communicating with someone else for the purpose of prostitution.

This leaves just too much discretion to the police, who will inevitably apply the law selectively. It will leave the police free to move against a person they know or believe to be a prostitute or a suspected customer merely for being present in a public place, where he has every right to be, along with other citizens.

How the police will eventually prove their charges is another matter, unless they use decoys or other covert, underhanded means.

This problem was addressed very fully last spring by the Special Committee on Pornography and Prostitution, otherwise known as the Fraser committee. That committee proposed a stronger law against street solicitation, but, in doing so, felt it should be necessary to show in support of a charge that there was some element of interference with the public or property occupiers.

The committee felt that covert methods, which could be used by police if there was to be a total ban on solicitation, were unacceptable.

The committee proposed that rather than amending section 195.1 of the Criminal Code it should be repealed, and that, instead, section 171 of the Code be amended so as to deal with the situation. The relevant words are:

—so that it will relate clearly to the nuisance problems associated with street prostitution and do so in a way which makes it clear what sort of conduct is unacceptable.

The committee's suggested amendment made it clear just what the nature of the nuisance was to be. Whilst its proposed wording was somewhat similar to that of the present bill, it provided that the prohibited conduct, to be criminal, should have been committed on more than one occasion. In other words, a nuisance would be committed by the soliciting of one individual on more than one occasion or of other individuals in sequence.

This would have made the offence quite clear to both an offender and the police, and would have provided a balance in protection of individual rights.

The government has not chosen to follow this recommendation, giving rise to the objections to the present bill as giving the police too much power. It is not good enough just to give assurances that wide discretionary powers can be left to the police. We have seen in the past where this can lead.

If the law is to have proper public respect, it must strike a proper balance between the need for public order and the rights of individuals, whoever they may be, to move freely in public places without fear of unwarranted police intervention.

There is another aspect of this bill which I would like to mention. Any criminal law which is to be enacted, if it is to be respected by the public and upheld in the courts, should be clear, not vague, and it certainly should not be absurd. The drafting of the law should avoid these pitfalls.

[Senator Lewis.]

What do we have here in this bill? I will not presume to suggest how the courts will interpret the provisions of this bill, if it is enacted and if charges are subsequently laid under it.

I would, however, like to draw attention to some possible problems that might arise, particularly in view of the fate of the present section 195.1 of the Code when dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada. I have some doubts as to the courts upholding the provisions of the bill.

The bill appears to create an offence which could be committed by anyone who, in a public place or in a place open to public view, for the purposes of engaging in prostitution or of obtaining the sexual services of a prostitute, does any or all of three acts described in the bill.

First, it is to be noted that not only does the bill prohibit the doing of these acts in a public place but also in a place open to public view.

This is a wide application and would appear to include private property such as a driveway or even a private garage, if the door was left open, or even if the door was closed but had windows in it. It would presumably include a room in a private home if the drapes were open.

Would the police force an entry into a private home if they saw through its window a prostitute known to them talking with a presumed customer? This would appear to be absurd, but that is the implication. Surely that is not street soliciting. Surely that is too wide an application.

Again, it is to be noted that any of the actions prohibited under the bill will be an offence if they are carried out for the purpose of engaging in prostitution.

Prostitution is not defined in the bill, so presumably it will be given its common definition which, in effect, can be described as the offering by an individual of the body for hire.

Honourable senators will note that it is the individual who offers that individual's body. If that is so, then apparently the bill does not address the actions of a pimp or a third party making an engagement on behalf of a prostitute. Neither would it include the customer.

On this point there have been two conflicting interpretations of what constitutes "for the purpose of prostitution." The B.C. Court of Appeal held that these words refer only to the individual prostituting him or herself, whereas the Appeal Court of Ontario has held that these words refer to the whole transaction being the act of prostitution, irrespective of by whom it is carried out. Hence the matter remains open.

The provision that the listed actions are prohibited if they are carried out for the purpose of obtaining the sexual services of a prostitute might appear to be clear, but it is to be noted that it requires the services of "a prostitute."

Suppose that the person approached is not a prostitute; for example, suppose that a presumed customer stops and inquires of another person if that person is in fact a prostitute, and nothing more. Is that to be sufficient, in itself, to warrant the supposed customer being apprehended if, in fact, the customer does not request sexual services?

In this respect it should be remembered that this is one of the actions of which citizens have been complaining, that is, their being accosted on the street by prospective customers. This provision does not appear to remedy such a situation and it would fail in its objective.

● (1510)

I should now like to turn to the three acts which would appear to trigger an offence under this bill. Subclause (1)(a) of the new clause 195.1 uses the words "stops or attempts to stop any motor vehicle". I ask you: What is stopping a vehicle? How do you stop a vehicle other than by the driver applying the brakes or running it into an obstruction? When can you be guilty of "attempting to stop a vehicle"? What if the vehicle is already stopped for a legitimate purpose? Would the driver be guilty?

Possibly this provision is an attempt to create a prohibition against someone outside the vehicle stopping, or attempting to stop, the vehicle, say, by signals on the street, a signal by a person to stop. But, if that is so, why does not the provision make that clear?

The proposed subsection 195.1(1)(b) deals with the impeding of a pedestrian or vehicular traffic. Does this mean that a person waiting in a public place, or moving on a sidewalk more slowly than other pedestrians, or driving more slowly than other traffic, all for an innocent purpose, is likely to be apprehended under these provisions? Surely the sections of the Criminal Code, provincial Traffic Acts and municipal by-laws dealing with loitering and obstruction should be sufficient for this purpose.

The provision of proposed subsection 195.1(1)(c) against any form of communication with another person would appear to be a breach of fundamental rights under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and it will be interesting to see how that fares in the courts. Is a wink or a nod to be a communication giving rise to a charge under this clause? This would appear to be absurd if one considers the problems that this bill is supposed to remedy.

As I say, I have grave doubts about how these provisions will stand up in the courts. But surely the problem here is not whether a charge will stand up in court, where a proper charge has been laid; is it not, rather, whether the provisions of this bill will lead to innocent people being apprehended by overzealous police, taken into custody, and put to the embarrassment of having charges laid against them, even if those charges are subsequently dropped through lack of police evidence? I suggest that that is the real danger.

Having said that, while it appears that the government has, under pressure, acted hastily and without due consideration for all of the ramifications, it is quite clear to all of us that action must be taken to deal with the problem addressed in the bill. This bill may be mistaken, and I suggest that it will be proved to be so in reality. If that is so, who will answer for the consequences?

It is to be noted that the bill provides for a review of its provisions in three years, which should allow time for court decisions on its interpretation. We can only hope that in the meantime no harm is caused to individuals by this stop-gap action.

It is also to be noted that it is the intention of the government to introduce legislation shortly to deal comprehensively with prostitution and pornography. Let us hope that in the preparation of such legislation full consideration will be given to the proposals of the Fraser commission and other groups on these topics. It is unfortunate that such consideration was not given before this bill was brought forward.

There are a lot of matters that if and when this bill is referred to committee, I hope will be given further consideration.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, the previous speakers, Senator Finlay MacDonald who presented the bill and Senator Lewis, have covered all the important points of this legislation.

I would like to say, for the record, that I am not very happy with the remedy Bill C-49 is apparently intended to provide for the problem of soliciting.

It has been said again and again that the purpose is not to condemn prostitution. This was never attempted, and no one is suggesting that it should be.

What is being tried here is mainly to eliminate the nuisance of soliciting.

This nuisance problem exists only in large cities. There is pressure on the government on the part of chiefs of police who, in turn, are subject to pressure from residents of certain city neighbourhoods who are annoyed at the fact that prostitutes are walking certain streets.

In other words, the only complaints about this problem come from certain specific areas of Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Toronto, Montreal and apparently even Halifax. I do not move around enough in Ottawa to know whether the problem exists here as well.

In any case, we are talking about a nuisance exclusive to our big cities. And it is only the nuisance aspect we are trying to eliminate. I have always objected to using the Criminal Code to deal with this kind of situation.

I would like to quote a few comments made by the Law Reform Commission on the subject of defining new crimes, especially in the environmental sector. There was a reference to the borderline areas of the Criminal Code. I am quoting from page 9:

Borderlines will always be blurred; for each particular problem and each type of behaviour creating a social problem, how we determine these lines will be a subject of debate, and we will have to appeal to the individual judgment of Canadians and especially the legislator who must decide whether these acts do or do not constitute a "crime".

On the next page, the report says:

That being said, there is another point that must be made. Clearly, the decisions of the legislator and the proposals of reformers should not merely reflect the moral values or preferences of certain individuals or the political pressures and perceptions of the moment. We must have a consistent philosophy of penal law that would make it a priority to find out whether the behaviour in question constituted a serious violation of what is generally recognized as a fundamental value of our society and as such to be defended on moral grounds.

I submit that according to this principle, the simple fact of being a nuisance does not fit the definition of a crime given here.

When we look at the text of the bill, the possibilities are mindboggling, and Senator Lewis said as much. For instance:

Every person who in a public place or in any place open to public view

(a) stops or attempts to stop any motor vehicle,

Senator Lewis mentioned that it was hard to understand the exact meaning of these words.

(b) impedes the free flow of pedestrian or vehicular traffic or ingress to or egress from premises adjacent to that place, or

(c) stops or attempts to stop any person or in any manner communicates or attempts to communicate with any person for the purpose of engaging in prostitution or of obtaining the sexual services of a prostitute is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

If we remove the word "prostitution", this description could apply to entirely different activities that are constantly going on in certain places. It will be extremely difficult to prove the intent of soliciting for the purpose of engaging in prostitution.

Once again, we are trying to eliminate a nuisance, but I feel that this new description will not solve the problem. It will be very difficult to provide evidence. As Senator Lewis intimated, I have the impression that the Supreme Court will declare this provision to be as ineffective as the one we have now.

During my short stay at the Department of Justice, I experienced the same pressures on the part of police chiefs. I must say that when police chiefs exercise pressure, they intend to be taken seriously. They want us to make their job easier. They are not concerned with morality. They just want us to help them do their job with as little hassle as possible.

I had then suggested that if the Parliament of Canada would have the courage to delete all Criminal Code provisions concerning soliciting for prostitution purposes, this jurisdiction could then be left to the provinces and, through delegation of powers, to the municipalities so that they would adopt nuisance by-laws.

As a matter of fact, at that time the cities of Montreal and Calgary had passed by-laws which were effective when they were enforced. The Supreme Court struck them down for the simple reason that soliciting was covered under Criminal Code provisions. Such by-laws were beyond municipal jurisdiction.

When soliciting was dealt with in the same way as illegal or unauthorized parking, I think the results were excellent. At least people stopped complaining. Perhaps we are sending prostitutes elsewhere to practise their trade, but for the time being the purpose is simply to act on complaints from people who are bothered by such activities.

Once again, I doubt that this bill is the solution. Otherwise, it is obvious that the Minister of Justice himself is not overly hopeful since the bill provides that:

Three years after the coming into force of this Act, a comprehensive review of the provisions of section 195.1 of the Criminal Code, as enacted by this Act, shall be undertaken by such committee of the House of Commons as may be designated or established by the House for that purpose.

Perhaps the Senate should have been mentioned. There is no reference to the Senate, but perhaps they consider that we are not wise enough to be interested in the issue of soliciting! In any case, this provisions clearly indicates that the minister entertains doubts about the bill. Should Parliament decide to adopt this bill, it should do so while being aware that chances are the objective aimed at might not be reached.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to say a word in support of what Senator Flynn and Senator Lewis have said, particularly on the essence of the problem as defined by both of them, that being a problem of nuisance. I suppose it is not totally appropriate, but neither is it totally inappropriate, for us to comment on decisions of the courts, but it seems to me that if the courts had treated the legislation from Calgary and, I believe, Montreal as, in essence or "in pith and substance" as the interpretative rules say, laws dealing with municipal nuisances, then they would have been within the municipalities' legislative competence. I have not read the case so I am not sure of the basis upon which the courts arrived at their conclusions. But it seems to me that Senator Flynn and Senator Lewis have put their finger on the essence of the wrong to be righted. It is a shame that it cannot be dealt with in some way by laws dealing with the wrong; namely, the nuisance, rather than in the way that it is dealt with in this bill.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few brief words in relation to this bill. I agree completely with Senator Lewis, and I congratulate him on the careful analysis which he has given to this bill and his predictions as to the likely outcome of it. I also agree with the views expressed by Senator Flynn. I merely wish to emphasize one aspect of this bill which Senator Lewis referred to but did not develop, and that is the effect that this legislation will have on the activities of that despicable person usually referred to as the pimp. If there is anyone that I hold more in abhorrence than I do, for example, a prostitute, it is the pimp, because it seems to me that he has absolutely nothing to speak on his behalf.

I had come to this conclusion from my own reading of the bill—and I am glad my views were reinforced by what Senator Lewis had to say—but it seems to me that one effect of this bill will be to place the business of prostitution much more squarely in the hands of the pimp, to enhance his control over the prostitute which in itself is a bad and shameful thing, and to make it necessary for so-called customers of prostitutes to do business always through the kind of intermediary whom no one—no one—can respect in any way at all.

I find it very difficult to support this legislation. I am even more fearful than Senator Flynn as to the ultimate effect of the legislation, and I am glad to see inklings, both in Senator Flynn's remarks and in Senator Lewis's remarks, of an idea by which this problem might be dealt with more satisfactorily in a different way. This seems to me to be a bad bill which will not solve the problem, even though it may transfer it to another venue.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator MacDonald (Halifax), bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION REORGANIZATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Baroote, for the second reading of the Bill C-66, intituled: "An Act respecting the reorganization of the Canada Development Corporation".—(Honourable Senator Sinclair).

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, the record will show that Senator Sinclair adjourned this debate in my name, so although it shows the name of Senator Sinclair in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, that is not correct, and I will speak to the matter.

Honourable senators, I want to make it clear from the start that I thoroughly approve of the objectives of this bill. In fact, I would like to congratulate the government on the timing of their action to privatize the Canada Development Corporation. The stock of the Canada Development Corporation has been as low as $3.75, I believe. At the time of the issue, the stock was sold at $11.50 and is now selling at just under $9.50. There were 23 million shares sold, so that the government got some $46 million more for its shares than it would get if it had waited until today.

I wish to talk about only one aspect of the bill this afternoon. The bill provides that no one person or persons associated with that person can hold more than 25 per cent of the stock. It also provides that no foreigner or non-resident can hold, individually, more than 10 per cent and, in total, non-residents can hold no more than 25 per cent, again including those associated.

The difficulty has been with the definition of the word "associate". I think that the 25 per cent limit was probably about right. It stopped conglomerates or others from taking over complete control of the Canada Development Corporation. Like a great many other people in this country, I am concerned with a concentration of economic power in very few groups. However, the 25 per cent limit does permit a major shareholder, even if he cannot dictate to the board of directors or the management, in most instances, to have considerable influence on the board and to make management more accountable than would be the case if there were no major shareholders. Therefore I have no objection to the 25 per cent limit.

What does concern me is that there is a loophole. The 25 per cent limit, in most cases, is completely ineffective. The reason for that is the definition of "association". The definition of association is that two companies are associated with each other if they are owned more than 50 per cent by the same person or company. Of course, everyone knows that there are many, many companies that are controlled by shareholders holding much less than 50 per cent.

This point concerned the board of CDC. Mr. Hampson brought up the question at an executive meeting of the board and an argument ensued. The directors did not agree as to whether it should be 25 per cent; some argued that it should be reduced to 10 per cent held by one person or company or associates, as is provided for in the Bank Act. There was even a question as to whether there should be any restrictions whatsoever. According to the testimony of Mr. Hampson, what they did agree upon was that the present provision of 25 per cent was ineffectual because of the definition of "associates", and that if the government really intended this 25 per cent provision to be effective, there should be an amendment to the act.

They then prepared a memorandum—and I will refer to this in detail later because I think it is important to get on the record exactly what happened—they prepared a memorandum for the board of directors and the board of directors had a meeting to consider this memorandum. I would like to refer to the evidence of Mr. Hampson, which was given before the Legislative Committee dealing with Bill C-66. Mr. Ravis asked a question which concluded with the words:

The amended changes, have they been discussed by the board?

MR. HAMPSON: Yes.

MR. RAVIS: They have been discussed.

MR. HAMPSON: Yes, they have been discussed by the board, and the board unanimously recommends them.

That is at page 12 of Issue No. 2, Tuesday, October 1, 1985.

MR. RAVIS: So they have been debated then by the directors.

MR. HAMPSON: They have been discussed; it was not really a debate. There was a paper prepared and a full discussion by the board.

Then in testimony which he gave the following day, Mr. Hampson amplified that a little by saying:

—It is not worthwhile to attempt to anticipate all the possible situations that may one day arise. The committee agreed unanimously with the idea of presenting this approach to the board of directors.

Here he is referring to the executive committee:

—There are minutes of the discussion of the executive committee.

The board meeting took place on September 18. Most of the board members were present. I do not have the list with me. All CDIC members were there, as well as most of the others. They were unanimous in supporting the proposal.

As I said yesterday, certain directors wanted a 10% limit, others wanted no limit, but all agreed that there had to be a way of enforcing any percentage set by the government. No one wanted to be in a situation where they would have to try to enforce a vague and imprecise piece of legislation.

After Mr. Hampson had given that evidence, Mr. Richard Bonnycastle, the chairman of the Divestiture Committee of the Canada Development Investment Corporation, appeared before the committee on October 8, and his evidence created a sensation, to say the least. There was a great deal of publicity about it. In fact, what he said was that Mr. Hampson was not telling the truth. I will just read what Mr. Bonnycastle said at page 6 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Legislative Committee on Bill C-66. He said:

I must also point out before concluding that we heard there was some implied support for these proposals by the board of directors of CDC. As I mentioned at the beginning, I am on the board of both those corporations, and there was not a consensus on these provisions and none of them was endorsed.

That could not be more blunt or more straightforward. To say that I was surprised is putting it mildly. Back in the 1960s, for some years, I had a great deal to do with Mr. Hampson. We were both in the mutual fund business. He was a competitor, and we served together as directors of the Canadian Mutual Fund Association. I think when I was president of the association, he was vice-president and I can say that I have the highest regard for Mr. Hampson's ethical standards and, furthermore, I have equally high regard for his ability. I must say that I was astonished by the accusation of Mr. Bonnycastle which, if true, would not only mean that Mr. Hampson was a liar but that he was stupid. As far as my personal experience goes, Mr. Hampson was neither.

[Senator Godfrey.]

I want to refer to one other part of Mr. Bonnycastle's evidence. At page 6, he said:

Second—and this point is not raised by management—the bill as drafted gives the board of directors of CDC the authority to deem two people to be associated, if they believe they are acting in concert, by way of an agreement or arrangement.

I read these proceedings over the weekend and when I read that, it struck me immediately that, if that is true, it takes care of the situation. In other words, we do not need a definition of "association" and so on. Incidentally, another reaction to that was, why did Mr. Hampson not point this out, since it is so obvious that that was the effect?

However, I then read the actual clause in the bill and it does not read that way. The relevant clause is 5(6)(h). Subclause (6) starts off:

For the purposes of this section, a person is an associate of a resident or non-resident if

(h) both are parties to an agreement or arrangement, a purpose of which, in the opinion of the Board of Directors of the Corporation, is to require the parties to act in concert with respect to their interests in the Corporation.

The operative word there is "require". When I read that clause, it seemed obvious to me that this was a situation dealing with two companies who had no association together whatsoever, but had decided by binding agreement to act as one in order to pool their resources and agree to act in concert with respect to their shareholdings. If their combined ownership was more than 25 per cent, that would be just as bad as one individual owning more than 25 per cent.

I think I should refer at this point in some detail to an opinion given by Fasken & Calvin on October 11, 1985, regarding the effect of that section. This is a rather lengthy quotation, but it is one which I wish to put on the record. It states:

—we suggest that it is incontrovertible that the power to control many corporations exists with a shareholding of voting shares of 50% or less. In the hypothetical fact situation, the person who (either alone or with associates) owns a substantial block of 50% or less of the voting shares of Corporation A and Corporation B may well have full control of those corporations through the de facto ability to nominate and elect directors of his choice and, through them, to appoint management of his choice. Through such boards and management such person may dictate how Corporation A and Corporation B will vote their securities in CDC and otherwise exercise their rights and privileges as shareholders, thereby controlling, in the example we have used, indirectly, 48% of the votes of CDC which may ordinarily be cast to elect directors, without any agreement or arrangement between Corporation A and Corporation B. Similarly, any arrangement or agreement between them which might exist would be unlikely to require Corporation A and Corporation B to act in concert with respect to their interests in CDC. Such agreement or such requirement would not be necessary to accomplish indirect control of 48% of the votes of CDC which may ordinarily be cast to elect directors. As a result, such person would be almost certainly able to cause to be elected as directors of CDC nominees acceptable to him, other than the government nominees provided for in Bill C-66.

In summary, it is our opinion that paragraph 5(6)(h) of Bill C-66 would likely be of little practical assistance to the Board in determining, in the hypothetical fact situation, that Corporation A and Corporation B were "associates" within the meaning of the provisions of the Articles authorized by Bill C-66.

● (1540)

I should like also, in that connection and by way of contrast, to read the last paragraph of a letter from Fraser & Beatty, who were retained by CDIC and Mr. Bonnycastle. This opinion was sent to the House of Commons committee by Mr. Bonnycastle. The last paragraph of that letter states:

We would also draw to your attention the provisions of section 5(6)(h) of the Bill which provides a broad and rather unusual power whereby the Board of Directors of CDC may reach the opinion that a purpose of an agreement or arrangement between two parties is to require the parties to act in concert with respect to their interests in CDC. In such circumstances the parties become "associates". Such a broad provision would appear to provide the Board of Directors of CDC with a remedy for the type of situation which seems to be concerning CDC management.

As shown so clearly by Fasken & Calvin, it provides no such remedy. I would suggest that Fraser & Beatty did not really give the matter the consideration that it deserved.

Getting back to the question of consensus of the directors, after Mr. Bonnycastle made his well-publicized speech, in which he said that Mr. Hampson had misrepresented the situation to the committee, Mr. Hampson wrote a letter to the members of the Legislative Committee in the House of Commons. I should like to read the second and third paragraphs of that letter replying to a request for copies of the minutes of the board of directors, and I quote:

I am happy to meet this request, and accordingly you will find enclosed as Attachment "A", an extract of the minutes of the Board meeting held on Sept. 18, 1985 dealing with Bill C-66. The Secretary of the Corporation or myself tried today to reach all directors who were present at the meeting, and read each of them, word for word, at least the last three paragraphs dealing with the sense of the Board (the earlier paragraphs being a summary of the proposals laid before the Board).

All the directors contacted agreed that the minutes reflect accurately the discussion, consensus, and approvals given by the Board on the subject. For the record, the directors contacted were Messrs. P. Côté (Chairman), P. de G. Beaubien, L. Beaudoin, J. Bruk, P. J. Keenan, B.

Lamarre, Mrs. M. S. Lamontagne, Messrs. W. C. Y. McGregor, J. W. E. Mingo, M. J. Moreau, E. G. Rowe, and Dr. C. Wallace. We were unable to reach Mr. Hughes, as he is out of the country, and the opinion of Mr. Bonnycastle was given to you yesterday.

I should now like to read to you the last three paragraphs of the minutes of the directors' meeting referred to in Mr. Hampson's letter:

As at the Executive Committee meeting, some Directors expressed the view that the 25% ownership limitation for resident shareholders should be lowered to 10%, as in the Bank Act, while others indicated that there should not be any maximum. The consensus, however, was that since it is the Government's policy to have a maximum ownership limit, this should be enforceable and not easily circumvented.

Some Directors then questioned whether the recommendation to change the test of 50% for determination of associates to a 20% test would give rise to a right of rescission by holders of instalment receipts sold by the Government. Management stated that they had been advised by legal counsel that neither the proposed amendments to Bill C-66 nor the Articles would give rise to a right of rescission. A copy of the opinion will be circulated to the Board.

After discussion, the consensus was to approve the principles of the memorandum regarding the recommendations of modifications to Bill C-66 and the proposed Articles of Continuance and to authorize management to take the appropriate actions to implement this approval.

I should now like to refer to the memorandum which was presented to the board of directors and quote from page 3 under the heading: " 'Associate' and Inter-related Shareholders", which states:

Accordingly, we recommend that the 50% test of associate be reduced to 20% which is similar to the test used for equity accounting, i.e. the level at which the accounting profession presumes some form of control can be exercised by a shareholder.

I should like to finish this aspect of my participation in this debate by quoting the last paragraph of a letter written October 15, 1985 by Mr. Bonnycastle to the clerk of the House of Commons committee, which states:

With regard to the CDC board meeting, Mr. Hampson has submitted the draft minutes of our meeting of September 18, 1985. This submission, which has not yet been ratified by the Board, discusses his understanding of the presumed unanimity of the Board with respect to the principles underlying the proposed amendments. Neither the minutes nor the covering letter reference any motions on the proposed amendments which, I believe, is quite consistent with the testimony I provided.

But I completely disagree with Mr. Bonnycastle; they certainly are not consistent with the testimony. You will recall that he said that he heard there was some implied support of these proposals, and then he said there was not even the implied support. It is quite clear from the memorandum to the board and from the minutes of the meeting that there was, in fact, nearly unanimous support for the suggestion to try to clear up this question of association, and it certainly is not necessary to have a formal resolution as evidence of that support. It is really, I suppose, a question of Mr. Bonnycastle hating to admit that he was wrong. I must say that he was not the only one. There is another one who does not want to admit that he was wrong, and I shall now turn to Mr. Sinclair Stevens. Mr. Stevens was the last one to give evidence before the House of Commons committee. I would like to read from his testimony at page 6:50. By this time Mr. Stevens has had the evidence that I just explained to you, copies of the memoranda and copies of the minutes of the board of directors. He said this:

What Mr. Hampson did was indicate the feelings some had, mainly himself and certain of his associates, and all that happened at the CDC board level was a discussion in principle about some variations in the amendments or the nature of the bill. I think it would be totally wrong, and I know there would be quite serious objections, if I did not try to explain to this committee that to represent that the CDC as a board is, for example, agreeing to the amendment that Mr. Cassidy is indicating is just not so.

I completely disagree with that statement by Mr. Stevens. He goes on at page 6:51 to say:

I have a copy of the letter—

He is referring to Mr. Hampson's letter.

—dated October 9 to members of this legislative committee, and you will notice that the minutes he includes there conclude with two very meaningful statements. On page two, the penultimate paragraph states:

Management stated that they had been advised by legal counsel that neither the proposed amendment to Bill C-66 nor the articles would give rise to a right of rescission.

Subsequent to that it was realized on advice from counsel that there could be rights of rescission. Then the final paragraph says:

● (1550)

After discussion, the consensus was to approve the principles of the memorandum regarding the recommendations and modifications of Bill C-66 and the proposed articles of continuance.

It was a consensus dealing with approving the principles. The detail was never gone into in the sense of proposing amendments—

That is not true. The memorandum discloses, in what I read to you, that it has been gone into in great detail and considered at the board meeting. Again, Mr. Stevens seems to have difficulty admitting that he was wrong.

Why do I mention all of this? Really, Mr. Stevens did not mislead the committee. The committee had the evidence before it which they could judge for themselves. You could tell that from the questions. If you read the proceedings of the committee in the House of Commons, which I did on the weekend, you can, however, get a completely different opinion. On Monday morning I phoned the secretary of the Canada Development Corporation and arranged for the memorandum, the copies of the minutes and the correspondence to be sent to me, and I read it, and I certainly got a somewhat different picture from what appears on the record. Therefore, I think that it is important that the public should know the facts as the members of the committee did.

I do not understand why Mr. Stevens did not admit that they had made a boob in the drafting of the bill on the question of associates. He had another good argument as to why he could not accept the amendment. There was a provision and the shares were sold on the basis that a bill would be passed substantially in the same form as the bill that we are considering today.

The solicitors for CDC looked into the matter and they said if we changed the definition of associates and plugged this loophole that would not be a substantial change. The solicitors consulted by the CDIC came to a different conclusion. I personally would favour the opinion given to CDC that it was not a substantial change. However, I would not go so far as to say I would be 100 per cent certain.

The problem with agreeing to an amendment could be the possibility that there could be a lawsuit for a right of rescission under the provision, and the rescission at this particular time would cost the government $46 million. One of the parties that might very well have a stronger right of rescission than anyone else, if there is such a right, and if it turns out that Fraser & Beatty were right and Faskin & Calvin were wrong—both eminent law firms—would be Noranda. There is quite a bit of publicity about the fact that Noranda bought 6.5 million shares of this issue. They have a paper loss right now of $13 million because the stock has gone down a few dollars. I would not be at all surprised if Noranda did not have at the back of their mind the loophole contained in this bill that if at some future time someone else will associate with another company in the Brascan group, that they can take control. There is a problem when it comes to amending the bill, and I only wish that people like Mr. Stevens had been somewhat more frank and put it on that basis.

On motion of Senator Sinclair, debate adjourned.

CANADA'S INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—INTERIM REPORT ON BILATERAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA'S PARTICIPATION IN RESEARCH ON STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the order,

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Interim Report of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's International Relations pertaining to Bilateral Trade with the United States and Canada's Participation in Research on the Strategic Defense Initiative, tabled in the Senate on 17th September, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I have reviewed what was said in connection with the inquiry on the subject of the report by the Special Joint Committee on International Relations. Senator Gigantès expressed his point of view. The Leader of the Opposition in the Senate honoured us with a very interesting speech, which illustrated his experience in the field of external affairs. His analysis of the results of the last summit meeting between Messrs. Reagan and Gorbachev was particularly interesting.

Only three senators took part in this debate. On the other hand, Senator Gigantès' inquiry on the Strategic Defense Initiative gave Senators Steuart, Hicks and Godfrey an opportunity to express their views.

In any case, the debate on this matter, as on the question of bilateral trade with the United States, will continue as questions are raised, or otherwise. We can say that we have covered the ground with respect to the interim report of the special joint committee. This item can now be dropped from the order paper.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I understand the committee intends to pursue its consideration of this matter, despite the fact that an interim report has been submitted. My point is that the subject has not been taken off the committee's agenda.

Senator Flynn: It has not been dealt with entirely, but it is up to the committee to decide. If you consider the notices published in the media, inviting the public to testify on certain matters, neither the Strategic Defense Initiative nor bilateral trade with the United States are among the subjects mentioned. The committee could only incidentally express its views on those two matters. In fact, between now and the month of May, the committee will be considering other questions. We must not forget that the committee's terms of reference cover the entire range of Canada's international relations—all the items dealt with in the green paper.

Consequently, if we were again to consider in extenso the strategic initiative and bilateral trade, it would be very difficult to consider the other problems mentioned in the green paper which deserve a great deal of attention, such as aid to developing countries, either through multilateral agencies or in the form of direct aid. That is one of the items now being considered by the committee.

There is also the matter of defence and security which is of interest to the committee. I realize the Strategic Defense Initiative has some connection with this matter, but it is not being considered as such. However, SDI is closely linked to the problem of Canada's general security.

There are other economic questions that may give rise to debate on bilateral trade. I repeat, the committee is not going to concentrate on these two subjects alone. They will not necessarily be excluded if they have some connection with other items on which the committee intends to set a priority between now and May. Let us not forget that the committee is supposed to submit its final report by May 31, if I am not mistaken.

Senator Frith: It is quite possible that these two items will be part of the final report. The committee will be allowing for this eventuality, between now and final report.

Senator Flynn: I realize that if certain events or testimony before the committee give rise to certain comments in the committee's final report, any connection with SDI or bilateral trade with the United States would not mean the committee would decide to ignore them altogether.

Senator Frith: I agree.

[English]

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I intend to speak to this order. As a matter of fact, I mentioned my intention to Senator Flynn last week. If there is no objection, perhaps I could speak to this matter tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I had forgotten that Senator Bosa had expressed his intention to speak. If he wants to use this vehicle, I, personally, have no objection.

On motion of Senator Bosa, debate adjourned.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (Rules of the Senate), which was presented on Wednesday, November 6, 1985.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, on November 6, the Debates of the Senate carried the details of the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. I would refer honourable senators to page 1471 where the details are listed.

The reason for this report is that a request was made to us to change some of the wording in our rules because of the gender problem. The rules, as they now read, constantly refer to "his, him, he," and so on—the masculine gender.

It was felt that our rules should be updated to reflect the realities of the day and not be purely masculine-oriented. Possibly, this should have been done in 1930 when it was recognized that women were entitled to be senators, but it was not done at that time. Better late than never.

Senator MacEachen: It was a matter of sober second thought.

Senator Molgat: Referring to the specific report, in the left-hand column, we refer to the present rule. In those present rules, we have put all the words which it is proposed should be changed in italics, with the exception of "pro tempore." It is standard practice that that word is shown in italics. All other words, where there is a change, are shown in italics.

Then, in the right-hand column, in the proposed amendments, we have underlined the new words which will replace the words in italics in the left-hand column.

This does present a problem at times because we could end up using most complicated and inelegant language.

The committee attempted in its drafting to make this as clear and as uncomplicated as possible. I must confess that there are certain instances where it is not the very best of language, but it is the best we could do. We stayed away from the terms "he or she" and "his or her" wherever we could. I believe that only in one instance were we forced to use the term "himself or herself" which I certainly do not like insofar as wording is concerned, but it was the only way we could approach this change. Elsewhere, we did our best to use the general term, "the Speaker," "the senator," or whatever could be used to accomplish our goal.

I believe the result is a reasonably good English presentation within the constraints of what we are trying to accomplish.

[Translation]

Let us now refer to the French text. We followed the same rules. We are trying to make sure that the use of the masculine or feminine gender is as correct as possible.

I must say that we began with the question: Should we use the word "sénatrice"? On that question I consulted people who do not sit on our committee. I consulted some of the female senators who assured me that they did not particularly want the term "sénatrice" to gain wide acceptance. The word "sénateur" is an accepted word. French grammar being different from English grammar, they did not think there was any objection to keeping the word. For example, we do say "la Chambre". We are not trying to change and say "le Chambre". "La Chambre" is clear, it is feminine of course. The word "sénateur" is a general word which applies to any person who is a senator.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): As does "le Président".

Senator Molgat: As does "le Président". So we rejected the use of the word "sénatrice". We recommend the use of the word "sénateur" to designate any senator, man or woman.

Senator Frith: Not "la présidente".

Senator Molgat: Not "la présidente" either, but "le président". I appreciate that it is a moot point. That is why I proposed, when I presented my report, to wait for some time so that my Senate colleagues would be able to examine the report and decide whether they agreed.

Let us now refer to the Debates of the Senate of Wednesday, November 6, page 1471. You will find the present rule in the left column and the proposed amendments in the right column. With the exception of "pro tempore", all italicized words in the left column have been changed. They are replaced by the underlined words in the right column.

You will find in the right column a number of sections which are followed by an asterisk. This indicates that the section has not been changed. There is no change in the French text. It is there simply to indicate that there is a change in the English text.

Again, we have tried to make the language as elegant as possible. I must confess that, in a number of cases, we could not avoid some clumsiness. For instance, section 17 states:

"Que les étrangers soient sommés de se retirer"; du reste, le Président du Sénat, ou le président du comité plénier, peut toujours, si le Président du Sénat, ou le président du comité plénier . . .

So much for elegant language. My colleagues and I were not satisfied with this formulation, but that was the best we could find.

In spite of this, I think that in general we have stayed away from affected speech, we have used throughout the expression "le sénateur" instead of the pronoun "lui". The end results are rules which are clear and yet apply to both men and women.

Now, I must admit that some have suggested that these changes were not necessary and that the pronoun "lui", for instance, when referring to a senator or to the Speaker, could apply in both cases.

I admit that I am not a French grammar specialist. In fact, when I tabled the report, I proposed that some of my colleagues who are indeed specialists and who know French better than I do have a look at it. If they have suggestions to make, I am sure our committee will be prepared to entertain them.

That being said, I move that we adopt these new rules as proposed, unless other senators have better proposals to make. I think that what we propose is quite acceptable. We have experienced less difficulty in this area than the House of Commons did when it tried to change its Standing Orders. I think that the total result of what we are proposing is superior to what the House of Commons could do.

I move that the report be concurred in.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, if I may, I would like to ask a question to Senator Molgat.

Senator Molgat: On condition that it is not on a grammatical point.

Senator Corbin: It has nothing to do with grammar, honourable senators. I would like to know whether, before agreeing on the text it is now proposing, the committee or its experts had an opportunity to compare our own text and the proposed changes with the texts in use in French, Belgian or Swiss institutions, for instance? Did they do this?

Senator Molgat: I cannot guarantee that all the rules were compared. We certainly looked at the practice in Quebec and in France as far as general terms and the use of the masculine and feminine genders are concerned. What we propose is quite in line with the practice in these other jurisdictions.

On motion of Senator Molgat, report adopted.

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the sixth report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (Committee Reports), which was presented in the Senate on Wednesday, November 6, 1985.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, when I presented the report of the committee earlier in November, I suggested that I would rather wait until such time as Senator Godfrey was present in the chamber before we discussed it, since the proposal had originally been made by him. He is now present and I suggest that we proceed with the discussion.

The report of the committee will be found on page 1475 of the Debates of the Senate of November 6, 1985. It is a very short report.

Senator Godfrey had made a proposal based on a rule change that was made in the House of Commons some time ago. As honourable senators will know, Senator Godfrey has made a number of such proposals. We have not, by any means, accepted all of them, nor have we taken the position that, because the House of Commons has done something, it is necessarily a good thing for the Senate to do it or, indeed, vice versa, that we should refuse to do something here because it is done there. In this instance, we have examined the matter in general terms as to whether it would be an appropriate rule for the Senate. We came to the conclusion that, indeed, it would be a useful rule for the Senate.

It is true that the Senate does have and has used another mechanism by which to get responses from government. That mechanism has been to request ministers to appear before committees of the Senate. This has been done successfully by a number of committees, which have then produced a report, after which they have waited some months and requested that the responsible minister come to discuss the report and indicate whether he agreed or disagreed with it. That, however, is a general approach.

Upon looking at the situation, our committee felt that it might be well to include this rule, because it would normally provide for a written report by the government.

Honourable senators will know that we are further faced with the problem of the joint committees. In the case of the joint committee with which I am particularly familiar—that is, the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform—we found ourselves, at the specific request of members of the House of Commons, urging the government to implement our recommendations as soon as was practicable and requested, pursuant to Standing Order 69(13)—which has now been changed to 70(13)—a comprehensive response to this report. In other words, we found ourselves on this occasion, as senators and as members of a joint committee, requesting some action under a standing order of the House of Commons. That did not seem to our committee to be a logical position for the Senate to find itself in, and it was felt that it would be more appropriate if the Senate had the same rule which could be invoked whenever a committee of the Senate felt it was the proper thing to do.

● (1620)

We recognized that the argument could be made that neither house has any authority to order the government to do anything. We can pass laws together to order the government to do things, but neither can do it as an individual house. We cannot tell the government to do this or that. Nevertheless the House does have that rule, and it has had it since one of our colleagues, Senator Lefebvre, made a report some years ago when he was a member of the other place and chairman of the committee on the reform of the other place. I believe that was the genesis of that rule, and it seems to have worked quite well for the House of Commons.

So we are proposing a rule identical to the present rule in the House of Commons. It is almost identical in wording, but there are slight variations. Where they refer to standing or special committees, we simply say “any committee of the Senate.” Essentially, it is rule 70(16), which can be found at page 65 of the Standing Orders of the House of Commons.

Again I recommend to honourable senators the adoption of this report.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Molgat: Certainly.

Senator Neiman: The honourable senator mentioned that this was the identical wording to the rule of the House of Commons on the same matter. I am rather curious about it. Is the restriction “within 120 days” the time in which the government must table its response; and, if so, what happens if the request is not made until the 119th day? The wording appears to me to be rather curious. I know what the honourable senator is getting at, but who is restrained by the 120 days?

Senator Molgat: I suppose that really it is a request that the government respond within four months. The government would have that period of time during which it could respond whenever it so wished. In the case of the Senate reform committee, I believe the response came within 60 days. It is simply setting a deadline in the hope that it will be adhered to. The question might well be asked: What happens if the government does not act? I suppose it would be within the power of the Senate, if we used the rule, for an honourable senator to rise and say, “We have requested a reply from the government and the reply has not come forward. Why not?” It is my understanding that in the House of Commons the government has responded and that this has not caused any difficulties. As to what sanctions could be imposed, I do not know.

Senator Neiman: You are stating, then, that the request for a reply would come at the time the report was tabled.

Senator Molgat: Yes.

Senator Neiman: That is assumed.

Senator Molgat: Yes. The practice that has been followed, as I understand it, is that when a committee completes its report, it has within its report a clause saying, "We request a response from the government under order so and so," and it follows automatically from there.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator proposes to speak on this topic this afternoon, I would like to adjourn the debate.

May I ask the indulgence of the house by saying that I may not be able to take it up again in the very near future. So if any other honourable senator wishes to take part in the debate before I am able to do so, they should feel free. I might say that I am likely to move to amend it, so there will be all kinds of opportunities to speak.

On motion of Senator Roblin, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, December 4, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Martial Asselin, Speaker pro tempore in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE ESTIMATES, 1985-86

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the tenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance respecting its examination of the expenditures proposed by Supplementary Estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1986. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 1646.)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Kelly, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Lowell Murray, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, there seems to be a possibility that the Senate will be sitting this evening. Therefore, I would need to have the permission of the Senate for the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to proceed as scheduled with its meeting at 8 o'clock. I may say that we are intending to commence a pre-study of Bill C-84. We have witnesses from the Department of Finance and our technical advisers from out of town coming here for that purpose.

Therefore, against the possibility that the Senate will be sitting this evening, I ask leave to move that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have the power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

THE NETHERLANDS—REMOVAL OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS FROM AIRCRAFT—ATTITUDE OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to ask the Leader of the Government a question which arises out of a meeting of the NATO defence ministers held in Europe this week. Reports in the newspapers state that the NATO defence ministers took exception to the decision of the Government of The Netherlands to remove nuclear weapons from certain of its aircraft. Lord Carrington is quoted as saying that the action taken by the NATO defence ministers was desirable and necessary.

What was the attitude taken by the Government of Canada? Did it join the other defence ministers in chiding The Netherlands for doing what Canada had already done, or did it come to the assistance of The Netherlands and support that country in following what has now been established as Canadian policy?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no report as yet with respect to the NATO defence ministers' meeting to which my honourable friend refers. I will make an inquiry.

CANADA'S CULTURAL INDUSTRIES

CRISIS IN PUBLISHING INDUSTRY—MOTION TO ADJOURN
UNDER RULE 46(g) TO CONSIDER MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert:

That the Senate do now adjourn for the purpose of raising a matter of urgent public importance, namely: the crisis in Canada's cultural industries accelerated by the Government's failure to define assurances and set guidelines safeguarding the cultural industries in trade talks with the United States or to exclude cultural industries from the trade talks with the United States, and to urge the Government to refuse approval of the Prentice-Hall, Ginn and Company and Copp Clark sales which approval would undermine, disrupt and foreclose the fragile Canadian market for Canadian authors and Canadian books.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Grafstein, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert:

That the Senate do now adjourn for the purpose of raising a matter—

An Hon. Senator: Dispende!

Hon. Jacques Flynn: No. I would like to know what we will be talking about.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Grafstein, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert:

That the Senate do now adjourn for the purpose of raising a matter of urgent public importance, namely: the crisis in Canada's cultural industries accelerated by the Government's failure to define assurances and set guidelines safeguarding the cultural industries in trade talks with the United States or to exclude cultural industries from the trade talks with the United States, and to urge the Government to refuse approval of the Prentice-Hall, Ginn and Company and Copp Clark sales which approval would undermine, disrupt and foreclose the fragile Canadian market for Canadian authors and Canadian books.

According to the rules of the Senate, before calling on senators to speak to the substance of the motion, I will hear honourable senators on the urgency of the debate.

● (1410)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, speaking to the point that has been raised, I would like, first of all, to thank someone for giving my colleague, Senator Flynn, a copy of the resolution. I am sure that some of the rest of us here would be pleased to have it as well, so that we can understand what is proposed for debate.

I am going to surprise some of my colleagues, perhaps, by reserving my position on the question of urgency. If we were to debate that, I would suggest to the Senate that we should consider our rule with respect to debating a matter of urgent public importance in light of the general custom followed by all other legislatures that I am aware of in the British Commonwealth of Nations with respect to the method by which they decide what is and what is not urgent. I am not going to advance that argument at present, although I reserve the right to do so later today or at some other time. However, I wish to offer a suggestion.

In principle, while I do not accept the suggestion that the time element is so urgent that this resolution should be debated before any other business is dealt with, I agree that it is an important public matter. There is no way in which I would be anxious to prevent the Senate from discussing this urgent public matter in the most convenient and suitable way.

Leaving aside the parliamentary question of the urgency of time of debate, I would suggest to the Senate that customarily it does not take us more than an hour or perhaps two hours to dispose of the items on our order paper, and there might be some merit in proceeding with the order paper as it stands. There is a number of government items of business on it that I would like to have advanced one stage. When we have reached either the end of government business or, if honourable senators wish, the end of the Orders of the Day, we could then take up this matter and debate it, taking as long as we like to discuss it, while not interfering with the normal business of the Senate.

The reason for the urgency rule as employed in other legislative bodies is essentially in order to ensure that the normal proceedings of the organization are not interrupted unduly by the presentation of matters of urgent public importance that take precedence over everything else that is going on. As I say, I am reserving my argument on that point, but in the interest of practicality and in the interest of trying to oblige those who want to debate this issue and, at the same time, so as to take care of the government's interest in having its business dealt with today, I would propose that we proceed with the order paper as it stands and, either at the end of government business or at the end of the order paper itself, which usually does not take much longer, we could raise this question of cultural policy and proceed with the debate. Following this suggestion would mean postponing the debate perhaps for an hour or so but, all things considered, I do not think anything much is lost by that and it might be convenient for the Senate to adopt this suggestion and deal with this matter when we finish our regular business.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the suggestion made by Senator Roblin that before debating this motion and, as I understand it, even before debating whether we are going to debate the motion, we proceed with government business is not the most orderly way of proceeding, although the idea—

Senator Flynn: Oh, come on!

Senator Walker: Really!

Senator Frith: I did not realize that what I was going to say was going to be that controversial. Perhaps I could finish the sentence and then you can start hooting and hollering.

While the suggestion of not actually debating the motion until after government business is sensible, I think our procedure should be in accordance with the precedent which is of long standing and which was confirmed as recently as November 6, 1985, on a motion by Senator Argue to the same effect, that is, with respect to an adjournment to debate a matter of public importance. According to the precedents, the Speaker should put this question: "Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to debate the motion?" Then, of course, we can debate the question, but eventually the motion for adjournment should be put.

I do not know why Senator Flynn is shaking his head. How many times do we have to go through this?

Senator Flynn: Come clean—do you agree with the suggestion or not?

Senator Argue: Give him time to agree with you.

Senator Frith: The suggestion that we now proceed to Orders of the Day and discuss this question later I do not agree with. The substance of the suggestion—namely, that we deal with the Orders of the Day before dealing with this debate—I do agree with. Therefore, I suggest that we proceed in the proper order, which is that the Speaker put the question: "Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to debate the motion?" If we say "yea", then I suggest that we have unanimous consent to adjourn the debate on the motion itself until after the Orders of the Day.

Senator Roblin: I do not see much difference between that suggestion and what I suggested, except that we will have a debate on the question of urgency now.

Senator Frith: That is correct, and we will vote on the question: "Do we wish to debate the motion?"

Senator Roblin: However, we have to remember, honourable senators, that if we do that and agree that we are going to debate, and if the motion is put for debate, we are then debating a motion to adjourn. We can do what we like if we get unanimous consent, but if we do not get unanimous consent we are stuck with it and we are going to have to debate it.

If La Presse is any reasonable source of how long we are likely to debate it, it is for some time. I do not know why my honourable friend does not agree with me that we get on with government business so that we can debate the question of urgency afterwards. I have to admit that there are 25 or 26 senators on this side—and they are almost all here, I am happy to say—and a considerable number more on the other side. If sweet persuasion on my part fails to move my honourable friend, I know that numbers will not do so.

I think it would be just as expeditious to adopt my original suggestion. I hope that my honourable friend is not proposing an alternative just to be different. I suppose that that would be unkind to think, but I do not know why we cannot proceed as I have proposed. However, if my suggestion does not meet with the approval of honourable senators, I have to admit that I control no majority here and I am bound to do whatever the Senate decides.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the difference is simply that the rules provide that this motion be made before Orders of the Day. Our precedents establish that when the motion is so made, it is up to the Speaker to simply ask: "Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to debate the motion?" That is clear from the precedents. That is why I think it is the right way to go about it. That is why I suggest that we will come to the same result yet do it exactly as is provided for by precedent. I think that is the way we should proceed.

Senator Flynn: It seems to me that the Leader of the Government has suggested that, with unanimous consent, this motion will be put on the Orders of the Day of this date. After we deal with government motions, with unanimous consent we can do whatever we want.

Senator Frith: Oh, well, that is different. If that is what I am hearing, that is fine.

Senator Flynn: That is what you should have heard.

Senator Frith: The reason I did not hear it is because it was not said. If what is being said is that, if we have unanimous consent now, this motion will be debated at the end of government business, then that is fine. But that is not what your colleague said. He said that we would debate later whether we were going to debate it. I accept Senator Flynn's suggestion without difficulty.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I can see the substance of an agreement here. We have the substance of an agreement because now my honourable friend understands what I was trying to tell him. I reserved my decision in connection with the question of urgency not because it related to this matter but as a matter of general principle. But I said clearly that we did not wish to stand in the way of the Senate debating this subject this day if it so wished. We have no objection to that. The question of its urgency, in the sense I am talking about, will not be raised by me when the matter is re-introduced after the government business has been dealt with. All that I am trying to say is that I am not conceding the point. I am simply saying that in this instance I am prepared not to raise it but to proceed with the debate.

• (1420)

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, may I suggest that my honourable friends opposite might use the time at their disposal in the next little while to circulate a copy of this motion in the French language? I find it rather extraordinary that these champions of Canadian nationalism and Canadian culture are circulating motions in one language only.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, if we have an agreement that the motion will be debated, then, in effect, we have agreed that to the question "Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to debate the motion now?" the answer is "No, not now, but later today." That is quite satisfactory—

Senator Flynn: You will have to have leave.

Senator Frith: I am asking for leave. I suggest that with unanimous consent we proceed in that way. We take it that the question "Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to debate the motion now?" has been put. The answer is "No, not now, but later, after the Orders of the Day." I suggest that, since no inquiries are proceeding, we do it at the end of Inquiries and before Motions.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, so long as we have a motion before the Senate, I have to put the question.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, that we debate the motion now?

Senator Frith: Your Honour, I suggested with leave, with unanimous consent, that it is our opinion that we wish to debate the motion not now but at the end of the Orders of the Day, at the end of Inquiries and before Motions; and I so move.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I wish to inform honourable senators that we have a copy of the motion in both English and French.

CUSTOMS BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Balfour, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bélisle, for the second reading of the Bill C-59, intituled: "An Act respecting Customs".—(Honourable Senator Barrow).

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators, I would like to congratulate Senator Balfour on his able presentation of Bill C-59 on the motion for second reading. This legislation, Bill C-59, an Act respecting Customs, is long overdue and represents a complete overhaul of the present Customs Act.

The Customs Act is one of the oldest federal statutes on the books. Indeed, it dates from the horse-and-buggy era of our history, decades before the advent of the transcontinental railway which bound the British colonies of North America together into one market. The legislation, of course, has been amended piecemeal on many occasions since then, but it has never been really completely rethought or restructured. As a result, our existing legislation is a patchwork quilt, the necessities of modern economy having been superimposed on a time-worn and outdated fabric. The legislation is couched in archaic terms and is replete with obsolete provisions.

The Liberal government recognized the importance of a new act to a Canada which has become one of the great trading nations of the world. Revenues collected by Customs and Excise in 1984-85 totalled more than $18 billion, of which some $5 billion derived from the importation of goods. This $18 billion accounts for roughly one fourth of total federal revenues. In addition, Customs each year oversees some 10 million commercial import and export transactions. The Liberal government introduced the first comprehensive draft of formal legislation in April 1978. The most recent previous draft was tabled as Bill C-6 in January of last year. Both bills died on the order paper when general elections were called.

The bill before us today owes much of its inspiration to these earlier drafts. The proposed legislation seeks to accomplish a number of objectives: the elimination of provisions which are obsolete or inconsistent; the restructuring of the act in a logical sequence; the provision of greater flexibility to enable us to respond to modern developments in the international movement of goods and persons; and the modernization of measures dealing with the enforcement and collection of revenues. Throughout the bill, and in particular as regards the powers of enforcement and collection, an attempt has been made to take into account the implications of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

It is not my intention to outline in any detail all the legislative changes contained in the bill, but I would like to refer to some of them. In the current law the procedures governing the reporting of persons, goods and conveyances entering or leaving Canada are prescribed in some 30 sections scattered throughout the act. The bill reduces and codifies these measures into four essential sections which are covered in sections 12 to 16. Furthermore, the bill consolidates the more than 80 sections of the act dealing with contraventions. The bill rationalizes the powers of search and seizure and eliminates the writs of assistance pursuant to which customs officials were authorized to enter premises, search and seize any goods reasonably believed to be liable to forfeiture under the act. Under the existing law, customs officials are not allowed to seize or open any mail under 500 grams, which is the legal definition of a letter. This limitation has encouraged the illegal and unchecked importation of contraband, most particularly illicit drugs. By allowing customs officials to open all mail over 30 grams, the bill closes this loophole without overly exposing private correspondence to interception. The power to open mail in excess of 30 grams, however, is limited to cases where there are reasonable grounds to suspect that illicit matter is being imported.

The bill provides for the posting of security for the amount in dispute in lieu of immediate payment in the case of disputed taxes. Furthermore, interest will now be paid to the taxpayer on any amounts owing by the Crown as well as being charged on any amounts owing to the Crown. The bill provides for ongoing parliamentary review of the new act and expressly prescribes a comprehensive review of its provisions and operations within five years of its coming into force.

While the principles of this bill are acceptable, a number of specific concerns that deserve careful consideration have been raised. The Customs Excise Union is particularly concerned over the provision in clause 32(4) which provides for the release of mail shipments prior to full accounting and payment of duties. Although the government has a pilot project in operation, it is too early to determine any concrete results, and the union fears that the adoption of this honour system for the payment of duties will increase the collection workload for customs officials at a time when government is proposing significant staff cuts. It contends that this system will encourage the non-payment of duty and result in a considerable loss of revenue. The increased scope for mail openings is also expected to add to the workload, and the union questions the ability of its members to carry out their tasks effectively without an increase in staff. The customs brokers, another group, are concerned that under clauses 17, 18, and 19 they may be held jointly and severally liable with their clients for the payment of any outstanding duties. Because they are acting as mere agents, the customs brokers believe that they should be specifically exempted from any possible liability. Under clauses 60 to 63 of the bill, the department is afforded a general two-year period within which to make a re-determination for tariff classification or re-appraisal of value for duty. The taxpayer, in turn, is generally limited to a 90-day period within which to launch an appeal. This disparity has been criticized. A uniform time limit has been recommended for both parties.

Honourable senators, these and other concerns should be carefully examined in committee. On balance, however, the bill is a good one. It is the culmination of many years of thought and deliberation; it is the product of extensive consultations with the private sector. Subject to a few minor reservations, the bill has been favourably received by those most affected by its measures. It is a long overdue and welcome piece of legislation that should be dealt with expeditiously. If the mover refers this bill to the appropriate committee for consideration, we will be most happy to support such action.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Balfour speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, in rising to close the debate on second reading of this bill, I agree with the suggestion of my colleague that the bill be referred to committee. I will so move at the appropriate time.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Balfour, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

MARRIAGE (PROHIBITED DEGREES) BILL

REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Consideration of the Sixth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on the Bill S-2, intituled: "An Act to amend and consolidate the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons", presented in the Senate on 26th November, 1985.—

(Honourable Senator Neiman).

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Neiman, I ask that this order stand until Tuesday, December 10, 1985.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hicks, for the adoption of the Sixth Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (Committee Reports), presented in the Senate on 6th November, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C.).

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the adjournment on a similar motion dealing with our rules in the fourth report, which I have asked to be stood until a later date. I believe it is sometime next week. I would like to have the same privilege with respect to this order, although if there are any other senators who would like to speak on it now, I would be glad to have them do so.

Order stands.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS REGULATIONS

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS ADOPTED

On the order:

Consideration of the Fourth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications (subject-matter of the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Regulations), presented in the Senate on 27th June, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Langlois).

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, your committee examined the subject matter of the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Regulations and presented an interim report on June 27 of this year.

During this first stage of the proceedings, the committee held eight public sittings, in the course of which the Minister of Transport and his officials testified. The committee also heard representatives of ten public and private agencies and received many briefs.

I may point out that both testimony and briefs placed great emphasis on the effective date of the regulations. Some groups insisted the date should be postponed, for periods varying from two months to one year. Other groups, including representatives of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, felt that the regulations should become effective as scheduled, that is, on July 1, 1985. The committee decided against recommending that the date be changed, and the regulations have been in effect since July 1, 1985.

Another major concern arose from the fact that the regulations contained provisions that differed from existing regulations in the United States for the transportation of dangerous goods between our two countries. Subsequent negotiations conducted by both governments were able to correct this situation. Furthermore, the United States intends to review its regulations to make them conform to international standards, as is the case in Canada, since July 1, 1985. Also, until the American regulations are revised, Canada has agreed to authorize the use of American standards for the transportation of goods between both countries. Last October, the U.S. Department of Transport published its final draft regulations. It would seem that generally, the regulations in both countries for the transportation of dangerous goods will be fully compatible.

Finally, the committee pointed out in its interim report that the question of staff responsible for enforcing the regulations has not yet been settled. Considering the importance of dealing with this matter to improve public safety, the committee has recommended setting a very high priority on this problem.

Since the report was tabled, a number of people have made known their intention of testifying before the committee, including: David Estrin, a lawyer with the Canadian Bar Association, Ontario Branch, and author of a book on the transportation of dangerous goods, Hélène Gagner, legal adviser with the Insurance Bureau of Canada, W. B. Voutt, Chairman of the Hartford Insurance Contracts and Liabilities Committee and B. McCormick, Chairman of the Automobile Committee at Chateau Insurance.

Honourable senators, the committee intends to continue its work and will table a final report in the near future, probably before the beginning of the new year.

Honourable senators, I move that this report be now adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

CANADA'S CULTURAL INDUSTRIES

CRISIS IN PUBLISHING INDUSTRY—MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER RULE 46(g) TO CONSIDER MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: We now come to the motion already placed before the Senate by the Honourable Senator Grafstein. As I said earlier, I will listen to senators on the urgency of the debate, and after that has been decided upon I will listen to senators on the substance of the motion.

[Senator Langlois.]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I think we have agreed to debate the motion without the Chair having to make a ruling on the urgency of the debate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That is agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order regarding the wording of the motion. This motion is brought under rule 46(g), which is fine, but part of the motion reads as follows:

—the crisis in Canada's cultural industries . . . and to urge the Government—

That does not match. If the motion contained the words "and the necessity for the government", that would be more appropriate, but the word "urge" does not match with the definition of "crisis".

The same applies to the French version of the motion.
[Translation]

You describe a crisis and suddenly say "and to urge the Government". First, you have a noun, and then, you have a verb. It is not well balanced.

I believe that the motion should be rephrased because the purpose is simply to have a debate, not to have the Senate take a firm position. It is not a motion to have something done, but to have something discussed.

Hon. Royce Frith: I think that Senator Flynn is right. I believe that we could accept a grammatical change, and also a change in the text of the motion. It would be better to say, for instance:

[English]

"trade talks with the United States and the urgent need for the government to refuse", would be more appropriate. I think Senator Flynn's point is well taken. If the mover agrees with that, I think the Senate will agree to the change.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed that the motion be amended as suggested?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: What about the French version?

[Translation]

What about the French?

Senator Flynn: Mutatis mutandis.

Senator Argue: The same applies.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Mutatis mutandis.

I now call upon the Honourable Senator Grafstein.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, crisis is often an over-used word. Is there a point of no return, a clean, clinically-defined, objectively-acknowledged moment of crisis where a country loses its national purpose? Or do nations die, haemorrhage slowly, silently, quietly by suffocating their own national will?

We know in the Senate, as students of history, nation building the Canadian way was different; it was slow and painstaking. Our nationhood has still not matured. Our nation was conceived not in war or national catastrophe, but first as a negation, a rejection of the revolutionary experiment by our neighbours to the south, and then more recently by a slower diminution of our colonial ties to the British Empire.

It took Canada over one hundred years to patriate our Constitution, and what a cost that debate had—and with what effect upon our national agenda. Our colonial frame of mind has simply never left us. Yet the national idea is growing and flourishing in every part of Canada through our magazines, our art, our books, our fashions, in the print media and in the electronic media.

How, honourable senators can fairly ask, can one declare a crisis, elevating this matter to urgent public importance just when Canada's psyche appears to be maturing with poise and self-confidence? Is this a fallacy or a partisan stratagem, or is it truly a paradox? History teaches us that paradoxes abound at contradictory yet precise moments in history. Flowering of cultural activities was noted at the end of great periods of history—the Roman Empire, the Byzantine Empire, the Turkish Empire, the Hapsburg Empire and the Victorian Empire. Paradox lies in the fact that while our cultural activities and Canadian consciousness about culture appear to be very much on the rise, there are, at the same time, conscious and unconscious forces within our nation combining, conspiring for different reasons, both good and bad, to suffocate the fragile flame of our nation's independence by stunting our cultural growth as a nation. These forces are at work as surely as the forces were at work in Italy before Garibaldi, in Poland before Pilsudski, in Prussia before Bismarck. Strong, enlightened leadership foiled those forces. The elites in those countries believed that national consciousness was some other nation's business.

Our cultural industries, with all their failures, frustrations and successes, have grown in the crevices of the nation, on the borders of our economic map, on the shoulders of our economic highway and on the margins of our own economic marketplace. We have allowed others, by acts of omission or commission, to dominate our own marketplace of ideas and identity.

Last week the Senate debated the question of whether or not Billy Bishop was a hero. Listen to what author John Gray, who wrote the great Canadian play Billy Bishop Goes to War, declared in a recent speech to a gathering of cultural representatives in Kitchener. He said, «If we do not respect ourselves we'll become cultural cripples and parasites.»

Canada can become, in his words, «everybody's colony.» He warns that time is running out. He said that «distinct cultural identity is a luxury»; that «countries live and die». He said that «countries have a life span.» What John Gray was saying to the nation is that now Canada has to choose, and to choose, honourable senators, involves cost, and these choices are costly choices.

Prime Minister Mulroney's fanatic belief in economic and national salvation through an American/Canadian free trade agreement essentially accelerates the moment of decision for us as a nation. The choice to safeguard our cultural industries first is not an act of deprivation, not an act of censorship, not an embargo on, and not to place in quarantine the cultural goods of any other nation. Such is not the signal I believe the Senate of Canada should be sending.

Virtually every aspect of our cultural life is open and will remain open to the cultural goods and services originating elsewhere. We offer the most accessible open market for cultural goods originating in the United States, Britain, France, and indeed, from around the world. Yet a deep and broad consensus has developed in Canada that demands, while we move to liberalize trade, whether with America alone or with the world by the multilateral process, recognition that there is an even greater need, a pressing need—a new imperative—to sustain and enhance our cultural industries.

Prime Minister Mulroney refuses mindlessly, carelessly, to listen to the voices of Canadians who objectively declare at this time, at this place, at this stage of development in our national life, that cultural industries must be treated differently from all other aspects of our economic life. There is this great desire, this yearning desire, by Canadians to protect our cultural nervous system, our body and soul. This desire led Mr. Mulroney and his government to legislate and require in his beloved Investment Canada Act, special treatment for cultural industries.

What, then, honourable senators, is the crisis and what is the consensus? Why does Mr. Mulroney refuse to listen to this national consensus? We have reached a point of no return, a crisis widely recognized across the nation, as the nation is plunged mindlessly without safeguards, without guidelines, without assurances, into trade talks with the most powerful cultural force in the world.

Last spring the government crafted the start of its approach to trade talks with the United States. It agreed with Parliament to establish a special committee of the Senate and House of Commons to listen to what Canadians had to say about Mr. Clark's green paper on Canada's foreign policy and specifically about the Canada-United States trade questions. That joint committee, of which I was a member, together with Senators Flynn, Doyle, Stollery and Gigantès, and joined at times by Senators Haidasz and Nurgitz, as we travelled from coast to coast, listened to the voices, the fears and optimisms about a Canada-U.S. comprehensive trade pact. That special joint committee quickly produced a unanimous recommendation by all parties, including Senators Flynn and Doyle and members of the government party of the other place, and in that report to the Senate and to the House of Commons our unanimous recommendation was that Canada's cultural industries should be excluded from the negotiating agenda with the United States.

● (1440)

At a meeting last week in Ottawa hosted by Ministers Clark, Kelleher and Bouchard, representing the federal government, 25 hand-picked representatives of the cultural industries in Canada unanimously concluded and recommended to Minister Clark and his colleagues that Canadians were far more concerned with patriating the Canadian marketplace for Canada's cultural identity and cultural industries. Until our cultural industries could dominate our own marketplace, it would be unwise, they warned, and it would even be fatal, they argued, for Canadian cultural industries to be the subject matter of negotiations with the United States.

Last week at the First Ministers' Conference in Halifax there was a strong view expressed on this matter by many first ministers. Not only should the provinces be part of every aspect of the process of trade negotiations but they shared the view expressed forcefully by Premier Peterson, and not challenged by other provincial premiers, that the cultural industries should be treated as a separate and distinct matter in these negotiations.

Premier Peterson's view, representing the largest province of this country, joined the national consensus that we found in our special joint committee report that cultural industries should be excluded from negotiations at the trade talks. It is not unduly parochial for me to express the view, as a senator from Ontario, that Canadians in Ontario have prided themselves, falsely perhaps, that we put Canada first.

Last Saturday, Marcel Masse was reappointed to the federal government as the Minister of Communications. In a television interview last Friday he said that it was time to repatriate English Canadian culture from the United States. Minister Masse supports the state of crisis in Canada's cultural industries. He said:

If I compare our situation to that of other countries, we are in serious difficulty.

Senator Haidasz: And how!

Senator Grafstein: When reporters reminded Marcel Masse that Joe Clark, in his absence from cabinet, had said that Canadian cultural industries would not necessarily be left off the bargaining table in trade talks with the Americans, he said:

From what I understand of his public declaration, Mr. Clark has changed his approach a little bit, at least that's what I understand.

Immediately after his appointment, Marcel Masse made it absolutely clear to the media that he was back in the cabinet to take up the fight for Canadian cultural sovereignty where he left off two months ago. This suggests that the cabinet is divided if Minister Masse must define his work in cabinet on this question as a fight. He warned free traders who would deal out Canadian culture to Americans to watch out. Yet, this Monday in the House of Commons, Joe Clark again, in Marcel Masse's presence, refused to exclude cultural industries from the trade agenda. The newly recycled minister sat mute.

[Senator Grafstein.]

The consensus is overwhelming. We were told by Mr. Clark that the 25 hand-picked cultural leaders had been converted to participate in the trade talks. This is contrary to the unanimous views expressed by the 25 cultural representatives he hand picked for the meeting.

In this morning's Globe and Mail there was a letter written by Graeme Gibson, who is one of these 25 hand-picked Conservative cultural leaders. Here is what he said, responding to Joe Clark's remark that:

They are prepared to work with the government in negotiations as we prepare our case.

Mr. Clark was referring to the trade case. This is what Graeme Gibson wrote:

As a participant at that meeting I am surprised, and disturbed, by this description of our role in the upcoming trade discussions. We all tried, apparently in vain, alas, to persuade Mr. Clark that cultural matters must not be negotiable. Moreover, I suggested that if the Government did place culture on the bargaining table, it would encounter concerted opposition from our community.

Since we seemed unable to persuade Mr. Clark, several proposals were made with the hope we might have better luck before it is too late. As I understand it, further discussions are anticipated so that we can try to convince the ministers that we have very little to gain and, most probably, much to lose if Canada insists upon negotiating cultural matters.

We were unanimous in pointing out that it is not greater access to American markets that we need, but a fairer access to our own.

At the same time, it was an intriguing and useful meeting. The ministers seemed generous in their desire to involve us. Nevertheless, if our Government does include cultural matters in «enhanced» trade discussions with the United States then I, and the people I know, certainly won't be working with it to prepare a case that we believe to be not only improper, but miserably shortsighted and dangerous. A great many others, some of whom were at that meeting, feel the same.

That is what a hand-picked cultural leader said of a meeting with the minister on this question.

The consensus is overwhelming. A committee of Parliament representing all parties, representatives of the cultural industries unanimously amongst the 25 leaders, a strong consensus among provincial premiers, declarations by members of the federal cabinet, all have concluded that Canada's cultural industry should be excluded from the negotiating agenda. Why the government's intransigence? Why fuel the flames of uncertainty by leaving the cultural industries in an even more fragile and exposed position?

If it is Mr. Mulroney's intention to remove cultural industries from the agenda once each country establishes its trade agenda, this would be deemed a trade-off. The trouble with trade-offs is that they always exact a higher price. By leaving cultural industries on the trade agenda, you foment and feed the formidable lobbies anxiously awaiting a call to arms to the corridors of the United States Congress. The trouble with trade-offs is that we would be compelled to give up something at the cost of other sectors. These trade-offs then inflame passionate feelings among other sectors of our economy. You cause open warfare among Canadians. You open the cultural industries to yet another senseless attack by the modern materialists in Canada who believe that culture is always expendable, that culture support can always be reduced, that culture is unnecessary and that you cannot eat or live on culture.

Leaving the cultural industries on the trade agenda will detonate, then inflame national extremists. The chauvinist elements will make it even more difficult and more arduous a task to exercise public participation in any type of trade talks. This is no way to gain a consensus for a liberal trade policy. More importantly, while leaving culture on the agenda to be later removed, the costs increase and further damage is done to most of these industries struggling today to meet the competitive demands of our own fragmented marketplace.

The indecision, the confusion, the frustration and the polarization in the country is counterproductive and inconsistent with what Mr. Mulroney promised Canada, namely, harmony and civility among Canadians in all walks of life. The cost of indecision and the cost of confusion is a self-fulfilling prophecy further damaging and undermining Canada's cultural industries.

This government prides itself on being smart when it comes to business matters. It is simply not good business to leave cultural industries in a state of indecision. Would there be any fresh investment from Bay Street? Would there be a fresh entrepreneurial spirit? Would there be new commercial initiatives injected into the fragile cultural industries while they are left in a frozen state of suspended national indecisiveness? To proceed to put culture on the trading block now, Mr. Mulroney would yet again have broken his word to safeguard and protect the cultural industries. Mr. Mulroney appears to break his word to members of his own special task force, led by Messrs. Caplan and Sauvage, set up to examine broadcasting. They were told they had a deal, that decisions would not be taken that would pre-empt their deliberations. Placing cultural industries on the trading block at this time clearly pre-empts their recommendations, which are not due until next year.

● (1450)

Can the Canadian government take the cultural industries off the agenda without undermining or unravelling the trade talks, as Mr. Clark has suggested to Parliament? The simple answer is yes. Many precedents are available.

The Americans refused to put Star Wars on the agenda with Mr. Gorbachev in Geneva, yet a consensus was reached on other issues, including an approach to arms reduction, without loss of face for either side. He did it first, not afterwards. Europeans have treated cultural industries differently in the Common Market. Cultural industries are treated as services and have been historically excluded in their negotiations. In Geneva at GATT there is a similar restriction excluding services, which, to a large measure, means that cultural goods are not subject to GATT rules. Each European nation has a complex grid of protective devices by which to safeguard its cultural industries.

If the Americans can exclude Star Wars in discussions with the Russians, if the Europeans can exclude services in the Common Market and if GATT can restrict services which include cultural services in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, then surely Canadians are not so weak or so impoverished as to think that to do so now would damage or prejudice our trade talks.

Negotiations on trade continue today and every day in every sector. Every day we talk about lumber, fisheries, agriproducts, steel and the list goes on. Can the government not see that to place cultural industries on the trade agenda and then immediately remove it would be plunging the government and Canada into a thicket of barbed wire? It would be condemned by an aroused army of lobbyists in America, fired by Congress, which would seek linkage and retaliation. It would be mauled and bloodied by vested interests in the vocal American cultural sectors, lusting to penetrate and dominate our market even more deeply.

This penetration can be contained. The best course, the intelligent course would be to exclude the cultural industries now. What can the Senate do? Over and over again I have been asked, since coming to this place, that question: What can the Senate do in such a situation? Should the Senate even raise its voice on this issue? I have been asked that question by my colleagues and by others. I say that if Parliament is the will of the people, let the Senate act as the conscience of the nation. Should not the Senate be a grand old cultural auditor general, ever vigilant in protecting and promoting the national idea? We are sent to this place from various regions to merge our regional interests in the national interest. Is our cultural soul not as important as our banking system? If the government of the day can ask the Senate to put the taxpayers at risk for over $3 billion to protect the Canadian banking system, what barricades should the Senate construct so that our national soul is not bartered away?

Joe Clark asked a joint Senate and Commons committee, some months ago, how cultural industries could be defined, should he choose at some juncture to exclude them from talks with the United States. One could remind Mr. Clark what the late Henry Armstrong, that great musician, when asked to define «jazz», said, «If you don't know what it is, I just can't tell you.»

Yet there are certain things that culture is not. Culture is not a fungus, artificially grown in the laboratory to be used in scientific experiments. Canadians, we know, have endlessly sought to define the crucial elements necessary to construct a Canadian identity. Tolstoy once wrote of art—and I think this applies to culture—that art is the education of the senses. For me, honourable senators, culture is simply the education system of ourselves as a nation. The cultural industries are those elements of art, music, theatre, books and media that act as the central nervous system of our nation. Yet we know from clear statistical evidence—economic facts that are undisputa-ble—that the vital organs of our cultural nervous system have been pinched and stunted. When we look and when we feel, we see others, not ourselves. It is not an uncertain mirror, as Senator Davey suggested in the special Senate committee studying the media. No mirror is big enough or strong enough to reflect the narrow margins of our borders where our culture lives and thrives.

A commentator recently said on CBC that culture, perhaps like politics, is just an endless panel show. For me, better described is a cri de cœur by John Gray, who said in his speech in Kitchener some weeks ago, in recounting growing up in Canada, that he felt caught in a no man's land because it was British plays, British music and British writers, American plays, American music and American writers that had defined his existence. Only in the mid-1970s, John Gray said, when he discovered a Canadian-produced play entitled «1837», describing the uprising in Upper Canada, did he come to realize that there are strong Canadian feelings that could be dramatically displayed on the stages, the tiny stages, of our country.

Now our American friends have called for an equal playing field as a pre-condition to the liberalization of trade. All objective observers of Canada's cultural industries have agreed unanimously, in royal commissions, special Senate committees, special task forces, endless talk shows, the Canada Council, the CRTC—the list is endless—that the cultural industries have been relegated to playing on the sidelines of the Canadian field, leaving our playing field, our own marketplace, so open to foreign domination that we cannot compete even in our country with our powerful ally to the south. In what country in the western world, I ask honourable senators, can one find 80 per cent of a nation's publishing business in foreign hands? Have we doomed ourselves to be pygmies, smaller, tinier versions of what we can be as a vibrant nation?

Honourable senators, the crisis is clear. We must exclude the cultural industries from the trade talks. We must immediately repatriate the domestic marketplace for Canadian culture, and the place to start is where Marcel Masse said that it should start, that is with the Canadian book publishing industry.

Why this fuss about books? What are the facts? The facts, honourable senators, will astound you. The facts define the crisis. The following is an amazing tale of our country's book market. Canada, first of all, has been and probably always will be the most open book market in the western world. From the latest statistics available in 1983 we can extrapolate that each year Canadians spend over $1.2 billion on books. Roughly 50 per cent of that, or $600 million, is spent on foreign books that are imported directly into the Canadian marketplace. Of the $600 million spent on books published in Canada, approximately $500 million is spent on books written by Canadian authors that are published in Canada, and those books include texts, paperbacks, trade books, children's books, fiction—all books. This means that close to 65 per cent—almost two-thirds of every dollar spent on books in Canada—is spent on books from outside of Canada or reprints of foreign books within Canada, written by non-Canadians.

[Senator Grafstein.]

How does this state of affairs compare with that of any other country in the western world or any other country in the developed world? Two examples will suffice to show that.

In the United States, close to 95 per cent of the money spent on books is spent on those books written and published by Americans. In the United Kingdom, well over 90 per cent is spent on books written by British authors and published by British publishers. The situation is similar in France, Italy, Germany, Spain, China and Japan. Canadians, then, have the greatest choice and the fewest restrictions on entry of books into our marketplace.

The crisis intensifies as we examine the marketplace even more closely. By making a clinical examination, we discover how we came to this extraordinary state of affairs. Of the $600 million—representing roughly 50 per cent of all books sold in Canada—60 per cent is controlled by foreign-owned publishers in Canada and 40 per cent is controlled by Canadian-owned publishing houses. This means that only 20 per cent of the total book market in Canada is in the hands of Canadian-owned publishing houses. As one examines these figures more closely, one finds that the foreign-owned firms comprise only 14 per cent of all publishing houses in Canada. There are approximately 29 firms which are foreign owned compared to 173 firms which are Canadian owned, yet the 14 per cent foreign ownership controls over 60 per cent of the domestic market.

But the story is even more appalling as the numbers are brought into sharper focus. Sixty-four per cent of the elementary and high school textbook market, 72 per cent of the university post-secondary textbook market and 80 per cent of the scholar reference book market is controlled by the 14 foreign-owned firms. The textbook market, which is steady and predictable, is also more lucrative compared to all other sectors of the publishing business. Is it any wonder, honourable senators, that of the books Canadians read only one out of five is Canadian? In other words, one book out of five is written by a Canadian, while in the United States and the United Kingdom the figures are more than reversed. In the United Kingdom four out of five books are by British authors, by British publishers, and the same ratios apply in the United States. Americans read mostly American authors.

How do Canadian writers fare in their own marketplace, saturated, dominated by ideas and ownership from outside the country? It is estimated that writers in this country, full and part-time, earn between $5,000 and $10,000 per year—less than any student can make at a fast food, hamburger or pizza franchise in any town in Canada.

Does ownership make a difference? If ownership is in foreign hands in publishing, the evidence is overwhelming. Even though Canadian-owned publishing houses control less than 20 per cent of the total Canadian marketplace, almost 90 per cent of all Canadian-authored titles in Canada are published by Canadian-owned houses. In the adult non-fiction field, Canadian-owned publishers are responsible for over 91 per cent of all Canadian authored titles. Canadian ownership does make a difference. Jean Chrétien's book Straight from the Heart has become a political best seller. It has sold over 100,000 copies. Last week Jean Chrétien told me that the book would never have been written had not Anna Porter, a Canadian publisher, sought him out and persuaded him that he had something to say, that what he would say would be printed, and what would be printed would be read; and Canadians have confirmed that decision.

Canadian ownership makes a difference in exports. In 1981 English language Canadian-owned firms exported books to the value of $103 million compared to $4.6 million exported by foreign-owned firms. The statistics get worse when you examine them. In other words, Canadian firms are better exporters of products from Canada by a large margin than those that are foreign-owned.

Is it not surprising that according to Statistics Canada, even though 60 per cent of the marketplace is controlled by foreign-owned books, Canadian publishers employ almost as many people as foreign-owned publishers in Canada? Canadian firms employed 2,325 employees in 1983 compared to foreign-owned publishers who employed 2,436. Canadian ownership does make a difference.

When one turns to Prentice-Hall, Ginn and Company, and Copp Clark—whose proposed sales are now being reviewed by Investment Canada—we find that those three foreign-owned firms represent sales close to 10 per cent of the domestic book marketplace.

Honourable senators will recall the statistical case that gave rise to the National Energy Policy which, at great political and economic cost to the nation, repatriated 10 per cent of our energy resources. That was a costly, and continues to be a very costly, exercise. There, in the energy field—and all Canadians accept that we should repatriate our energy resources—the domination was not as great as is the case with the current situation in Canadian publishing. There are 173 small, mostly under-capitalized, publishing firms seeking to exist in a fragmented marketplace, dominated by a few foreign-owned firms whose costs are lower because of the advantage of being subsidiaries of major foreign-owned firms. To approve these transactions is clearly to move energetically in exactly the wrong direction. Approval of these transactions are prescriptions for a country that has chosen no longer to remain a nation.

Is it small wonder that Marcel Masse, before his resurrection, chose to introduce a publishing policy that would halt the further erosion of the Canadian publishing marketplace? Will Minister Masse choose to reinforce that stand taken by Investment Canada which apparently has recommended that the sale of Prentice-Hall to Gulf and Western be refused? So the crisis is now. We have Investment Canada recommending to the cabinet that Prentice-Hall be turned down. Yet the government lingers. To approve that transaction would be to further concentrate our marketplace in foreign hands. Neither Investment Canada nor the government has any mechanism to enforce guarantees on undertakings—so I say, «Say no; say no» now.

Gulf and Western have a long history and experience in this country in cultural matters affecting Canada's identity. Prior to 1968 Gulf and Western had a substantial stake in Canada's growing cable industry. With the introduction of the Broadcasting Act in 1968 the tide was turned so that the cable industry was regulated and legislated to become Canadian-owned and Canadian-operated. Gulf and Western is still one of the largest exhibitors of films in this country through its ownership and control of Famous Players theatres. Gulf and Western understood and understands that Canadians have become increasingly concerned about transplanting any vital cultural angle.

To turn them down, would it be retroactive? It would be retroactive if the government chose now to emasculate its publishing policy. Gulf and Western is no innocent bystander. Anyone who would retain the former chairman of the Democratic Party in the United States, an outstanding lawyer, lobbyist and special trade representative to Jimmy Carter, is no innocent in trade matters. Mr. Strauss knows Canada and knows Canada well. Gulf and Western have a long experience in questions affecting our identity. So I say that it is not a new question for them. They are not caught off guard. They know our concerns. They had notice, they have knowledge. The threats by Gulf and Western's lobbyists and its representatives, with this background, should be put in proper perspective.

We have been told by the government, through the restored Minister of Communications, Mr. Masse, that he is prepared to take a stand and reverse the tide. This is the time and this is the place for him to proceed.

In August of this year Mr. Mulroney boasted that one of his major accomplishments since taking office in 1984 was the banning of foreign takeover of book publishers. Apparently he felt the publishing policy was a major commitment in 1984. This is where the Senate should urge Mr. Masse to stake out the border of Canadian identity, to roll back the map.

Why should book publishing merit our concern? Why should we give book publishing a paramount position? Any student of history in this chamber will concur that publishing is a vital sector. Book publishing is crucial to the life of our nation. We all know that in the beginning was the word. Yet if writers cannot publish, there are no words. If there are no words, there are no books, and if there are no books, there is no nation. Writers, we are told, are the guideposts to our progress. Books have defined nations. The late David Ben Gurion once wrote of books and nationhood, «We have preserved the book and the book has preserved us.» It was Disraeli who argued that a book was probably greater than a battle; and it was Martin Luther who declared at the start of the Protestant Reformation, «Here I stand»—and there he stood, on the written word. Northrup Frye, that great Canadian critic of literature, in his majestic book The Great Code, traced the source of all literature, all values in western literature, to one book, the Bible. Painstakingly he pointed out the importance of the written word as a means of measuring values, understanding symbolism, aesthetics, and, ultimately, the progress of civilization. «The literal level», Frye wrote, «hearing the word and seeing the text is at the centre of the activity of the sense experience, the foundation of all knowledge. All correlations, relativity to truth, emanate from the written word.» Books, then, are the building blocks of civilization, are the building blocks of nationhood. How can any Canadian, who believes in the future of Canada as a nation, not be prepared to take extraordinary steps to ensure that publishing, the core of our society, is sustained, reinforced, protected and encouraged to grow? That is why we must take a stand and why we must say to the government, «Say no».

● (1510)

Words like «economic imperialism» should be applied with great care. Words like «cultural imperialism» should be applied with even greater care. I think it is safe to advise our American friends that Canada will remain the primary consumer for American manufactured cultural goods, and that this will not change. Canadians want access to the world's best entertainment and the best culture. We do not want to deny Americans nor the many aspects of their changing and exciting culture access to our marketplace. Americans need friends. America's interests require a deeper comprehension of our shared interests. America would be the first to recognize danger to itself if Canada's independence as a nation and as an independent ally were endangered. Honourable senators will recall how Americans reacted at the first flush of separatism in Quebec. America should understand that Canada's cultural roots should not be allowed to wither, deteriorate and disintegrate by too much saturation even from the Friendly Giant. Canada is a strong and independent ally. Is it not better for American interests for Canada to be seen as strong and independent, rather than as a puppet on the world stage dominated by American policy, American hegemony and American decision making? Has not America suffered and is not America suffering now from this deterioration of independence by states throughout Central America and South America?

We should send a message to Ambassador Gotlieb and to Ambassador Niles that threats of «scorched earth» are not threats that should be conveyed to strong, independent allies. Americans share our love of books and should understand that a strong and independent book publishing industry in Canada lies at the heart of America's long-term interests, just as a strong and independent book publishing industry in America guards the American flame.

Let me define for Canadians and Americans alike why Americans should want a strong and vibrant book publishing industry in Canada. We have already said that a strong book publishing industry means a strong country. America itself recognized this when it provided a clause in the American Copyright Act which requires American authors to publish in America if they wish to protect their copyright in America. The American book publishing industry became strong and vital based on that important clause. Americans should foster a strong and independent Canada precisely because a strong and independent Canada will share the same democratic and pluralistic values as the United States. Only a strong and independent Canada can spread those shared values throughout the world, at many times and in many places better, precisely because we are independent of America. America should be made to understand that it lies in America's strategic interest to afford Canadians full opportunity to define our shared values in Canada's own unique and distinctive way, the Canadian way. Canada can best support the American mission abroad the Canadian way because the Canadian mission for a democratic and pluralistic world parallels the American dream. To do so, both Canada and America must define carefully their mutual strategic interests integrating their importance and their priorities. If America's strategic interests lie in increasing economic traffic with Canada, encouraging our cultural independence should be a pre-condition to free countries such as Canada which share certain common democratic values.

The intelligent mind of America does not wish to harvest mindless replicants around the world. This is no model to set before those countries in the developing world who are now choosing their future, now choosing which system of government, which system of values, free or totalitarian, best represents their future. Both Canada and America favour pluralistic, free, democratic institutions. Both nations favour a move toward a more liberal approach to trade throughout the world. America should encourage Canada to become stronger, more culturally independent so that it can parallel America's efforts in fostering stable and democratic countries around the world.

Individual freedom and cultural identity lies at the root of the democratic idea as it lies at the root of democratic institutions. Writers and books are the heart of Canada's nervous system. America should be convinced not to be short-sighted, thereby affecting its own strategic interests. Canadian diplomats and Canadian representatives must become advocates of this position. Let us use American writers to support our case. Listen to what American writers have to say about the importance of the writer in their society. William Faulkner, a Nobel prize winner, who dug deeply into the American psyche wrote:

I believe that man will not merely endure; he will prevail. He is mortal, not because he alone among creatures has an inexhaustible voice, but because he has a soul, a spirit capable of compassion and sacrifice and endurance. The writer's duty is to write about these things. It is his privilege to help man endure by lifting his heart, by reminding him of the courage and honour and hope and compassion and pity and sacrifice which have been the glory of his past. The writer's voice need not merely be the record of man. He can be one of the pillars to endure and prevail.

John Steinbeck, another great American author and Nobel prize winner for literature whose tales of pathos and dreams helped construct America's progressive social agenda wrote these words:

The ancient commission of the writer has not changed. He is charged with exposing our many grievous faults and failures, with dredging up to the light our dark and dangerous dreams for the purpose of improvement.

Furthermore, the writer is delegated to declare and to celebrate man's proven capacity for greatness of heart and spirit, for gallantry and defeat, for courage, compassion and love. In the endless war against weakness and despair, these are the bright rally-flags of hope and emulation.

I hold that a writer who does not passionately believe in the perfectibility of man has no dedication nor any membership in literature.

The present universal fear has been the result of a forward surge in our knowledge and manipulation of certain dangerous factors in the physical world.

It is true that other phases of understanding have not yet caught up in this great step, but this is a part of the writer's responsibility to make sure that they do.

With humanity's long proud history of standing firm against natural enemies, sometimes in the face of almost certain extinction, we would be cowardly and stupid to leave the field on the eve of our greatest potential victory.

That is what John Steinbeck had to say. So let us let Ambassador Gotlieb and Ambassador Niles enlist in our cause these great American voices, these great American writers of literature. Let them be joined by Canadian writers like Frye, John Gray, Christina Newman, Pierre Berton, Margaret Atwood, Mordecai Richler, Peter Timothy Finlay, Alice Munro, Margaret Lawrence, Gabrielle Roy, and new writers yet to come, as well as poets like Layton, Carman Johnson Pratt and our own Senator Jean Le Moyne, who is one of Canada's outstanding poets.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, our case is simple. As our own Canadian culture expands and flourishes so does the American dream everywhere. This lies at the convergence of Canada's and the United States' strategic interests. The primary foreign policy issue for both Canada and the United States is how best to promote democratic values, how to foster democracy in a world that is shrinking rather than increasing its appetite for democratic institutions. Let us make the honourable Joe Clark a born-again convert to the Canadian idea. Only a growing Canadian idea can lend fuel to and can feed the flame of the American dream.

What can be done? Just to deny the Prentice-Hall, Ginn and Company and Copp Clark transactions will not change or alter the crisis in Canadian publishing. The Honourable Marcel Masse's book publishing policy is a useful first step if it is still government policy. It is clear that the cabinet is divided on this issue. If not, why did it not accept long ago what we understand to be Investment Canada's recommendation that the Prentice-Hall sale be refused.

If we refuse approval, what can be done to defuse the crisis? The following is a simple plan in a cost-effective way that would allow Canadian publishing firms to regain control of Canada's heart and soul. First, say no to Prentice-Hall, Ginn and Company and Copp Clark. Then:

(1) Increase our modest investment in the Canada Council in support of Canadian books by Canadian authors. Successful publishing companies and authors will repay this support through increased levels of taxable revenues.

(2) Expand the very modest existing government programs to market and distribute Canadian books.

(3) Establish tax-free cultural bonds, similar to tax-free municipal bonds in the United States, that would allow Canadian book publishers to consolidate and rationalize their industry. If we wish to imitate America, let us imitate their plan to help their towns and cities.

(4) Let the premiers, including Premier Peterson, put his record where his rhetoric is, through an aggressive textbook publishing policy that encourages Canadian-owned publishers' entry into the lucrative textbook market.

(5) Finally, enlist the CBC, both radio and television, to promote Canadian authors and Canadian books through public service announcements. Let each Canadian publisher, at his cost, prepare commercials for both CBC radio and television and let the national electronic highway promote Canadian authors and Canadian books from coast to coast on prime time. This will produce Canadian bestsellers. The CBC can produce Canadian bestsellers instantaneously through the power of the people's media.

Mr. Clark argues that elements in the cultural industries of Canada want greater access to the American marketplace. Listen to what Mr. Ronald Osborne, President of Maclean Hunter Limited, one of Canada's largest multi-media corporations with interests in print, magazines, radio, television in Canada, media interests in the United States and Europe, said on November 20 last in England to the Canadian-British Trade Association. These are his words as I have excerpted them from the speech he made on that occasion:

With the gradual integration of our economies through the free trade process... the Canadian voice will of necessity become less important and less dominant in Canada. If we are not careful, that may happen. But I believe that is quite the reverse of what we should be seeking. If it has been important for Canada to have a free, independent and economically viable voice through the media in the past, how much more important will it be in the future with that gradual integration and the advent of free trade? It seems to me that the watchdog role, the auditor role and the public conscience role will be increasingly important; not less so. We must preserve an independent Canadian voice, while at the same time continuing to allow total access to Canada and Canadians of foreign voices. The best way to do this is ensure that free enterprise can survive in Canada...

And then he goes on to say:

If this cannot be achieved, then the alternative is to abdicate this role to government—

His main point, he says:

—is that the so-called cultural industries form a key component of the social fabric of Canada, just like the Canadian banking system, the Canadian legal system, the Canadian system of social justice, etc. We have comparatively few national forums for dialogue amongst ourselves. Those few that we have which are uniquely Canadian must be preserved at all costs—

Undoubtedly, I can also be accused of being self-serving. After all, Maclean Hunter has a fair amount at stake in this process. Let me assure you that Maclean Hunter is satisfied that it can certainly survive whatever comes out of the free trade negotiations.

Then he goes on to say that he is sure that this does not apply to others. He continued:

However, many Canadian cultural institutions will not have the ability to survive and do not have the financial wherewithal to wade through a massive upheaval in the cultural framework to which I have already referred—

He went on to say that he did not wish to be negative on free trade, but simply to convey the message that we should not barter away those very things that enable us to call ourselves Canadians.

Honourable senators, I would ask you now to listen to Mavor Moore, one of Canada's outstanding cultural leaders. In a recent article in the Globe and Mail, he raised an even larger question: If culture is the enhancer of self-knowledge, knowledge is becoming the most valuable commodity in the post-industrial era. Here is how Mr. Mavor Moore argues with the support of Kenneth Dye, the Auditor General of Canada and Walter Wriston, the former Chairman of Citibank, one of the largest banks in America, that knowledge capital may be more critical to the economy than money.

Mr. Dye, in his report, has said:

Accounting measures past performance. Accounting also proved useful in making decisions for the future.

Dye suggests that this may be changing with the accelerated pace of change in the information age. He went on to say:

Decisions based on immediate past experience cannot be guaranteed to work out in the future. Accounting is attempting to face up to this challenge.

Now to quote directly from Mavor Moore's article. It is a very short one but I think it is both perceptive and crucial.

The challenge is nowhere sharper than in the burgeoning field of cultural affairs. Here accumulated knowledge, creative skills, imagination and innovation are more valuable and solid currencies than the money they make—but much harder to measure. Kenneth Dye is faced not only with auditing Crown corporations involved in such notoriously unpredictable and intractable futures as the arts and sciences, but also with serving a Parliament that generally puts economic policy first, and measures even that in outmoded monetary terms.

It is enormously to his credit that the Auditor-General shows a sound appreciation of the developing situation, and is wrestling with both problems. The first he compares, borrowing from Lao Tzu—

Tzu is a Chinese philosopher:

[Senator Grafstein.]

—to «trying to understand running water by catching it in a bucket. Those of us who are seeking to improve the display of financial and accounting information for the public sector are trying to provide a measure of the water as it flows.» This includes the rapids created by subjecting the cultural agencies to the techniques of comprehensive auditing: How does one prove, at the time, that musical composition or scientific research is about to pay off? It may be the auditing techniques that have to change.

The second problem, that of changing blinkered perspectives on economics, is likely to be tougher to solve; the process requires a re-education of parliamentarians, the chamber of commerce and a substantial portion of the general public. Dye puts the problem plainly enough, but confines his recommendations, appropriately, to those cultural matters within his own competence. Here he specifically addresses «information» since that is his main responsibility to Parliament.

«We have been steadily moving from an industrial age into the information age. Nowhere is this more obvious than in the public sector. Governments are in the information business. It is no coincidence that the increasing role of the public sector in the economies of many post-industrialized countries goes hand in hand with information becoming an even larger resource in those societies.» After listing other «information issues of concern,» Dye turns to «the effects of high technology on employment and the effects of global telecommunications systems on cultural sovereignty.»

But the point is not merely that the culture industry has become one of Canada's half-dozen largest and most labour-intensive, it is that we must, if we are to survive, alter our whole conception of what «the economy» consists of. «All these (issues),» writes Dye, «are symptoms of an era in which information is a dominant force in the economy. It is therefore increasingly important to view information as a costly and valuable resource—a resource «comparable in strategic importance to human resources, financial resources and physical assets.»

Mavor Moore then went on to say:

Now if any Canadian Government has come even close to giving our cultural assets the same strategic importance as these others, I stand prepared to eat my old fur hat. There is ample evidence of the opposite: that governments put saving money before saving talent, rank energy above education, and rate our banking system as far more crucial than our broadcasting system.

They are not, I need hardly add, likely to accept instruction from me on the subject—so I draw their attention to some remarks of a distinguished American financier, Walter B. Wriston, recently retired chairman of Citibank, in a speech to the Executives Club of Chicago.

«It's no secret,» said Wriston, «that in the last few years some of our best economists have badly missed in predicting the direction of the American economy. Perhaps their mistakes are a result of using words and concepts that were developed decades ago to describe a very different kind of economy... One familiar word that needs to be reconsidered is 'capital'... A strong argument can be made that this new kind of capital (knowledge) is more critical to the growth of the economy than is money capital. But knowledge capital does not show up in the numbers economists customarily look at (or quote) when evaluating capital formation.»

Money capital will not, Wriston added, cease to be important, but another sort of capital will become more so. «We have little or no control over the natural resources within our borders, but we do have control over the educational and cultural environment that produces the men and women who will lead the world. If we want better economic forecasting and better policies, we must find a way to factor the growth of knowledge into our equations... It would be folly to conduct our foreign policy on the basis of the geopolitical map of 1930. It may well be that to conduct our economic policy on the basis of words and concepts that were valid in the 1930s carries similar hazards for us today.»

That is the end of Mr. Wriston's quote. Mavor Moore then concludes his insightful article by saying:

The hazards may be even worse in Canada. Continuing failure to factor culture into our economic equations could lead to a far bigger horror story than any so far reported by Canada's Auditor-General. We could be bankrupt, not of money but of ideas.

That, honourable senators, is what Mavor Moore had to say about culture and knowledge. Knowledge and culture cannot be separated. Our economic future is pinned to our knowledge industries which, in turn, are pinned to our cultural industries.

● (1530)

Honourable senators, my grandfather, in blessed memory, was blind for 50 years of his adult life. A writer of books, he taught me that to love all books was to love life. Honourable senators, show me a person who does not love books and I will show you a person who does not love his country; show me a person who does not love his country, and I will show you a person without a country. Show me a country without independent people who do not love their country, and I will show you a country that is not a nation. It all starts and ends with books.

Honourable senators, I rest my case.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think it is fairly clear that I will not be able to give such a complete review of the cultural situation in our country as the one to which we have just listened. I will not be as lengthy as the speaker who has just taken his seat. I do not criticize him for the length of his speech because the nature of the topic which he expounded with some eloquence this afternoon is sufficiently important to occupy the time of the Senate. I listened with much attention to what he had to say. I merely say that in a debate of this kind—which is sprung on the Senate, more or less—it is not possible to prepare oneself with that degree of diligence one would wish in order to reply adequately. Quite obviously, that was not an off-the-cuff set of remarks.

I was forewarned, I suppose, and I should admit that. I looked at La Presse this morning and I read, «Les libéraux bloquent le Sénat par un débat sur la culture», courtesy of the Honourable Senator Gigantès. So, I had some inkling that today's sitting of the Senate would occupy itself with this topic, which was a bit of a help. But, nevertheless, I must plead the pressure of events for any shortcomings honourable senators may find in what I have to say.

I must say that there has never been a time in my 68 years of observation of the Canadian scene that I took more pride and satisfaction in the development of a Canadian culture and of a Canadian national feeling than I do at the present time. I have seen, over the years, this country in its cultural activities—in the arts, in the writing of books, and in all of those things which are encompassed in that concept—emerge from relative obscurity to a position of real prominence, not only within our own nation, but on the world stage. Without making exaggerated claims for a Canadian national cultural contribution to the great world, nevertheless we have been doing better, and doing substantially better, than we have ever done before.

That development of our nation is one to be cherished; that development is one to be protected; that development is one to be promoted; and I take second place to no other person in this chamber or elsewhere in my expression of support and appreciation for the cultural growth and development of our country. It has been a great thing.

It has been a great thing because what we have accomplished has been done in circumstances which, perhaps, among lesser men and lesser people, would have proved insurmountable. We have done it on a continent which we share with the greatest nation on earth, a nation that has a cultural life of its own which is second to none, and against which the spread-of-information industry and the spread of technology has rendered us completely pervious to the impact of American culture in all aspects of Canadian life.

I suspect it will not be easier in the future because when one considers what will happen with the technology of communication, one has to admit that the whole world, and not just Canada, is going to be exposed to the cultural influences that we have around us. That our culture has achieved the things it has achieved side by side with that colossus spilling over its borders, as the honourable senator has so correctly said, is an achievement of no small proportion. But it illustrates and underlines the fragility of what has been achieved, and it illustrates and underlines our need to take due note and due account of the situation in which our cultural industries find themselves, and to make sure that we follow those paths of policy which take into account a reasonable approach to the development and growth and expansion of the culture of Canada.

I should like to maintain, and I shall endeavour to show, that what the government has been doing in this past little while is dedicated to that end. If there is a point of no return, as my friend suggests, if there is a crisis of which my friend speaks, if there is an overwhelming necessity to do something and to start doing it now, I want to say that that did not happen overnight; that is the result of a long effluxion of time. I want to say that that had to do with what was going on not only in the year that this government has been in office, but long before. I am sure we would have welcomed in days gone by expressions of support for Canadian culture that we hear today on all sides. It is good that they come now, and I have no objection to what has been said; I support it. But I draw the attention of this chamber to the fact that if there is a point of no return, if there is a crisis, it is the culmination of years of difficulty and years of problems in this area.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: So, I think that those of us who are interested in Canadian culture have to have a sense of history, and we have to realize that in order to turn this situation around, in order to produce a better climate for the cultural activities of this country, we cannot expect to snap our fingers and see the job done; it will be a long and continuous process which will require the dedication of many people in all aspects of our life, starting in our schools.

I remember when I had some responsibility for education in my own province. I tried to get a textbook on the history of Canada which was Canadian in its concept and in all its aspects, which was solidly based on the culture of the Canadian nation, but I could not get the nine provinces—or was it ten? I guess Newfoundland was there all the time—of the country to agree on one textbook that would adequately express the cultural identity of Canada. That proved to be an impossibility. I do not know whether that would be any easier today but that illustrates that we have problems at home in appreciating our individuality and doing those things that are necessary to promote that feeling of Canadianism, not just in this chamber or on this day, but in the time to come, because that is when the test will come; the test will come in what the future brings for this nation.

I am confident that we will meet that test; I am confident that our culture will continue to grow; and I am equally confident that this government will do its part to see that that is so.

Let me take a few of the points that I should like to make in connection with the activities of the current administration in respect of these cultural concerns. I must confess, in view of the extemporaneous nature of my remarks, that if my pursuit of government policy is a little disjointed it is not because the government's policy is disjointed but because I am in trying to pick up the facts as I go along.

Senator Frith: The former is much more likely than the latter.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend may be inclined to say that, but some of us may think that we have a case and may want to make it.

In connection with the publishing business, for example, it is perfectly clear that we have long had a policy of special consideration. But, if my memory is correct, that was only formally expressed in the Investment Canada legislation. It may have been implicit in what went before; indeed it was, because the government acted in connection with takeovers, or what not, in the 1970s. But it was explicit for the first time in the Investment Canada legislation that cultural matters were separate and distinct and would have to be given special consideration. That was exactly as it should be; that was exactly what was required.

• (1540)

In connection with publishing, what is the policy of the government? I am going to read part of our policy paper because there is a lot of confusion in this regard. Some people think the policy has changed. We have heard the reference by Senator Grafstein to this statement made last July when he intimated that he did not know whether that is still the policy of the government or not. I should like to tell you that it is. I should like to tell you that it is the policy of the government that these matters in connection with the publishing industry are subject to that policy now as they were in July. A deal should not sufficiently lessen competition in the industry and, when some new foreign owner comes in, he has to turn over control to Canadians within two years at a fair market price. That time can be extended if he does not find a buyer in that period.

Honourable senators, I am not going to read the whole policy because there are pages of it, and I think my honourable friend knows most of it. I am simply saying that that policy of last July is still the policy of the Government of Canada. That is the policy which will be foremost in the minds of the deciders when they decide what to do about these various book-publishing questions that my honourable friend has raised.

My honourable friend seems to think there is a problem of retroactivity. Well, perhaps some would argue that, but I do not think there is. I do not think the people in Gulf and Western think so either because I have the testimony of their counsel in dealing with this matter in which he recognized that not only now, but in days gone by, this question of special consideration for the publishing industry was clearly reflected as policy objectives of the federal government—this government and the last. Therefore, the question of retroactivity seems to me to be a pretty skimpy one on which to base any argument.

I am saying that the policies that have been laid down in July are policies which will be considered when this matter receives further consideration.

The statement was made that cabinet has considered this. I do not know where my honourable friend gets his information, but I have to tell him that it was not considered at any cabinet meeting I attended. It may well be that that will happen sometime in the fairly near future, but it certainly has not happened yet; so, all of that argument of his which was devoted to exposing the dangers of divided counsel in cabinet falls by the wayside.

However, even if Senator Grafstein were right, I ask my honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition: Did he find cabinet solidly united on every issue which came before it? I would be surprised if he said, «Yes.» Cabinet is a place where differences of opinion flourish. There may well be questions put in cabinet reflecting both sides of this issue, but that has not happened yet, and the policy of the government remains as it is.

Senator Grafstein: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Roblin: I should like to follow through, because it is difficult to develop a train of thought when one is on one's feet with nothing to read from. I would just as soon continue my train of thought so that I do not lose myself entirely in the mist of my honourable friend's question.

Senator Phillips: Senator Gigantès did not read his speech.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend need not worry about a divided cabinet at the moment. If there is a division later on and he wants to tell me about it, that is fine. There is not one at the present time.

We have this question of Prentice-Hall and all that is associated with it. I appreciate the advice my honourable friend has given us, which is clear and to the point: He says, «Don't do it.» I would say that if I am going to let them do it, it will only be within the terms of the policy laid down in July, which is perhaps a little different from what my friend says. But I think it is equally satisfactory in protecting the cultural interests of the Canadian nation.

Honourable senators, I am sure, will know that there is a lot more to book-publishing than what Investment Canada has to do with it. There is a lot more to establishing a sounder foundation of a publishing industry that has only 20 per cent of our market and probably a smaller percentage of the profits. There is much more to do in that regard than worry about Investment Canada, important as that is.

The minister in charge, the Honourable Marcel Masse, is a man who understands that very clearly indeed. He attended a meeting of the Cultural Ministers of Canada in Halifax last September. They sat down and decided that they would investigate this whole matter with a view to producing a policy in which the provinces would have a share. I know that it is a sort of anathema maranatha to suggest to anyone on the other side that the provinces should have a look in on anything, but that is not our idea; we think they should have a share.

Senator Frith: «Some honourable senators: Oh, oh.»

Senator Roblin: I hope that will stimulate my friend to enter into this debate later on.

● (1550)

In any case, they have agreed that they will meet in February in order to consider this whole question. In the meantime, the government has set in motion its own inquiry into the matter, which surfaced in the press the other day when they reported that Francis Fox, a francophone from eastern Canada, and a gentleman called James Marsh from western Canada, would be visiting the premiers and Ministers of Culture to develop that common negotiating stance involving Canadian book-publishing and film industries as well.

So, the minister is well aware that we need to have a thorough consideration of this matter, a consideration that goes far beyond anything that has been done to the present time, and that it needs to involve the provinces, particularly in view of their interest in education. He is doing that and has his own men out in the field right now looking into these matters. They will report to him in February and he will deal with that report with the Ministers of Culture when they meet.

I want to tell this chamber that the deliberations which take place there and the decisions which they reach will certainly have a very important bearing on the whole question of the cultural aspects of our country and the free trade or the trade enhancement negotiations that are going on at the present time. They will be most significant. It covers not only book-publishing, but it covers films as well. A preparatory study is under way. We know who is doing it. They are not partisan. One of them is a former colleague of my honourable friend opposite, the Honourable Francis Fox.

We are trying to get an objective statement. Just as with Mr. Caplan's committee, we are trying to get an objective statement in respect of broadcasting.

Those do not sound to me like the policies or the actions of a government which does not care, or a government which knows its mind so well that it is prepared to push on at all costs right now and throw culture and its associated activities to the wolves; not at all. It sounds to me like an administration that cares about these things and is prepared to do something about them. That is exactly what is going on now.

I do not make these comments by way of criticism of what my friend said. I do not criticize what he said. I liked a lot of what he said. He made some references to the Prime Minister which I did not care for, but, on the whole, he made a good, constructive speech setting out some parameters in the cultural industry, which we would be well advised to take note of. I thank him for what he said, and I tell him that he finds a responsive audience among many of us on this side of the house as well.

I want to get down to what I think are some necessary clarifications respecting the position taken by the government or the position taken by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the preliminary skirmishes—that is all they are—in which he has been engaged with respect to the cultural matter. We cannot be sure what we are going to put on the table because we do not have a table yet. First, get your table, and then you can go ahead. In the meantime, we are developing our specifics so that when we get to that table, we can do so in an effective way. However, I think that table will probably not be set up in February; it sounds more like late spring or early summer to me, so there is a little time yet to go on this matter.

What did the Secretary of State for External Affairs say about putting things on the table? I will tell you what he said, because I think it does not bear the construction that has been placed on it. This is what he said in his speech to the Foreign Policy Association in New York on November 18 last, and I am quoting:

Protection of our distinct cultural identity is of singular importance to Canada—

May I break in with an observation of my own? As you know, circumstances alter cases. If you sit on one side of the table, things can look different from what they do on the other. We Canadians regard books, movies and broadcasting as cultural, and that has a special meaning for us. The Americans regard books, movies and broadcasting as business, as economics, and they approach them from quite a different standpoint.

When I was in New York the other day, I spoke to some foreign policy people, and I tell you that I made it perfectly clear to them that we regard culture as something special, not solely as an economic matter to be bargained like shoes or timber or lumber. That position, I think, fairly reflects the Government of Canada.

Getting back to Mr. Clark again:

Our government's intention to promote culture in Canada through direct financial support is simply not at issue in a trade negotiation.

Then, in a separate paragraph:

We are prepared to discuss with the United States ways we can strengthen—

That is the word—«strengthen»— —cultural activities through trade. But, under no circumstances are we prepared to agree to any measures which weaken those Canadian industries or undermine their capacity to serve our cultural needs.

Does that sound like the words of man who is going to place our culture, willy-nilly, on the trading block? Not to me, it doesn't. He is saying that if they get on that block, it will be because we intend to strengthen our culture, and we are going to do nothing that will weaken it.

The Prime Minister has made the same point. If I can find my record of his contribution to this debate, I will read it to the chamber because I think it deserves to be known. The gist of it is that one of the clear undertakings of the present government has to do with this matter of culture and that we are dedicated to ensure that it is enhanced and improved.

● (1600)

The Prime Minister said in the House of Commons on September 26:

Our political sovereignty, our system of social programs, our commitment to fight regional disparities, our unique cultural identity, our special linguistic character,—these are the essence of Canada. They are not at issue in these negotiations.

[Senator Roblin.]

I think that the statement of the Prime Minister is clear. I think that the statement of the Secretary of State is clear. I think the inspired advocacy of cultural interests in this country by the Minister, Marcel Masse, make it abundantly clear that we have the same feeling about the need to support culture in Canada that my honourable friend has and which is probably shared by almost every honourable senator, if not by all, in this chamber.

If I had had more time I would have spoken far less. If I had had more time to prepare, as they say, I would not have made such a long speech, and heaven knows that that is true in my case this afternoon.

In conclusion, I want to thank my honourable friend for his intervention. I am glad the matter has been presented in the Senate. We are going to hear some more interesting speeches. In fact, I hear that Senator Gigantès has written seven of them already and whether we are going to hear all of them, I do not know. We are going to hear a lot of good arguments perhaps that have not been touched on in the discussions so far. The cardinal point that I want to leave with you is that we are not at odds. At least, I do not believe that we are at odds in this matter; we are of one mind. We may quarrel over some of the modalities. I do not think that we should. I think that they are clear, the government's policy is clear, the statements are clear and our position is clear. Whether we agree with all those statements or modalities or not, the general thrust of the wish of all honourable senators, I am confident, is to assist the cultural industries of Canada to expand, develop and grow because they know that we know they are of the essence of the nation. If the nation is to grow as it should in the world, it must grow in this field as well. Furthermore, we know, and it was well said by my honourable friend, that in the future the cultural industries will be even more important than they are now because they will be part of this information revolution which is overtaking the world. We are all for it. I do not think we have anything to disagree about. I think the debate will be useful and I hope that my contribution has been able to explain, if any explanation is required, the view that the government takes on this great and important public issue.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, is it surprising that the Prentice-Hall case has aroused such passion in this country, particularly among those who are sensitive to cultural values, the only values that can show Canadians they are neither American nor British nor French and that they have an identity all their own?

Is it surprising that a number of senators felt that this was a matter of grave concern and that they had to get this message across to as many Canadians as they could? Of course, not. On the contrary, it would have been surprising if we had remained indifferent to a subject of this magnitude, and if we had, the comment that maybe this country will not survive because it does not deserve to survive, would not have been out of place.

I might as well admit it is impossible for me to speak dispassionately on this subject. I spent fifteen years of my life publishing books and plying this noble and particularly difficult trade, difficult both in French and in English Canada because of our small domestic market and having to cope with unavoidable and relentless competition from American, British and French publishers.

During that period between 1960 and 1975, it was impossible for me to focus all my energies on my work as a publisher, because I had to spend much of my time trying to convince the Government of Quebec and the federal government (and here I agree with Senator Roblin) that publishing was not a business like any other and that books were not a product like any other, and that if we wanted to continue to exist as a distinct society, governments would have to accept this fact and act accordingly.

So for fifteen years, I had to struggle with the help of my colleagues at the time to fire a political will that had not yet come into being.

After a nearly ten-year absence from the publishing sector, I was naive enough to believe that we had made some progress, and that although about 75 per cent of the book publishing industry was still in foreign hands, at least we would be allowed to keep the few crumbs we had left.

Recent events have proved how immensely naive I was. No, the battle of the book, as it was referred to at the time, that heroic struggle, has not been won. It is still being fought, and Canadians who are aware of the issues will have to give it everything they have got.

Why this concern about books, when there are so many other issues that are of vital interest to us at this very moment? I am sure, honourable senators, that you all know the answer: even with television, cablevision, video cassettes and the whole audio-visual equipment we have around us, there is still no substitute for books as an instrument of our culture.

"If you were alone on a desert island, which ten books would you choose to bring along?" This stock question which celebrities are always asked by reporters contains a basic truth that may be overlooked by those asking the question.

This truth is that with books, man is never really alone, and that no island is truly uninhabited if through literature we can establish that marvelous communication between author and reader.

No one is asked to choose the film or record or even the painting he would want to find under the palm tree on his island. Probably because the least flashy and least expensive of our cultural expressions remains that most reliable of treasures.

The heritage which the literature of a people represents is indeed much too precious an asset for the state not to protect it with the greatest solicitude by making sure, first, that it has the spiritual and material means to develop and, second, that control over its resources does not fall into foreign hands.

In extreme circumstances, a country like Canada might lose control over its industrial and commercial enterprises, even its natural resources, and yet remain a country, as the great American economist Galbraith once states. But he went on to say, and I quote:

● (1610)

[English]

What is required is autonomy in television programs, autonomy in book publishing, and that healthy support should be given to the Canadian publishing industry to make sure that the educational system is strongly supported. That is where real cultural autonomy lies.

[Translation]

English Canada has long since been in the abnormal situation where most publishing firms are owned by companies in the United States or Great Britain.

Even so, since a number of major Toronto firms were taken over by American interests, English Canadians are becoming quite concerned about the situation.

Until the 1970s French Canada did not have such problems—we had others! But since then the situation has evolved, several major publishing firms for all practical purposes have been bought by American or French interests. Indeed the situation has lasted long enough.

We must put an immediate stop to that. We must even use all available means to regain our cultural autonomy which is already seriously jeopardized.

Since books are our basic cultural tools, we find it hard to understand why, until now, the state has not bothered to put up a stronger defence against foreign domination, as it successfully and efficiently did in the case of radio and television.

That is why publishers have always been asking for legislation which, considering the jurisdiction of the various governments, would be closely patterned after the law which created the Canadian Radio-Television Commission. Not only should this legislation guarantee the future, for example by setting maximum foreign participation in a publishing company at 20 per cent, but it should also correct existing errors by forcing foreign companies to restore that percentage within a reasonable time limit, as was done without too much difficulty for radio and television.

Necessary though it may be, this legislation would not alter in any way the fact that in Canada, general publishing, as opposed to the publication of schoolbooks, cannot be justified from a strictly economic viewpoint.

That is why foreigners are primarily interested in textbook publishing companies. But everything is interrelated in the book publishing business, and in many cases the fact that publishing schoolbooks is more profitable has made it possible for some publishers to afford the luxury of marketing literary works and promoting young writers.

Let us sum up why general trade publishing is and will be in difficulty for a long time. (I am referring to French publications, aware as I am that the problems of our English-speaking colleagues are somewhat different and that they will have been described by other more learned senators).

First, the size of the market. Although there are 6,000,000 French Canadians, we hardly reach those who are spread out over the nine other provinces, this figure should consequently be reduced to about four and a half million francophone Quebecers. To a publisher, that kind of market is negligible.

Second, the formidable competition from books imported duty-free from France, Belgium, Switzerland . . . and even the Principality of Monaco! We are talking about literature whose prestige in Quebec is reinforced by the publicity it gets in newspapers, magazines, films and radio and television programs originating from Europe. We will never be able to compete with this massive stream of books and publicity.

Third, there is also the fact that French Canadians who read books are generally bilingual and have direct access to another huge body of excellent books supported by an even more impressive advertising force, this time from the United States, Great Britain and, on a smaller scale, from English Canada.

How can we expect readers who can indulge their appetite for books to this extent to have any time or money left to spend on books written by their own authors in their own language?

Publishers, however, are constantly amazed at the fact that interest in Quebec literature is still growing. What worries them is that the number of readers cannot be expected to grow much more, while the ranks of young writers continue to expand.

Unless we want to let the publishing industry and our literature go into a decline—with foreign interests coming in to sweep up the remains—we will have to take extraordinary steps to turn the present situation around. In a country like Canada, where a relatively small reading public happens to speak universally known languages like French and English, publishers realize they are doomed to remain humble artisans dedicated to the literary Muse, and that their labours will never bring the rewards that businessman working in other sectors can expect to receive. Which means that you have to be crazy to want to work at this trade in Canada.

However, if publishers are meeting a need, a government with any concern for defending its cultural values should make it possible for them to do their work without being haunted daily by the possibility of bankruptcy or being tempted by American or French interests.

As I said earlier, the battle of the book must continue. However, it would not be fair to give the impression that our governments have been oblivious to the alarm signals sounded by Canadian publishers during the last 25 years. Since it was first established, the Canada Council has realized that if the performing and visual arts cannot struggle and flourish with any measure of success without its financial assistance, the same applies to literature.

Initially, the Canada Council helped the authors, but it soon realized this would be useless if there were no Canadian publishers to publish them. The Council then decided to help the publishers as well.

[Senator Hébert.]

However, the first federal policy on book publishing which is worth mentioning is that of the Honourable Gérard Pelletier, the illustrious predecessor of the Honourable Marcel Masse.

Before talking about Mr. Masse's very interesting policy, I think it might be useful to quote some of the remarks made by Mr. Pelletier in his 1972 address to the International Book Fair, more than 13 years ago. Interestingly enough, the situation he describes is not that much different from the situation we have now 13 years later.

I quote:

Last February I had the pleasure to announce the first measures which had just been approved by the federal government under a new book policy which we intend to implement over the coming months. As you may recall, those measures are in line with the government's priority objective to promote the development of Canada's publishing sector, that is publishing firms under Canadian management and ownership, and give preferential treatment to those firms.

Some people have seen in our measures the result of what is supposed to be our resentment towards foreign companies, or an unjustified misappreciation of a certain indispensable contribution to our country's cultural existence. Others have expressed the fear that such measures might give rise to a movement which would lead to a slowdown in trade and free flow of books.

Nothing however gives currency to such an interpretation of our policy, whether we are talking about books or any other field of cultural activities. With all such programs the government simply intends to give a positive definition of the goals to be achieved.

In the field we are concerned with, the government wants Canadian artists and producers to have a bigger share, reassert their role, and widen their field of activity and their audience. Our intention is to make sure that, in any significant cultural activity made possible thanks to public funds, there is a "Canadian content"—a term which has really become popular. It does not stem from any kind of mistrust concerning the creative activities of non-Canadians, much less from a rejection of other cultures and other civilizations.

When the federal book policy reflects our will to promote the development of strictly Canadian publishing, fully competent and at the exclusive service of all talented Canadian authors, its objectives have nothing to do with xenophobia, but indeed they are so designed as to ensure the legitimate advancement and the necessary development of our very own cultural values.

One of the axioms from which the book policy has derived is that it is impossible to achieve the full participation of poets, writers and researchers in the cultural life of our country if control over publishing in Canada is not, to the fullest extent possible, in the hands of Canadians. That is because the government looks upon publishers as irreplaceable cultural agents, because it considers as essential the creative role of their situation in the chain which links the author and his readers that he is one of the first recipients of government assistance under the book policy.

The 1969 Canadian publishing inquiry made for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce unveiled an alarming situation—and nothing enables us to believe that it has improved at all since then—so very small is the place occupied by Canadian authors on the book market in this country. Their presence abroad is quite negligible.

One of the objectives of an over-all book policy must be to stimulate literary creation in our country, and give our authors, young and old alike, ready access to a reading public which can only welcome them; the amazing literary activities seen in Quebec in recent years attests to that. By considerably increasing grants to Canadian publishers through the Canada Council, we wanted them to play a more important role as cultural development agents and give them the means to expand their quest for new talents.

Our country must become a truly international market where we would find, as we do today, the entire literary production of our major centres of francophone and anglophone culture: Paris, London, Brussels, New York, and other cultural centres throughout the world, but in addition, and above all, and in full view, as fair and free competitors, the works of our own authors, the best of what our publishers have to offer, the intellectual products of our society. At this very moment, these products and this industry are still seen as intruders in a market dominated by foreign imports. Canada and Quebec give the impression of being a haven for imported books. Unfortunately, there are others who hasten to explain this state of affairs in terms of statistics: our small population, or in historical terms: Canada is still a young country. It is true that considering the number of French-speaking or English-speaking Canadians, we cannot afford, and I would say fortunately, to take our intellectual nourishment from Canadian sources alone. It is also true that we have few authors of world stature and reputation. To keep these problematic conditions under which we must, and will have to, live and grow from turning into a kind of impending doom and unavoidable destiny, we have government involvement.

Our own authors do not have the prestige of the exotic. On the other hand, they have the immense advantage of expressing a reality that reflects the experience of the reader, of using a language, and I am not referring to the level or quality of that language, more readily understood by the public. The message will not always have the philosophical depth of the great intellectual leaders of our time, but its tones will find a more sensitive ear. Every artistic endeavour, however imperfect it may be, embodies and reflects the community.

To bring to fruition a project that must be seen as one of the genuine objectives of a comprehensive publishing policy, public funds alone will not suffice. You, the publishers, you, the professionals whether you are publishers, critics, booksellers or librarians, will have to do your share. But nevertheless, the public sector's involvement is necessary.

In any case it is clear that the provincial authorities have an important role to play and we must achieve a better consensus on positions and policies. Schoolbooks fall completely under provincial jurisdiction, and the retail sector as well. Nearly all provincial governments have started looking at the problems in the publishing industry. Some have initiated support policies. Two provinces have taken very specific steps: Quebec and Ontario. Since the creation of the Department of Cultural Affairs, the Quebec Government has implemented a number of measures including its accreditation policy for booksellers.

Although Ontario showed its interest in the problems of Ontario publishers who represent the vast majority of the anglophone industry in Canada, fairly recently, the fact that the province was quick to implement the recommendations of three interim reports submitted in less than a year by its Royal Commission of Inquiry on problems in the publishing industry proves that it intends to be taken seriously. Provincial and federal policies have in common a fundamental trait that bodes well for the future. In none of the policies presently in effect do we see any intention of imposing on the publishing industry a system of regulations similar to the system applied to the radio and television sector. We do find the will to ensure that decisions affecting the development of our Canadian culture are made by Canadians. It would be intolerable to have decisions affecting the development of a culturally oriented industry like the publishing sector be subject in the final instance to control by foreign interests.

That is why it is hard to accept that only 20 per cent of the books produced in Canada are published by Canadian controlled firms, a situation that was highlighted by the inquiry on the Canadian publishing industry. We cannot be satisfied until the Canadian owned part of the industry publishes the majority of what is published here in Canada.

As I said earlier, this long quote from a speech by the minister responsible for the publishing industry in the seventies is still very apt today, so much so that it seemed to have inspired our Minister of Communications, the Honourable Marcel Masse, when he made his announcement on July 6 of this year, revealing the government's policy on foreign investment in the publishing and book distribution industry, a policy that he summarizes as follows:

The Canadian government believes that the existence of a vigorous publishing and book distribution industry, controlled by Canadians, is essential if this sector is to play its part in Canada's social and cultural development, said Mr. Masse. The publishing and book distribution industry must benefit from policies aimed at safeguarding our cultural sovereignty, in the same way these policies apply to the printed press, periodicals and broadcasting.

Mr. Masse went on to explain that the Government would examine all plans for foreign investment, either direct or indirect, in the publishing industry, in accordance with the provisions of the Investment Canada Act. With respect to direct investments the government, according to the Minister, will look favourably upon any proposition to set up a new company or to acquire an existing company, whether controlled by Canadian or foreign interests, if the investment is to be made under a Canadian controlled joint undertaking. In the case of acquisitions of foreign controlled companies, such deals might be allowed if Canadians are expected to take control within a reasonable time limit (two years) at a cost in line with prevailing market conditions.

According to his department release:

Mr. Masse stated that "the government will review each and every indirect acquisition." Generally speaking, he will approve such deals if they do not entail a significant lessening of competition between Canadian companies in a market sector. In addition, the investor will have to agree to relinquish company control to Canadian interests within two years for a then prevailing market price.

This policy is concrete evidence of the commitment made by the government through the Investment Canada Act, namely to protect Canadian cultural sovereignty and provide financial support for cultural industries which play a vital role in our collective life, as Mr. Masse had maintained. The government therefore acknowledges the Canadian publishing industry must have the means to ensure its own development within our domestic market, and foreign investment must not thwart that development.

Needless to say, honourable senators, I am quite pleased to see the Minister of Communications take such a firm stand. From the bottom of my heart, I wish him the full support of his cabinet colleagues to implement his policy as soon as possible.

Many of my former colleagues, Quebec publishers, also agree with this policy, not to mention my former colleagues in English Canada who are more directly involved for the time being.

In that respect, the reaction of the Association of Canadian Publishers is revealing. If I may I would like to quote long passages of a recent statement by that important association which I once fought along with concerning the same questions and which sums up the whole situation:

● (1630)

[English]

Widespread support has greeted the announcement by the Minister of Communications regarding foreign investment in Canada's book publishing and distribution industry. The new policy builds on the provisions of the Investment Canada Act concerning non-Canadian investments in business activities related to Canada's cultural heritage and national identity. The policy has been received enthusiastically by Canadian publishing companies, endorsed in the editorials of the major newspapers, supported by the Canadian business community and applauded by other cultural groups. Against the backdrop of the recent challenge to Canadian sovereignty by the «Polar Sea» this commitment to maintain and protect our cultural sovereignty has also struck a responsive cord with the larger Canadian public. The Association of Canadian Publishers, on behalf of its 140 Canadian-owned member companies, strongly endorses the government's policy and commends the Honourable Marcel Masse, Minister of Communications, for his clear-sighted commitment to Canada's cultural sovereignty.

The right to our own cultural voice and expression is as critical to our national interest as is territorial integrity. The Canadian government has long acknowledged that Canadian control of our vital communications media is a basic tenet of cultural sovereignty. Indeed, in a recent article listing his major accomplishments over the last year, Prime Minister Mulroney cited the banning of foreign take-overs of book publishing companies as a critical component in the defence of Canadian sovereignty. It was published in the Toronto Star, August 31, 1985. It is always important to remind ourselves of these things. The policy of gradual patriation of Canada's book industry is predicated upon the cultural and economic benefits resulting from Canadian ownership of the daily press, periodicals, television and radio stations and cable systems. Public policy has always ensured that Canadians would have access to the best of the world's literature. In the interests of cultural sovereignty, public policy must also ensure that there is a Canadian literature.

Canadian books are the carriers of our literary and intellectual heritage and an important medium of instruction and learning. They are important in preserving, developing and strengthening our identity as Canadians for ourselves and for the world. In recognition of this vital cultural contribution, the government has long supported the publication of a wide spectrum of Canadian books. Such support is critical to ensure the continued presence of Canadian books in the market, 75 per cent of which is already dominated by foreign books, most of which are imported from the United States and, of course, in the case of French books, from France and Belgium.

While the majority of original Canadian authored books are published by the Canadian owned industry, the Canadian market itself is dominated by foreign owned subsidiaries. These large, well financed branch plants control the most profitable segments of the book industry, textbook publishing and the distribution of foreign books. As a consequence, fully 80 per cent of the revenues generated by the Canadian book market accrued to foreign owned subsidiaries. A strong Canadian owned industry; inspired, financed and controlled by Canadians, is essential to the cultural development of Canadians. Such has been the central conclusion of every major study of the industry over the past three decades. For example, the Massey-Lévesque Commission 1951; the Ontario Royal Commission on Book Publishing, 1972; the Federal Cultural Policy Review Commission 1982—this reminds me of something!—the Ontario Special Committee for the Arts, 1983; and the Department of Communications own program evaluation of 1985. Since 1970 one of the objectives of the federal policy in support of Canadian books has been to assist the Canadian controlled sector of the book publishing industry to become dominant in both the English and French languages in Canada.

In its efforts to create a healthier and more competitive industry, the government has implemented a number of development assistance and support programs. The industry has made creative and responsible use of these resources to effect major improvements in the infrastructure of management of individual companies, to develop industry-wide services such as the Canadian Telebook Agency, to continue trade publishing without incurring heavy losses, as used to be the case, to develop publishing programs in new areas of domestic markets, and to make significant inroads in the international arena. The assistance has not allowed the Canadian owned industry to expand its share of the market. These programs have enabled the Canadian owned industry sufficient stability to maintain its market share in an economically difficult time. Relegated to a minor position in its own market, the Canadian owned sector continues to have access to only 20 per cent of its revenues. The economics of indigenous publishing in Canada are such that structural change in the industry is required to allow Canadian owned companies access to the more profitable activities of the industry at present controlled by foreign subsidiaries, textbook publishing and the distribution of imported books. Access to the more profitable activities will serve to solidify the Canadian base from which the Canadian owned sector will be better able to perform its vital cultural role.

The Minister of Communications, impatient with the prospect of allocating endless escalating resources required simply to maintain the present market position of Canadian owned companies, has implemented a progressive policy to alter the structure of the industry itself. He says:

It will not be through government aid, but rather through investment by the Canadian private sector, that the Canadian publishing industry will achieve its strength.

Marcel Masse said that on July 6, 1985. The ownership policy outlines the process for the incremental Canadianization of the industry. All proposals by non-Canadians to establish new business or to acquire, directly or indirectly, existing book publishing and distribution companies are reviewable by Investment Canada. The review process applies in the case of the foreign acquisition of any book publishing company based in Canada, whether Canadian owned or foreign owned. The purchase of a Canadian owned company by foreign interests is reviewable. Similarly, when an extraterritorial acquisition of a parent company that controls a subsidiary carrying on business in Canada takes place, the indirect acquisition of the Canadian based subsidiary is also subject to review. The foreign owned subsidiaries based in Canada are part of the Canadian publishing environment. The provisions of any policy dealing with the industry as a whole must, therefore, apply to the take-overs of both Canadian and foreign owned firms.

The proposals by non-Canadians to acquire or establish new businesses in book publishing will receive a sympathetic hearing by the Minister of Communications and the minister responsible for Investment Canada, provided the investment is through a joint venture with Canadian control. For direct acquisitions of foreign controlled businesses, allowances will be possible if divestiture of control occurs within a reasonable period of time—two years—at a fair market price. These criteria also apply in the case of indirect acquisition, with the additional proviso that the acquisition does not significantly lessen effective competition by Canadians in any segment of the Canadian market for books.

Previous joint ventures and divestitures within the industry have proven to be successful in both economic and cultural terms. In 1976 the Gulf and Western acquisition of the foreign subsidiary, Simon & Schuster (Canada), was reviewed by FIRA. As a result of this intervention, the Canadian owned General Publishing Company became the Canadian distributor for Simon & Schuster—an activity that has been extremely beneficial for that particular Canadian company, allowing it to expand its Canadian publishing program.

The FIRA review of another indirect takeover in 1976 of foreign owned Bantam Books of Canada resulted in the emergence of a new joint venture company, Seal Books with the Canadian company McClelland and Stewart. This arrangement created an opportunity for a Canadian presence in mass-market paperback publishing and distribution.

FIRA undertakings concerning Mattel's purchase of Whitman Golden Ltd. resulted in a joint-venture arrangement between the Canadian company, Greey de Pencier and Whitman Golden (Canada). Although it did not create a Canadian controlled company, this arrangement greatly expanded the market for Canadian children's books.

The recent and significant Canadianization in the oil and gas industry, accomplished under the aegis of FIRA and Investment Canada itself, establishes another useful precedent for the book industry. The sale of 60 per cent of Gulf Canada to Canadian interests was the result of the company's commitment to divest, as a condition of government approval of the indirect acquisition of Gulf Canada by Chevron Corp.

Canadian capital is also ready to acquire or obtain significant interests in the foreign owned subsidiaries operating in the book publishing and distribution industry and in the retail book sector. Several takeovers in the Canadian industry are at present before Investment Canada—Gulf and Western's acquisition of Prentice-Hall Canada and Ginn and Company; the purchase of Copp Clark Pitman by the British based Longman, a subsidiary of the Pearson Group; and the proposed acquisition of the Canadian company, Classic Bookshops by their British controlled competitor, W.H. Smith.

In each and every case, capable and qualified Canadian buyers have come forward. Only Gulf and Western's acquisition of Canadian companies will be highlighted here, and I will quote again later Canadian Publishers' Association.

In December, 1984, Gulf and Western Industries Inc. acquired the American company, Prentice-Hall. The transaction greatly expanded Gulf and Western's holdings in the publishing industry in the U.S.A. and Canada. The portfolio now includes Simon & Schuster Inc., Allyn & Bacon, Globe Modern and the more recently acquired Ginn and Company, included the recently purchased assets of Xerox Corp. When Gulf and Western Industries purchased Prentice-Hall Inc., it also acquired Prentice-Hall Canada Ltd. This subsidiary was established in 1960 as part of the wave of American branch plants set up to gain access to the expanding and lucrative Canadian educational market.

Today, Prentice-Hall Canada is a healthy company undertaking a diverse publishing program under the direction of strong Canadian management. A large portion of its sales are attributable to Prentice-Hall Canada agency business—the importation of foreign books, primarily from its parent company into the Canadian market. But Prentice-Hall Canada is also a major publisher of materials for Canadian schools and one of the largest suppliers to the college market, and it has a growing Canadian trade book list.

In 1983, Prentice-Hall Canada reported sales and other revenues of over $25 million. Retained earnings are at $12.1 million on an original capital investment of $250,000. Thus, more than $11.8 million has been earned in Canada—much of this from tax-supported textbook sales—for the proposed benefit of Gulf and Western Industries. If the acquisitions of Prentice-Hall Canada and Ginn and Company are approved, Gulf and Western Industries will become a Canadian publishing colossus overnight, as Gulf and Western Industries already owns Globe Modern, Allyn & Bacon and Simon & Schuster. The latter is currently represented in Canada by the Canadian owned company, General Publishing.

The addition of Prentice-Hall Canada and Ginn and Company will increase Gulf and Western's publishing sales in Canada to an estimated $50 million per year: An instant foreign controlled conglomerate in the fragile Canadian market.

The potential sale of Prentice-Hall Canada and Ginn and Company to Canadians would present the Canadian industry with the most significant opportunity of the decade to expand its position in its own market. More critically, it would allow the government and the industry to redress the dramatic under-representation of Canadian owned companies in the educational publishing sector (elementary, high school and college). It is through educational materials that Canadian students first develop an understanding of their cultural heritage. For educational, cultural and economic reasons, it is imperative that more of these pedagogical materials be produced by Canadian rather than foreign controlled companies.

There are several small and medium-sized Canadian owned educational publishers. At present, there are only two large Canadian owned publishing companies, and now I am speaking of English Canada: Gage Educational and Nelson Canada—competing with the foreign-controlled companies for the elementary, high school and college market. Surely it is desirable to have more Canadian companies of the size of Prentice-Hall Canada. There are capable and qualified Canadian buyers for Prentice-Hall Canada but to date the American owners have not deemed it necessary to respond to a Canadian bid to purchase the assets of Prentice-Hall Canada. There are Canadian companies poised to make responsible offers for Ginn and Company and Canadian offers for Copp Clark can be expected very soon.

The patriation policy is a necessary condition to changing the industry structure which has kept the Canadian owned industry in a minority position in its own market. The ownership policy will allow Canadians the opportunity to regain control of the vital publishing industry. The policy on foreign investment in the Canadian book publishing and distribution industry could not be more timely. Cases currently before Investment Canada for review—Prentice-Hall Canada, Ginn and Company, Copp Clark Pitman and Classic Bookshops—will demonstrate the government's commitment to the new policy. The impact of the patriation policy for Canadian publishing will be immediate and significant. The orderly divestiture of these major subsidiaries alone will increase the Canadian owned sector of the market substantially.

The government's cultural and economic objective of a dominant Canadian owned book publishing and distribution industry may well be attained within two years as indicated by the Minister of Communications. Marcel Masse and the Conservative government have ensured that 1985 will be seen as the watershed year in the history of Canadian publishing.

[Translation]

My dear former colleagues and publishers of English Canada, may your words be heard in heaven! As I read that text by today's English Canadian publishers of which I quoted a few excerpts, I was reminded of my own struggles in the seventies in Quebec, though also in perfect agreement with our colleagues from Ontario and the rest of Canada. I was reminded in particular of what we called the battle of the book, in which countless speeches were made, tons of press releases written, numerous representations made to the governments, and even, quite logically, a book was written, a very forceful declaration of principles entitled: "The Battle of the Book", the sub-title of which clearly highlighted the controversial nature of the matter: "Yes to French culture! No to foreign cultural colonialism!" I should point out that at the time the villain was Hachette, the great French multinational called "the octopus" by the French themselves.

Of course, I took part in the drafting of that collective statement published by the Éditions Leméac de Montréal in 1972. I have no qualms about quoting a few passages of the collective foreword and also occasionally plagiarizing myself, as it were, to recall here a few dramatic episodes of that glorious battle.

However, you may be asking how that old story is of any concern to us in 1985. It is of concern to us because in spite of the real efforts of the various provincial and federal governments that have followed, the situation of the publishing industry in Canada has not significantly changed since then and has remained in my opinion, and in the opinion of many among you, a matter of national urgency, hence the reason for this debate.

Unfortunately, in that matter, history never ceases to repeat itself and will go on repeating itself as long as Canadian publishers hold on to the few strongholds still left in this country. The day we lay down our arms, we shall be forgoing what we are still shy about calling our cultural identity.

As I tell this story, honourable senators who might not be familiar with that sinister episode could have a little fun, I hope, by substituting the words "United States" and "Gulf and Western" for the words "Hachette" and "France". This is just a little game I am suggesting to you.

In fact, over the years, American corporations themselves have become as much a threat to Quebec as the main French publishers, and corporations like McGraw-Hill and a few others have taken over a fair chunk of the French language Quebec publishing industry, but at the time of the great battle of the book I mentioned earlier, the threat came mostly from Hachette. Just to realize that this story is still perfectly relevant today, do not forget to play the game: Hachette is Gulf and Western, and France is the United States.

So much has been said about the Hachette case, one would assume that everybody knows what it is all about, and if no one tried to confuse the issue, the matter could be settled and public opinion would be enlightened.

But someone is confusing the issue. The Hachette representatives and accomplices, helped in all innocence by some good souls who are more impressed by eternal France than by our humble Quebec land, are telling an unbelievable version of the case in which the proud champion of French culture has to overcome obstacles raised by troublesome shopkeepers.

None other than the former President of the «Société générale de financement», an agency of the Quebec government, namely Mr. Jean Deschamps, a good soul if there ever was one, and in addition to everything else a top Hachette accomplice, dared speak of the "vulgar book trade".

Such a judgment cannot but influence John Q. Public who is not aware of Hachette's mores and who has been constantly hearing recently about the importance of reinforcing our cultural ties with France. But France is just like the United States, remember that!

First of all, let us state emphatically that none of the people who opposed the Hachette invasion was against the strengthening of cultural ties with France; quite the contrary. All were in favour of French books being sold freely in Quebec at the best possible price to the reader, and of Quebec books finding buyers in France, the fact of the matter being that only in a colonialist context could cultural ties be strengthened just one way.

Well, in these two respects, Hachette is not contributing anything. What is worse, the Hachette presence in Quebec has a tendency to limit the choice of available French books and to make them more expensive. The situation of the pocket book is particularly revealing. On the other hand, the efforts Hachette claimed to have made to sell Quebec books on the French market were just laughable, as I will explain later.

We have therefore reached the point where we must give this warning: "Do not listen to those who are trying to deceive you". It is a fact that Hachette is a major publishing house with international connections, but it is not invading the Quebec market for our sake. It is doing it for its own bottom line. It practices nothing but cultural colonialism.

Even in France, where its ties with the state are well-known, Hachette uses unacceptable methods to harm its competitors. For instance, in railway station book stores which it operates as a monopoly, thanks to its friends both in l'Elysée and Matignon, the books published by its competitors are generally not available. This is a sort of censorship which Hachette applies quite naturally on the Quebec side of its operation and against which Quebec publishers and book store owners intend to protect Quebec readers.

Those who are always confusing the issue have spoken of Francophobia. Well, we do not think that Francophilia means surrendering completely to a corporation, a French one at that, whose methods are likely to hurt the good cultural relations between the French and Quebec people.

In the same way, some ten years ago, at the time of the O'Leary Commission, Americans used to refer to Americanophobia, because publishers of Canadian magazines were trying to prevent their American counterparts from publishing in Canada so-called Canadian editions which were identical or nearly identical to their American originals, except that the advertising was sold in Canada.

These so-called Canadian editions, published without editorial costs, were truly a gold mine and resulted in unfair competition, as the O'Leary Commission finally recognized.

At the time, Mr. Ball, from the State Department, claimed that Canada wanted to stop the free circulation of American periodicals, although no one had objected to the original editions of Time, Life, Reader's Digest, etc., being sold freely on Canada's news-stands.

We find the same kind of specious interpretation today, not only in what was being said by the spokesperson for Hachette but also, and this is much worse, we find it reflected in the attitudes of certain individuals representing the Quebec government.

Why were these government representatives trying to distort the issue? At the time we were locked in a struggle with the Government of Quebec, headed by Mr. Bourassa, incidentally. The reason was obvious: Mr. Pompidou neatly duped Mr. Bourassa, while piling on the hospitality at the Élysée. Acting in the interests of Hachette, but ostensibly acting on provisions of cultural agreements signed by France and Quebec, the President of the Fifth Republic persuaded our youthful Prime Minister, who was on his first official visit to Paris, to dilute the conditions set by the Quebec government on foreign take-overs of publishing firms. Back in Quebec, Mr. Bourassa realized that, to use a colloquialism, he had been shafted. However, he preferred to brazen it out, and his officials, who had to justify the unjustifiable, had no choice but to distort the debate.

The Société générale de financement played a very unsavory role in this affair. This semi-public agency brazenly and with complete impunity, sabotaged the very interests it was supposed to protect, namely those of Quebecers and Quebec industry. It very generously financed the Hachette onslaught. In fact, Hachette's behaviour is not terribly surprising. It is not the first and certainly not the last time a business has sought to take advantage of the complicity and complaisance of a government to score points against its competitors. Far worse was the amateurishness, ignorance and bad faith shown by the Quebec government and the SGF.

I am not saying that we should object to all government intervention in the publishing sector. Certain kinds of regulation, certain forms of assistance to the industry could be part of a judicious cultural policy, in line with the government's action with respect to other sectors: the Canada Council, the Canadian Film Development Corporation, the CRTC, and the rest. However, all these sectors will not necessarily require the same approach and just as the government's intervention with respect to the newspaper media, which like books have a history that goes back several hundred years, just as it respects the characteristics of that industry, it should also respect the specific nature of the publishing industry. In Quebec, the industry consists of independent firms which are anxious to preserve their individuality. There is a certain balance among these firms, and it is intolerable that the SGF should be instrumental in destroying that balance by financing the Hachette onslaught.

In the Hachette affair, the interests of the entire Quebec community are at stake. If Hachette manages to dominate the publishing industry in Quebec, Quebec books are in danger of being treated as a third-rate product, not as worthwhile financially, from Hachette's point of view, as its own product line. A third-rate product does not get prime exposure in the store window. If the small number of copies that were in stock are sold out, there is very little inclination to order more. There is no advertising, nothing to boost sales. One can readily imagine the consequences of such a situation for our authors and the future of Quebec's literature. One cannot weigh the stakes in the publishing battle without taking such risks into consideration.

Are those risks real? The behaviour of Hachette in France and elsewhere gives a pretty fair indication. The policy of that firm is to do everything it can to corner the market. Some companies, international or not, are satisfied with a place under the sun and manage to get along with their competitors. They respect the rule of fair competition. Hachette goes much further. Pushing its way through and pulling every string, this firm would rather seek to crush or take over the competition. It has a strong tendency to create a monopoly. It so happens that, in the publishing industry, monopoly spells totalitarian regime. Who would pretend that such a danger threatens only the petty interests of quarrelsome shopkeepers? Automatically, monopoly leads to censorship and the abolition of free expression through books.

It is important to know who we are dealing with. Hachette is the world's largest publishing company. Its 1971 sales were over $250 million. The "green trust", as it is called in France, has already taken over a number of publishers, including Arthème Fayard, Grasset, Stock and Tallandier, not to mention the Librairie générale française, or the Livre de poche. Hachette is also a monster of the press, one of the four "major powers" in France with the groups Prouvost, Floirat and Dassault—the aircraft company. Great manoeuvres are now taking place over there, and Hachette will certainly not be a loser; soon the number of "major powers" might very well drop from four to three or even two. French journalists are worried about the ever growing centralization of press interests in the hands of wheelers and dealers who despise that profession and who, in the case of Hachette, have close links with the government.

More than ever books in Quebec are one of the main instruments of collective existence. Among the means of expression, it is at the same time the most universal and the most indigenous. It is indigenous because of the audience it creates for Quebec thinking. A book is also the freest means of expression, the least subject to the conditions which affect television and radio, for instance, and to the constraints which thwart journalism in times of press centralization. Of course a book is subject to the vagaries of the market, but the publication and marketing of books in Quebec have nonetheless achieved an impressive development which is itself a guarantee of the inherent freedom of books as a means of expression. Any government action concerning books must be aimed at protecting that freedom.

Of course the interest of our publishing firms and book stores is involved, and it is not necessarily negligible, not any more than the interest of radio and television enterprises which the CRTC is careful not to drive to bankruptcy. In most cases, we are talking about small firms that make small profits. The book industry is one of the most decentralized. It includes 50-odd publishing firms and about 200 book stores. Among the publishing firms, twenty or so are quite important. Some of them deal mainly in current publications at popular prices while others specialize in school books. The 30 other firms can only stay in business thanks to the publishing grants they get from governments. As for book stores, which can be found throughout Quebec, most of them are allowed to sell school books to the institutions, in accordance with the new legislation. About twenty are not so allowed and are satisfied with selling books to the general public, such as books on current events, literature and imported books.

Although the interest of those firms is involved for sure, it is not the main stake in the book publishing battle. Considering the merciless approach and monopolistic views of Hachette, the invasion of that firm imperils our literature and the free access of Quebecers to foreign literature.

As I said earlier, a senior Quebec official at the time had had the misfortune of describing book stores and publishing as a "vulgar trade". There is less chance of that kind of unwarranted remark being heard in Ottawa in 1985. But, in more elegant terms, certain government circles behave as if they did not understand why the "Toronto intellectuals" get so carried away when they hear that cultural industries might be negotiated with everything else (the works!) when the time comes to discuss free trade—whatever that means!—with our Americans friends. The next comment we will hear is probably that books are a commodity like anything else, that book stores and publishing is a "vulgar trade".

I can appreciate why the "Toronto intellectuals" would react so strongly, as did those of Montreal 15 years ago. Writers, publishers, book sellers, we were all furious! I recall making the following remarks to set the record straight before the Montreal Board of Trade when I was talking about the Hachette affair:

The word trade, and I should not be saying this to you, is not offensive in itself. There is no doubt that book sellers are traders. But what Mr. Deschamps does not seem to understand—the senior official whose faux pas I have already mentioned—and it is extremely serious, considering the major role he would like to play in the book business—is that a book store is more than an ordinary commerce, and that a book is not an ordinary product.

Perhaps it bears repeating that book stores are genuine cultural centres whose influence extends over a whole neighbourhood, sometimes over a whole city. I know many librarians, real amateurs, who were embarrassed, practically living in the store, dedicating their life to it because they were obsessed by a love of books.

"Writers write, publishers publish and I sell," said a bookseller! "Every day, there are many times that I am involved in defending the interests of literature. Selling, advising, suggesting and recommending a book is the last stage to success, to winning the reader."

What businessman can build his reputation on culture? And is there any other business that is more essential to developing a national culture or any culture for that matter?

We may regret that de Havilland has been sold to foreign interests, and I certainly do.

However, it is not the end! But the day we lose control over our publishing industry, it will only be a question of time before we witness a disintegration of our collective identity.

What applies to bookstores also applies to publishing. It is a business that markets goods, rather strange goods made of paper and ink and its existence depends on their spiritual content.

That is probably why publishers are a rather strange breed of businessmen. They are always torn between the demands of the intellect and the constraints of business, between the talented young writer they should promote and the bank manager who is reluctant to lend money to someone who sometimes consciously manufactures products that will not make a profit.

So publishing is not your ordinary business. Books are unique products, even down to their physical aspect.

I do not think it is necessary to dwell any longer on the cultural implications of the book industry before an audience that is particularly well informed in this respect. But, you will ask, what, economically-speaking, constitutes the attraction of this sector for the Americans on one side and the French on the other? Actually, not much. When I was still in the industry, retail sales of French language books represented about $40 million per year. Peanuts! The breakdown was as follows: $15 million for Quebec publishers of schoolbooks; $2.6 million for Quebec publishers of general literature and $22.4 million for French, Swiss and Belgian publishers. Certainly not much.

France's share represented about $21 million, which is more than half of the total sales figures for the book retail industry in Quebec, and this does not include American publishers.

Before the Quiet Revolution, the book trade in Quebec was of no interest to foreigners. Publishing of schoolbooks was controlled entirely by religious congregations and many book-stores were owned by the diocese.

Senator Le Moyné remembers that time as well as I do. After all, we are the same age!

As for literary publishing, it was, then as now, considered an outlandish activity which was left to a handful of eccentrics who did not mind ending their days in poverty.

During the last decade, as religious congregations withdrew from the bookselling industry they were replaced by chaos and anarchy. This was not a climate likely to attract serious capitalists such as McGraw-Hill and Hachette. However, our professions gradually organized themselves; our associations negotiated relentlessly with the governments, which, after a lot of ear-pulling, finally took some of the action we had been insistently requesting.

In this context, in May 1971, the Quebec Department of Cultural Affairs decided to licence competent booksellers who would have the exclusive right to sell to the communities subsidized by the state. This was a good way to make bookshops finally profitable, or at least nearly so. One of the conditions for obtaining a licence was that there not be more than 50 per cent of foreign-owned capital stock in the bookshop. Unfortunately, this was too small a step, even though it was in the right direction. In practice, we all know that a clever shareholder can succeed in controlling a business with only 50 per cent of its capital stock. Nevertheless, this and a few other measures announced a healthier situation for the book market. It became nearly a good thing to be a bookseller, and Quebec publishers were confident about the future.

This change in climate was quickly recognized in New York and Paris. In a very short while, the big foreign publishers who had always treated us with the greatest of contempt rushed to Quebec determined to harvest what the labourers of Quebec bookselling and publishing had sown. We witnessed the arrival of Encyclopedia Britannica, Bordas, Holt Rinehart & Winston, Hachette, McGraw-Hill, and many others. Each time that we lost a knight or a bishop, our associations sounded the alarm and alerted public opinion and the governments. The last major blow at the time I was involved in this industry of course, was the takeover of the five Garneau bookstores by the Centre éducatif et culturel, in other words by Hachette.

From then on, we had to fight, not to maintain the status quo, but to regain lost ground. Publishers are still doing it today. Foreign domination in the book retail industry was no longer a vague threat, but an unfortunate reality which I can best describe by quoting a few figures.

In the field of school book publishing at the elementary and secondary levels, nearly 40 per cent of total sales of $15 million was controlled by foreigners. The Hachette group alone accounted for half that figure. In the field of distribution of wholesale bookselling, foreign interests represented nearly 65 per cent of total sales. As for the bookstores, foreigners already controlled 15 per cent of them, but they were on the increase.

As concerns the publishing of general literature, the large foreign publishers have left it to us with contempt, for the excellent reason that it was not yet viable. Besides, they know that by controlling distribution and bookstore marketing, they brought Quebec publishers to their knees.

Such was the situation. It was already intolerable. But there was every indication that it was to deteriorate still more. It was casting aspersions on Hachette—but rather paying homage to its devouring aggressiveness—to believe it would try to dominate the Quebec market, as it did in every other country in the world where it has spread its tentacles. Let us not blame Hachette for trying to dominate, to control, get rich. I hope you are substituting “Gulf and Western” for “Hachette” once in a while because such has been my purpose. In a capitalistic system, those are the ways of the big trusts.

In his remarks to shareholders at an annual meeting of the corporation held in Paris, the President of Hachette, Mr. Éthier de Rochemareuil did nothing to conceal his ambitions, and to quote him:

The determination to increase our international activities has led us, among other initiatives to acquire a major interest in the Centre éducatif et culturel de Montréal, the largest publisher of school books in French Canada, despite the problems now facing cultural investments in Quebec.

One may wonder how far Hachette would have gone had it not been for the “few problems” raised by the protests from publisher and bookseller associations!

On the other hand, France could hardly be blamed for supporting Hachette to the hilt and exerting incredible pressures on our provincial government: those are the ways of capitalistic countries, especially those with a colonial past.

Nor can we, on the other hand, blame Gulf and Western in 1985 for doing what they did, using every means at their disposal, even including scorched-earth tactics.

However, it must be stressed that one of the most embarrassing traits of Librairie Hachette is their very close and always ambiguous links with governments. According to L'Expansion, the major French economic magazine, and I quote:

Hachette's strong position in school book publishing, its control over N.M.P.P. (Nouvelles Messageries de la Presse Parisienne), its near-monopoly in the distribution of books and newspapers abroad, its control over railway station libraries and underground network newsstands, its public influence through the daily France Soir would not exist without the government's good will. Hachette has at all times compromised with the powers that be. (Including Nazi occupation forces from 1940 to 1944!) And the powers that be have always compromised with Hachette, willing to maintain complacency on such an essential political ground as the broadcasting of ideas. Both parties profit by it—

Washington lobbyists really have nothing to teach our French cousins!

I was wondering then if our provincial government was aware of this and also of the fact that, during its warm meetings with the French government, or its gourmet dinners with Mr. Pompidou, President of the French Republic and a Hachette author, while champagne was being served to celebrate France-Quebec agreements in the Elysée salons, Hachette was always there lying in wait.

I suppose that because it has become commonplace to find in the morning paper top secret documents from this or that cabinet, public opinion did not react quite as it should have when it read in Le Devoir the text of three orders in council telling the story of an abdication by the provincial government of the time.

I shall summarize the case in three stages: First, under an order in council dated March 10, 1971, Quebec book stores had to have no more than 25 per cent foreign participation to be accepted, that is, to have the right to sell to organizations subsidized by the provincial government. That was fine, but the news was not made public. Nobody ever heard about it. Second, under an order in council dated March 16, our book stores became acceptable provided they had no more than 40 per cent foreign participation. It was almost a defeat. Third, on April 28, a little after Premier Bourassa's official visit to Mr. Pompidou, a third order in council was passed increasing to 50 per cent the foreign participation allowed. France had won; Quebec had lost.

Moreover, the French union of publishers had the guts to denounce these insignificant restrictions and blamed the Quebec government and our professional organizations the way the French used not so long ago to bring to heel native rulers who dared stand up.

Among other things, the French union blamed our Minister of Cultural Affairs for entrusting a small corporate group with book production and distribution in Quebec. What the French called a small corporate group was the three large organizations which included almost all the publishers and book store owners in Quebec!

No doubt to add to the pressure which Mr. Pompidou was putting on Mr. Bourassa, Mr. Maurice Schuman, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, raised this issue again when he came to Quebec a few months later. With a stark frankness rather unusual from a diplomat, the minister indicated to the Quebec Press that if our book policy did not please France (or Hachette?), the French would not be interested in distributing Quebec books in France. If this was not a sort of blackmail, I do not know what it was! In a more open fashion, our American friends would refer to it as a "scorched earth policy" . . .
